

HISTORY OF THE

FRENCH REVOLUTION,

BY

M. ADOLPHE THIERS,

MEMBER OF THE ACADÉMIE FRANCAISE, AND LATE MINISTER-OF-WAR IN FRANCE.

TRANSLATED FROM THE TWELFTH PARIS EDITION,

BY

THOMAS W. REDHEAD, ESQ.

WITH AN INTRODUCTORY SKETCH OF THE HISTORY OF FRANCE TO THE ACCESSION OF LOUIS XVI

FROM THE FRENCH OF M. FELIX BODIN.

LONDON, EDINBURGH, AND DUBLIN:
A. FULLARTON AND CO.

1853.

EDINBURGH:
FULLARTON AND MACNAB, PRINTERS, LEITH WALK.

PRELIMINARY NOTICE

OF M. THIERS AND HIS WORK.

The great French Revolution is an event that still absorbs the attention of mankind, and will doubtless to a remote posterity continue to do so. The extraordinary circumstances that marked its origin and progress, the crimes and virtues of which it was the occasion, the vicissitudes of fortune, national and personal, attendant upon it, and, above all, the influence it has exercised upon civilization and the world at large, render it an object of profound interest to every class of readers. It is not surprising, therefore, that since its commencement in 1789 up to the present time, no subject has attracted the notice of so many writers, both in France itself and in the other countries of Europe. Of these, as is natural from the proximity of the era, there is not one with any pretensions to impartiality. Each views the revolution as a whole, and in its multifarious incidents, through one prevailing medium. He is a partisan of royalty, aristocracy, or democracy, and, under the pressure of political bias, misrepresents, if not distorts, facts, characters, and motives. Hence there is none entitled to rank as a truthful historian of the epoch. This is a subject of regret, but not of wonder, for all contemporaneous annals must be more or less imbued with the passions of the times.

Undoubtedly he who has treated the topic freest from individual theories or prepossessions, is the author of the following work. His is a clear and sparkling narrative, where the eventful tale is told, without tedious dissertations to distract and weary attention, or obtrusive reflections to influence judgment and uphold some pertinacious dogma. On sweeps the story with all its prominent features, shifting from scene to scene with ease and rapidity, introducing character after character as they emerge upon the stage; detailing occurrences with remarkable vivacity and precision, and unfolding with singular acumen the springs of action and the distinguishing peculiarities of individuals. But no philosophy, properly so called; and without any intention of disparaging that school of historians known as the philosophical in France at the present day, of which it would be impossible to speak too highly, it may be affirmed that of such an event as the French revolution, so recent in date, and so disputed in its various phenomena, the record is most commendable which nearest assimilates to a chronicle: not a bare outline of facts, but a circumstantial and animated narration, illustrated by those living portraits which convey so lively a perception of the spirit of an age, of its men and deeds. Such emphatically is the history of M. Thiers, and to this recommendation doubtless is owing its extraordinary popularity. Not only in France, but throughout the continent, it is regarded as the great standard work upon the subject. In France numerous editions of it have been exhausted, and the pirates of Brussels have reaped a rich harvest of unrighteous gain from its republication. In this country it is comparatively less known, although a translation of it appeared some time ago, of the merits or demerits whereof it would be invidious to speak. The object of the present translation is to diffuse the work more generally through these islands, for the great moral and political lessons taught by an intimate knowledge of the French revolution are of inestimable value to every order of a community such as the British. And this knowledge will be more impressively conveyed coming from a French source, since that can be liable to none of those suspicions as to unfairness or exaggeration which have attached to compilations of home manufacture.

Before adverting further to the qualities and advantages of the work, however, it will be advisable to introduce the author himself, by a short sketch of his life. M. Thiers, then, although prime-minister of France in the 39th year of his age, is of such obscure parentage that it is yet a matter of dispute what occupation his father followed. It is at least certain that he was born in the city of Marseilles on or about the 16th April, 1797, and, according to the most credible authorities, in the dwelling of an honest locksmith there, whose offspring he was. His mother was of better family, being of an old commercial stock, which had fallen, nevertheless, into extreme poverty. Through the influence of her relatives, however, the boy, at a tender age, obtained a bursary in the Imperial Lyceum at Marseilles, and there received all his early education. In the year 1815 he was removed to Aix to enter upon the study of the law. Here he met a fellow-student of the same lowly origin as himself, with whom he formed a friendship that has continued through life unbroken, to the signal advantage of both parties. This was M. Mignet, also celebrated as the author of an admirable analysis of the French revolution. After undergoing the usual course of academic attendance, the young Thiers was called to the bar and began the practice of his profession at Aix. In this provincial sphere, unaided by friends or fortune, he met with very slender encouragement; so strapping on a knapsack, he, in company with his friend Mignet, set out one morning to court fortune in Paris. The two wayfarers entered that great metropolis full of aspiring hopes, but for the present indifferently supplied with any extrinsic means of realizing them. The first months of their residence gave but little token of a brilliant future, if we trust a writer who thus describes their modest domicile:—"It is now several years ago since I climbed, for the first time, the innumerable steps of a gloomy building, situated at the bottom of the obscure and uncleanly alley de Montesquieu, in one of the most densely populated and noisy quarters of Paris. It was with a lively feeling of interest that I opened, on the fourth floor, the begrimed panels leading into a small chamber which is worth the trouble of describing:—a low chest of drawers, a deal bed, curtains of white calico, two chairs, and a little black ricketty table, composed the whole garniture."*

The manner in which M. Thiers raised himself from this situation of obscurity and poverty exhibits his energy and powers in a striking light. It was at the commencement of the year 1823, when the repressive administration of Villèle was in full vigour. Manuel, the great orator, had just been violently expelled from the Chamber of Deputies, and was, of course, the popular idol of the moment. M. Thiers saw that to him, an ambitious plebeian, the event might prove auspicious. He went straightway to Manuel, himself a native of the south, and a man of frankness and feeling, who, appreciating the value of the services offered him, forthwith presented Thiers to M. Lafitte, and obtained his admission amongst the contributors to the Constitutionnel, then the predominant engine of the press. This opening he lost no time in turning to account. Eminently endowed with a capacity for literary warfare, he soon became distinguished for the vigour and hardihood of his articles; and as in France the occupation of a journalist is regarded with an estimation proportioned to its influence over society, the young contributor speedily found himself the object of high consideration. He passed into the most brilliant circles of the opposition, into the crowded saloons of Lafitte, Casimir-Perier, the Count de Flahault, Baron Louis, the great financier of the era, and even of M. de Tallyrand, who, albeit fastidious in his company, is stated to have detected, with his keen glance, the capabilities of the briefless advocate.

This introduction to society was made available by M. Thiers to facilitate the undertaking upon which he had already entered. He had now opportunities of meeting many of the actors in the great drama of the revolution, remnants of the various Assemblies constituted during its progress, statesmen, generals, diplomatists, and financiers, with whom he cultivated a sedulous intercourse. Endowed with a happy talent of rapid composition, he found time to supply the exigencies of the daily press, and to be a constant frequenter of drawing-rooms, where, storing up the results of conversations with men who had actually taken part in events he was preparing to narrate, he applied them in study and contemplation to improve and embellish the work upon which he was engaged. At length his "History of the French Revolution" made its appearance, and at once placed its author in the highest ranks of literary celebrity.

The rapid progress of this work in public esteem, and the fortunate gift of a share in the Constitutionnel, conferred upon him by an admirer, raised M. Thiers to comparative affluence. Leaving his garret in the alley de Montesquieu, he emerged at once as one of the most prominent men in France, in the two paramount fields of literature and politics. Growing discontented with the somewhat antiquated tone of the Constitutionnel, he established in 1828 a new paper, more liberal in its principles, called the National. In this journal an unrelenting war was waged against the Polignac administration, which, often suppressing particular numbers, and adopting other partial remedies against the galling stings of Thiers and his assistants—Armand Carrel, and some of the most able men of the liberal party—finally took the desperate expedient of the Ordinances of July. The revolution of 1830, the result of that measure, is matter of notoriety.

This occurrence, so fatal to the Jesuits and the elder Bourbons, materially tended to the advancement of M. Thiers. Under the new government he was nominated councillor of state, and intrusted, without title, with the functions of secretary-general to the ministry of finance under Baron Louis. The first ministry appointed after the elevation of Louis-Philippe, being composed of heterogeneous materials, was speedily decomposed. Under the Lafitte administration, formed in November 1830, Thiers received the official title of under-secretary of state in the department to which he was already attached. It may be mentioned that he had previously pub-ished a pamphlet on Law's system, which, developing sound and comprehensive views of finance, recommended him to that branch of the public service. At the same time he was elected deputy for the town of Aix, his alma mater, and made his first appearance in the Chamber, where he experienced a very unfavourable reception.

* M. Loève-Veimar: "Statesmen of France and England."

In person, M. Thiers is almost diminutive, with a cast of features, though intellectual, reflective and sarcastic, far from possessing the traits of beauty. Moreover, the face itself, small in form, as befits the body, is encumbered with a pair of spectacles so large that, when peering over the marble edge of the long narrow pulpit, styled the tribune, whence all speakers address the Chamber, it is described as appearing rather the appendage than the supporter of the two glaring orbs of crystal. With such an exterior, presenting something of the ludicrous, so fatal to effect, especially in volatile France, M. Thiers, full of recollections of Mirabeau, Vergniaud, and other orators of the revolution, essayed at first an ambitious style of oratory. The attempt provoked derision, but only for a moment. In his new sphere, as in the others he had passed through, he soon arrived at distinction. Subsiding into the oratory natural to him, simple, vigorous, and rapid, he approved himself one of the most formidable of parliamentary debaters. He became a leading man in the Chamber, and head of the party known as the left-centre, occupying an intermediate position between the right-centre, or conservatives, and the extreme-left, or radicals.

Parties are scarcely so strictly defined in France as in England, or at least amalgamations of them are more frequent. M. Thiers, though identified at first with the more liberal section of the Chamber, has nevertheless formed part of administrations based upon principles of a rather adverse tendency. In truth, political consistency is not a very eminent virtue amongst the chief statesmen on the other side of the channel. No doubt a sense of duty impels these oscillations, but they cause ruptures and alienations which affect the credit and character of public men. M. Thiers has not escaped the charge of tergiversation, or failed to give great umbrage to the party with which he was originally associated. He became an object of suspicion to his former allies by the support he gave Casimir-Perier's ministry, founded on the juste-milieu, or middle-course policy, which succeeded that of Lafitte, and his subsequent career did not tend to restore their confidence. He accepted the office of minister of the interior under the Soult cabinet, formed on the 11th October 1832, and from that time until February 1836, continued to fill some of the principal departments of state, as the ministries of the interior, of commerce and public works, and of foreign affairs, under various chiefs, Marshals Soult, Gerard, Mortier, and Broglié. At length, on the 22d February 1836, he was himself elevated to the post of President of the Council, or prime minister, the highest dignity a subject can attain in France. His administration was not of long duration, being dissolved on the 25th August of the same year. He then passed into opposition, but was again called to the Presidency of the Council by the king, in the beginning of the year 1840, which he held until September of that year, when he gave place to his great rival M. Guizot, under the nominal premiership of Marshal Soult.

Up to September 1840, M. Thiers had always professed himself a warm advocate of the English alliance, but taking offence at the operations of the British squadron against Mehemet Ali in Syria, he then assumed a hostile attitude towards this country, and doubtless but for the firm resistance of the king, Louis Philippe, would have provoked a war. This incident seems first to have awakened the slumbering animosity of the French against Great Britain, which has been since expressed through their journals in no measured terms. At all events the cause of his resignation has completely reinstated M. Thiers in the good opinion of his early party, and it is lamentable to admit that he may at the present moment be ranked as one of the principal leaders of the war faction. For, strange as it may appear, all other political differences are merged, and the question of peace or war has become the grand pivot of party polemics. War without object, without aim, save of vengeance for past humiliations.

It is probable that M. Thiers has been driven temporarily to side with this faction from position rather than from real inclination. Personally he must be averse to incur the hazards of a war which would in all probability end in a fresh revolution, especially if the French arms encountered reverses. If called again to power, as it may happen within a brief interval, a heavy responsibility will weigh upon him, since upon the policy he pursues the destinies of civilization itself may depend. Thus there are few more important personages at the present day than M. Thiers, and certainly he exhibits a remarkable example of the social equality existing in France, for in no other country could a man, so totally destitute of every influential prestige, have risen by the mere force of ability from an obscure station to the very summit of social and political eminence. There are instances in this country of successful lawyers reaching dignity and rank from humble origins, but in no other profession, and least of all in literature or politics, the epithet of "literary or political adventurer" being deemed one of the most opprobious which can be applied to an individual. The French, on the contrary, are content to enlist talents in their service wherever they may be manifested, indifferent as to the family or fortune of their possessor.

Having thus traced M. Thiers's past career, and assigned his present position, it only remains to add a few words on the subject of his great work. One of its principal merits to an English reader is, that it presents the revolution and all its attendant circumstances in a peculiarly French view. Every thing relative to France is more fully developed, its internal condition, the various parties that from time to time arose, obtained supremacy, and eventually fell, the personages who composed those parties and successively directed the storm, are all more strikingly and circumstantially portrayed than could possibly occur in the composition of a foreign writer. Hence a more perfect insight is afforded into the causes of the revolution, and a more distinct appreciation of its numerous phases. The concerns of other countries are rarely introduced, except as they affect, for the moment, the interests of France, and thus attention is exclusively directed to the one paramount object, the elucidation of the event related.

The style of the work is in unison with its design. Not formed upon the severe models of Greece and Rome, it partakes more of conversational freedom, and is light and agreeable rather than stern and dignified. It is at times unequal; occasionally mounting to pathos and eloquence, and again descending below the standard of correctness. As in most modern French works, it is not easy of translation, so as to preserve its tone and spirit. In fact, with the country itself, the language also has been revolutionized, and every one acquainted with French literature is conscious of the remarkable difference that exists between the styles in vogue in the 18th and 19th centuries. A certain brevity of expression and abruptness of transition has become prevalent, rendering the meaning obscure and difficult to render, with a due regard to fidelity, into appropriate English. This singular manner is carried to such excess by one historian, M. Michelet, that he may be said to write almost in apostrophes.

As military events form so large a portion of the history of the Revolution, it is gratifying that M. Thiers treats them with unprecedented clearness and precision. The plans of campaigns and of battles are so lucidly unfolded that every reader, however little conversant with martial tactics, is enabled to sieze and comprehend them. This is no ordinary recommendation, since in general these accounts are given in such confused and complicated verbiage, that few but professional heads can form any distinct ideas upon the matters detailed. The descriptions of Hoche's operations in La Vendée and of Bonaparte's first campaign in Italy, are more particularly distinguished for this clearness of exposition. In fact, for a civilian, M. Thiers displays an extraordinary knowledge of the art of war. He appears, indeed, like all his countrymen, to entertain too decided a partiality for it, esteeming military success as the highest of human glories. After all, this feeling is not confined to the French, for in all countries the most substantial rewards and honours seem awarded to fortunate warriors.

One reproach has been urged against M. Thiers in his history, which it may be necessary to notice. It is the view of inevitability, or fatalism, which he inclines to take of many of the atrocities committed during the revolution. This charge is made against him at least, and principally by those who are prone to exculpate the enormities of kings or princes, regarding them as beings incapable of wrong; but with comparatively little justice. He is no apologist of the reign of terror, but represents popular excesses in no more heinous light than they really merit. In a national outbreak, Thiers argues, they were unavoidable, and in truth were frequently provoked by impolitic opposition; and when France was threatened with invasion by combined Europe, revolutionary fury was driven, by fears and motives of self-defence, to the commission of crimes that would not have occurred if it had been left quietly to exhaust itself. This is an opinion daily gaining ground, and it is now pretty generally admitted that the coalition in 1793 chiefly occasioned all the mischief that subsequently befel France and Europe at large. Thiers's doctrine goes no farther than this, if indeed quite so far. With regard to any dogma about the revolution being predestined for the regeneration of the world, such ideas are so purely speculative as to admit neither of corroboration nor of refutation.

In order to render the work more complete, a sketch of the history of France, from the foundation of the monarchy to the commencement of the revolution, has been prefixed.

16th October, 1844.

CONTENTS.

Page

SUMMARY OF THE HISTORY OF FRANCE TO THE REIGN OF LOUIS XVI.

France before and during the dominion of the Romans, 5
Establishment of the Gothic and German nations in France, 5
Conquest of the Franks under Clovis.—Civil State of the Populations in France, 6
Successors of Clovis.—Origin of Feudalism, 7
Mayors of the Palace.—Kings without power.—Charles Martel.—Fiefs, 8
Pepin the Short, the First King of the Carlovingian race.—The Clergy, a Political order, 8
Charlemagne—The Western Roman empire restored for a time, 8
Louis the Good-natured.—Power of the Clergy.—Judicial ordeals.—The Duel.—Language, 9
Decay of the Empire under Charles the Bald.—The Feudal System, 10
Decay of the Royal power and of the Carlovingian race.—Establishment of the Normans, 10
Accession of the Race of the Capets.—Despotism of the Monks, 11
First Crusade.—Power of the Monks, 12
First Rise of the Boroughs under Louis the Fat, 12
Suger.—Conquests of Philip Augustus.—The Albigenses, 13
Reign of Louis IX.—Justice begins to displace the feudal ferocity, 13
Establishment of National Assemblies under Philip the Handsome.—The Templars.—Parliament of Paris, 14
Enfranchisement of the Peasant-Serfs.—Reverses under Philip of Valois, 15
King John.—His Captivity.—The States exercised the Sovereignty.—Jackerie, 16
Charles V.—Duguesclin.—The Royal power regains the supremacy.—The Fourteenth century, 17
Minority of Charles VI.—His Madness.—Civil War, 17
Continuation of the Civil War.—The English at Paris.—Permanent Parliament, 18
The Maid of Orleans.—Charles VII.—France reconquered, 18
Louis XI.—Oppression of the People, and humbling of the Nobles, 19
Charles VIII.—States-General.—Conquests and reverses in Italy.—Fifteenth century, 19
Louis XII.—External Wars.—Paternal Administration, 20
Francis I.—Charles V.—Luther and Calvin.—Revival of Letters, 20
Henry II.—Continuation of the Wars of Francis I., 21
Religious Factions under Francis II., 21
Charles IX.—Civil War.—St. Bartholomew, 21
The League.—The Sixteen.—Henry III., 22
End of the League.—Entry of Henry IV. into Paris.—Sixteenth century, 22
Reign of Henry IV., 22
Richelieu.—Louis XIII.—Despotism, 23
Mazarin.—Minority of Louis XIV.—The Fronde, 24
Prosperity of Louis XIV., 24
Reverses of Louis XIV.—The Seventeenth century, 25
The Regency.—Reign of Louis XV.—The Eighteenth century, 25

HISTORY OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

Preface of M. Thiers, 26

CHAPTER I.

Accession of Louis XVI.—Commencement of the Revolution, 26

CHAPTER II.

The States-General, 33

CHAPTER III.

Troubles in Paris.—Lafayette.—Mirabeau.—Proceedings of the Assembly in framing the Constitution, 49

CHAPTER IV.

Intrigues of the Court.—Attack on the Palace of Versailles.—The King and the Assembly remove to Paris.—Formation of Clubs, 60

CHAPTER V

State of European Powers.—First issue of Assignats.—Festival of the Federation.—Resignation of Necker.—Civil Oath imposed upon the Clergy, 75

CHAPTER VI.

Progress of the Emigration.—Death of Mirabeau.—Flight of the King, and his capture.—Declaration of Pilnitz.—Termination of the Constituent Assembly, 87

CHAPTER VII.

The Legislative Assembly, 98

CHAPTER VIII.

The Emigrant Princes impeached.—Formation of a Girondist ministry.—Declaration of War against Austria.—Flights of Quievrain and Tournay, 113

CHAPTER IX.

From April to the events of the 20th June, 122

CHAPTER X.

Consequences of the 20th June, and events subsequent to August 1792, 135

CHAPTER XI.

Insurrection of the 10th August, and suspension of the King, 152

CHAPTER XII.

Situation of Parties within and without the Assembly after the 10th August.—Taking of Longwy by the Prussians.—Massacres of September, and their principal circumstances, 160

CHAPTER XIII.

Campaign of the Argonne.—Victory of Valmy.—Retreat of the Allies, 176

CHAPTER XIV.

Massacres of Versailles.—Opening of the National Convention, 20th September, 1792.—Establishment of the Republic, 182

CHAPTER XV.

Military operations at the end of October 1792.—Second Contest between the Girondists and the Mountain.—Preliminary propositions for the Trial of Louis XVI., 192

CHAPTER XVI.

Military operations.—Victory of Jemappes.—Conquest of Belgium, 206

CHAPTER XVII.

Proceedings relative to the trial of Louis XVI.—His First Examination before the Convention, 213

Page

CHAPTER XVIII.

Continuation of the Trial of Louis XVI.—His Defence.—His Condemnation.—His last minutes in the prison and on the scaffold, ... 226

CHAPTER XIX.

Position of Parties after the Death of Louis XVI.—Aspect of Foreign Affairs.—Second Coalition against France.—Struggles between the Girondists and Mountaineers.—Establishment of the Extraordinary Criminal Tribunal, 236

CHAPTER XX.

Military reverses, and their consequences.—Beginning of the Troubles in La Vendee.—Revolutionary Decrees.—Arrest of the Duke of Orleans and his Family.—Treason and Flight of Dumouriez, ... 253

CHAPTER XXI.

Establishment of the Committee of Public Welfare.—Renewal of the Struggle between the two Parties in the Convention.—Impeachment of Marat.—His acquittal and triumph.—State of Opinion in the Chief Towns.—Sketch of Brittany and La Vendee, and the Causes of the Civil War, ... 261

CHAPTER XXII.

Levy of a Parisian army of 12,000 Men.—Increasing ferment amongst the Revolutionists.—Contest between the Commune and the Convention.—Principal Events of the 28th, 29th, and 30th May, 1793.—Last Struggle between the Girondists and Mountaineers.—Twenty-nine Girondists arrested.—Glance at the Progress of the Revolution, . 270

CHAPTER XXIII.

Projects of the Jacobins after the 31st May.—The Girondists excite the departments against the Convention.—Military Events on the Rhine and in the North.—Siege of Mayence by the Prussians.—Assassination of Marat by Charlotte Corday, ... 289

CHAPTER XXIV.

Distribution of Parties since the 31st May.—Discredit of Danton.—Reverses in La Vendee.—Capture of Mayence and Valenciennes.—Imminent peril of the Republic in August 1793, and measures of violence consequent thereon, 305

CHAPTER XXV.

Festival of the 10th August, and Inauguration of the Constitution of 1793.—Extraordinary measures, military, administrative, and financial, occasioned by the imminent Dangers of the Country.—Decrees of vengeance, . 318

CHAPTER XXVI.

Military operations in August and September 1793.—Toulon delivered to the English.—Defeat of the Duke of York.—Reverses in La Vendee.—Establishment of the Revolutionary Government.—Trial of Custine, and his execution, ... 327

CHAPTER XXVII.

Capture of Lyons, and terrible retribution on its inhabitants.—Victory of Watignies.—Reduction of La Vendee.—Reverses on the Rhine, ... 342

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Proscriptions at Lyons, Marseilles, and Bourdeaux.—Execution of Marie-Antoinette, the Girondists, the Duke of Orleans, Bailly, and Madame Roland.—Institution of the Republican Calendar and the Worship of Reason, . 350

CHAPTER XXIX.

Return of Danton.—Divisions in the party of the Mountain.—Abolition of the Worship of Reason.—Final Consolidation of the Revolutionary Government.—Arrest of Ronsin, Vincent, and Foreign emissaries, ... 364

CHAPTER XXX

Close of the Campaign of 1793.—Retreat of the Austrians and Prussians.—Siege and capture of Toulon.—Irruption of the Vendeans beyond the Loire.—Their defeat at Mans, and destruction at Savenay.—General retrospect as to the Campaign of 1793, ... 371

CHAPTER XXXI.

Contest between the Hebertists and Dantonists.—The Committee of Public Welfare places itself between the two parties.—Famine in Paris.—Efforts of the Hebertists.—Arrest and death of Hebert, Chaumette, &c.—Arrest, trial, and execution of Danton, Camille-Desmoulins, &c., 381

CHAPTER XXXII.

Consequences of the last condemnations against the parties opposed to the Government.—Efforts of the Committee of Public Welfare to concentrate all power in itself.—The Convention, upon a report of Robespierre, proclaims, in the name of the French people, the recognition of the Supreme Being, and the Immortality of the Soul, . 403

CHAPTER XXXIII.

State of Europe at the commencement of the year 1794.—Policy and plans of the Allies and of France.—Opening of the Campaign.—Victory of Turcoing.—Close of the War in La Vendee, and beginning of that of the Chouans.—Events in the French Colonies.—Disaster of St. Domingo.—Loss of Martinique.—Naval battle, . . 409

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Domestic state of France at the beginning of 1794.—Political persecutions.—Attempt to assassinate Robespierre and Collot d'Herbois.—Domination of Robespierre.—Festival to the Supreme Being.—Executions at Paris and elsewhere.—Drownings in the Loire.—Rupture in the Committee of Public Welfare, and retirement of Robespierre, ... 417

CHAPTER XXXV.

Operations of the army of the North towards the middle of 1794.—Capture of Ypres.—Battle of Fleurus.—Occupation of Brussels.—Last days of the Reign of Terror.—8th and 9th Thermidor; arrest and execution of Robespierre and his confederates.—Progress of the Revolution from 1789 to the 9th Thermidor, . . . 432

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Consequences of the 9th Thermidor.—Modifications of the Revolutionary Government.—Suspension of the Revolutionary Tribunal and liberation of the suspected.—The Convention divided into two parties—the Mountaineers and the Thermidorians.—State of the Finances, of Trade, and of Agriculture, after the Reign of Terror.—Numerous decrees regulating the administration.—The remains of Marat transported to the Pantheon and deposited in the place occupied by Mirabeau's, ... 445

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Resumption of military operations.—Surrender of Conde, Valenciennes, &c.—Dejection of the Allies.—Passage of the Meuse.—Occupation of the Rhine along its whole course.—Situation of the armies on the Alps and Pyrenees.—The success of the French on all points.—La Vendee and Brittany; War of the Chouans.—Royalist intrigues in France, ... 457

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Administrative reforms.—Alteration of manners.—Saloons of Paris.—Conflicts between the two parties.—Modifications in the maximum and the system of requisitions.—Attack on the Hall of the Jacobin Club, and closing thereof.—Return of the Seventy-three Deputies imprisoned after the 31st May.—Condemnation of Carrier.—Proceedings commenced against Billaud-Varrenes, Collot d'Herbois, and Barrere, ... 463

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Continuation of the War on the Rhine.—Capture of Nimeguen by the French.—Conquest of Holland by Pichegru.—Capture of Utrecht, Amsterdam, and the principal towns.—New political organization of Holland.—Victories on the Pyrenees.—Close of the Campaign of 1794.—Negotiations for peace.—State of La Vendee and Brittany.—Negotiations with the Vendean chiefs, ... 475

CHAPTER XL.

Reopening of the Theatres and learned Societies.—Establishment of Schools.—Decrees relative to Commerce, &c.—Scarcity of Provisions.—Abolition of the maximum and requisitions.—Reinstatement of the Girondist deputies.—Tumults occasioned by the dearth.—Insurrection of the 12th Germinal.—Banishment of Barrere, Collot-d'Herbois, and Billaud-Varennes.—Arrest of several mountaineer deputies.—Disarming of the Patriots, . 482

CHAPTER XLI.

Continuation of the negotiations at Basle.—Treaty of Peace with Holland; also with Prussia.—Policy of Austria and the Empire.—Peace with Tuscany.—Submission of Charette and other Vendean chiefs.—Feigned Peace of the

Page

Breton chiefs.—State of Austria and England.—Discussions in the British Parliament.—Preparations of the Coalition for a new Campaign, ... 496

CHAPTER XLII.

New Conspiracy of the Patriots.—Massacre in the Prisons of Lyons.—Administrative and Financial modifications.—Insurrection of the 1st Prairial; Events of that day and the following.—Arrest and execution of several representatives.—Disarming of the Patriots.—Measures for the retirement of Assignats, ... 507

CHAPTER XLIII.

Situation of the armies in the Year III.—First indications of Pichegru's treason.—Intrigues of the Royalists in La Vendee and Brittany.—Renewal of Hostilities in those countries.—Expedition of Quiberon.—Peace with Spain.—Passage of the Rhine by the French armies, . . 521

CHAPTER XLIV.

Machinations of the Royalist party.—Directorial Constitution, and Decrees of the 5th and 13th Fructidor.—Acceptance thereof by the Primary Assemblies.—Insurrection of the 13th Vendemiare; Defeat of the Insurgent Sections.—Dissolution of the National Convention, . 534

CHAPTER XLV.

Installation of the Legislative Body and Directory.—First measures of the Directory.—Resumption of Hostilities in Brittany and La Vendee.—Forced Loan by the Directory.—Armistice concluded on the Rhine.—Operations of the Army of Italy.—Expedition of Isle-Dieu, and departure of the English squadron.—Results of the Campaign of 1795, ... 547

CHAPTER XLVI.

Continuation of Administrative labours by the Directory.—Parties in the Legislative Body.—Discontent of the Jacobins.—Institution of the Ministry of Police.—Financial embarrassments; Creation of Mandats.—Conspiracy of Baboeuf.—Pacification of La Vendee, Deaths of Stofflet and Charette, ... 561

CHAPTER XLVII.

Campaign of 1796.—Conquest of Piedmont and Lombardy by General Bonaparte.—Battles of Montenotte and Millesimo.—Passage of the Bridge of Lodi.—Military Operations in the North.—Battles of Rastadt and Ettlingen.—The Army of Italy on the Adige and the Danube, . 572

CHAPTER XLVIII.

Internal state of France in the middle of 1796.—Financial embarrassments.—Renewal of the Family-compact with Spain, and project of Quadruple alliance.—Projected Expedition into Ireland.—Battles of Lonato and Castiglione in Italy.—Operations on the Danube; Battle of Neresheim.—March of Bonaparte on the Brenta; Battles of Roveredo, Bassano, and St. George.—Battle of Wurzburg; Retreat of Moreau and of Jourdan, . . 591

CHAPTER XLIX.

Internal and external situation of France at the commencement of the Year V.—Overtures by England towards a negotiation with the Directory.—Arrival of Lord Malmesbury at Paris.—Peace with Naples and Genoa; Fruitless negotiations with the Pope; Deposition of the Duke of Modena; Foundation of the Cispadan Republic.—New efforts of the Austrians in Italy; Perilous position of the French army; Battle of Arcole, ... 608

CHAPTER L.

Clarke at the Head-quarters of the Army of Italy.—Rupture of the negotiations with the British Cabinet.—Expedition to Ireland.—Administrative labours of the Directory during the winter of the Year V.—State of the Finances.—Capitulation of Kehl.—Last attempt of Austria upon Italy.—Victories of Rivoli and La Favorita.—Fall of Mantua.—Close of the memorable Campaign of 1796, ... 617

CHAPTER LI.

Situation of the Government in the winter of the Year V. (1797.)—Characters and disputes of the Five Directors.—Club of Clichy; Intrigues of the Royalist faction.—Plot of Brottier and accomplices discovered.—Elections of the Year V.—Glance at the situation of Foreign Powers at the opening of the Campaign of 1797, . . . 627

CHAPTER LII.

State of the French armies at the opening of [illegible] of 1797.—March of Bonaparte against the Ro[illegible]—Treaty of Tolentino with the Pope.—Fre[illegible] against the Austrians.—Passage of the Tag[illegible] Battle of Tarwis.—Passage of the Julian Alps, and march on Vienna.—Preliminaries of Peace signed with Austria at Leoben.—Passage of the Rhine.—Perfidy of the Venetians.—Massacre of Verona.—Fall of the Republic of Venice, ... 635

CHAPTER LIII.

Bonaparte's position with regard to the Directory.—Embarrassing situation of England after the preliminaries of Peace with Austria.—Renewed proposals for Peace and Conferences at Lille.—Elections of the Year V.—Contest between the Councils and Directory.—Statement of the Finances of the Year V.—Return of the Priests and Emigrants.—Intrigues of the Royalist party.—Position and strength of parties.—Disposition of the armies, ... 652

CHAPTER LIV.

Preparations of the Opposition and Clichyans against the Directory.—Hostility of the Councils.—Project of law as to the National Guard and against Political Societies.—Fete to the Army of Italy.—Negotiations for Peace with the Emperor and England.—Complaint of the Councils regarding the march of troops.—Divisions in the party of the Opposition.—Definitive plan of the Directory against the majority of the Councils.—Coup d'etat of the 18th Fructidor.—Invasion of the two Councils by an armed force.—Banishment of Fifty-three Deputies, two Directors, and other Citizens.—Consequences of this Revolution, ... 666

CHAPTER LV.

Consequences of the 18th Fructidor.—Disgrace of Moreau.—Death of Hoche.—Law against the Old Nobility.—Rupture of the Conferences at Lille with England.—Negotiations at Udine.—Proceedings of Bonaparte in Italy; the Foundation of the Cisalpine Republic; the Ligurian Constitution; Establishments in the Mediterranean.—Treaty of Campo-Formio.—Return of Bonaparte to Paris; Triumphal Festival, ... 682

CHAPTER LVI.

General Bonaparte at Paris; his relations with the Directory.—Project of an Invasion of England.—Congress of Rastadt.—Causes of Difficulty in the negotiations.—Revolutions in Holland, Rome, and Switzerland.—Domestic situation of France; Elections of the Year VI.; Nomination of Treilhard to the Directory.—Expedition to Egypt substituted for an Invasion of England; Preparations for that Expedition, ... 692

CHAPTER LVII.

Expedition to Egypt.—Departure from Toulon; Arrival at Malta; Reduction of that Island.—Disembarkation at Alexandria; Capture of that City.—March upon Cairo.—Battle of the Pyramids; Occupation of Cairo.—Administrative labours of Bonaparte in Egypt; Organization of the New Colony.—Battle of Aboukir; Destruction of the French fleet by the English, ... 706

CHAPTER LVIII.

Effect of the Expedition of Egypt in Europe.—Fatal Consequences of the Battle of Aboukir.—Declaration of War by the Porte.—Efforts of England to form a New Coalition.—Conferences with Austria.—Fresh commotions in Holland, Switzerland, and the Italian Republics.—Change in the Cisalpine Constitution.—Domestic situation of France. A new opposition in the Councils.—General disposition for War. Law of the Conscription.—Finances of the Year VII.—Resumption of Hostilities. Invasion of the Roman States by the Neapolitan army.—Conquest of Naples by General Championnet.—Abdication of the King of Sardinia, ... 717

CHAPTER LIX.

State of the Administration of the Republic and of the Armies at the commencement of 1799.—Military preparations.—Levy of 200,000 Conscripts.—Declaration of War against Austria.—Opening of the Campaign.—Invasion of the Grisons.—Battle of Stockach.—Retreat of Jourdan.—Military operations in Italy.—Battle of Magnano.—Retreat of Scherer.—Assassination of the French Plenipotentiaries at Rastadt.—Elections of the Year VII.—Sieyes elected a Director in place of Rewbell, . . 729

Page

CHAPTER LX.

Continuation of the Campaign of 1799; Massena combines the command of the Armies of Helvetia and the Danube, and occupies the line of the Limmat.—Arrival of Suwarrov in Italy.—Scherer transfers the command to Moreau.—Battle of Cassano.—Retreat of Moreau.—Attempt to join the Army of Naples; Battle of the Trebbia.—Coalition of all Parties against the Directory.—Revolution of the 30th Prairial, ... 741

CHAPTER LXI.

Formation of the New Directory.—Moulins and Roger-Ducos succeed Larevelliere and Merlin.—Levy of all the Classes of Conscripts.—Forced Loan of One Hundred Millions.—Fresh Military Plans.—Resumption of Operations in Italy.—Joubert General-in-Chief.—Battle of Novi and Death of Joubert.—Debarkation of the Anglo-Russians in Holland.—New Troubles in the Interior; Arrest of Eleven Journalists; Motion to declare the Country in danger, ... 750

Page

CHAPTER LXII.

Continuation of Bonaparte's operations in Egypt.—Conquest of Upper-Egypt by Desaix.—Expedition to Syria; Battle of Mount Tabor and Siege of St. Jean d'Acre.—Return to Egypt; Battle of Aboukir.—Departure of Bonaparte for France.—March of the Archduke Charles on the Rhine and of Suwarrov into Switzerland.—Victory of Zurich; Retreat of Suwarrov.—Events in Holland; Defeat and Capitulation of the Anglo-Russians.—Close of the Campaign of 1799, ... 759

CHAPTER LXIII.

Return of Bonaparte.—His debarkation at Frejus.—Excitement among all Parties on his return.—His Coalition with Sieyes to overturn the Directorial Constitution.—Preparations for and Revolution of the 18th Brumaire.—Institution of the Provisional Consulate.—Conclusion of this History, ... 767

SUMMARY OF THE HISTORY OF FRANCE TO THE REIGN OF LOUIS XVI.

FRANCE BEFORE AND DURING THE DOMINION OF THE ROMANS.

THE nations which peopled France in the remote era of its history, are known to us only from the accounts of the Romans their conquerors. There is no doubt those tribes were descended from previous conquerors, mixed with the vanquished people. Cæsar represents them as warlike, always armed, and prompt to terminate their disputes by combat; fickle, somewhat inclined to idleness, but hospitable, generous, confiding, and sincere. They were so impressed with what is called the right of the strongest (as if force were in fact a right), that they claimed to be masters of the lives of their wives and children. The Druids, their priests, and sole possessors of certain doctrines, were assured of their obedience from their credulity. Those priests supported their authority by the terror of anathemas; they were exempt from the burdens of the community, and engrossed much of its wealth. In common with many other barbarians, they sacrificed human victims. It is, nevertheless, alleged, that they upheld the dogma of a future life, and the belief in a supreme being; but it seems more probable that they merely practised the superstitions of a polytheism, or of a barbarous fetichism. The poets, or bards, executed martial songs tending to animate the combatants, and perpetuate the renown of heroes.

These tribes, whom the Romans called Gauls, and who gave themselves the name of Celts, were for the most part governed aristocratically. The military chiefs, and men of superior daring, formed what we describe in modern language by the word nobility; they held riches and power, whilst to the multitude was left nothing but slavery and misery. Gaul was a species of confederation; each tribe was governed by a richs, or king, elected by the fighting men, or nobles. These kings were far from possessing absolute power. One of them said to Cæsar, "The republic has as much authority over me, as I power over it."

Roman discipline, under the genius and fortune of Cæsar, triumphed over Gallic valour in the course of ten years. By the policy of the conqueror, divisions were sown amongst the confederated tribes, and, by a skilful use of allies and partisans, he vanquished them by means of themselves. In proportion as the Gauls were impetuous in attack, they were discouraged by repulse and overthrow. Besides, colonies had begun what conquest completed; the Gauls became Romans; new arts and manners were imparted to them, and civilisation finally bent them to the yoke. The municipal system and improved agriculture of the Romans soon rendered Gaul a flourishing province, and then despotism preyed upon it. This condition lasted for four centuries, at the end of which the Gauls were in the depth of misery, devastated by proconsuls, torn by factions, and alternating between insurrection and submission to ephemeral tyrants.

At this period, Christianity was established in the Roman empire, in the midst of those frightful ravages attendant upon the inroads of several barbarian tribes. It was a religion for the oppressed and the wearied; the Gospel—a code of philanthropy, equality, and consolation to the wretched—was spread abroad over the Gallic provinces. In 325, the Emperor Constantine decreed the public exercise of the Christian religion, which for a moment re-established order. The bishops enjoyed popularity, and despotism caressed them, to secure the obedience of the people. They were not long in gradually enfranchising themselves from all civil dominion, and the Bishop of Rome, who has since been exalted to the rank of sovereign pontiff, had thus early a spiritual supremacy and temporal influence. The civilisation, arts, and literature of the Romans, were in decay; the empire, divided and laid waste, was crumbling into ruins; discipline was relaxed; the prestige of the Roman name was at an end; ignorance and barbarism were extending their darkness over those fine provinces which had been so prosperous under the administration of those philosophic emperors, Trajan, Antoninus, and Marcus Aurelius.

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE GOTHIC AND GERMAN NATIONS IN FRANCE.

The barbarian tribes of the north of Europe, attracted by the mild climate and richness of the provinces of the empire, had made frequent incursions into them; but they had been repelled, either by force, or by treaties and subsidies. This last expedient was mischievous, but despotism, sunk in decrepitude, often employed it; and degenerate Rome even had recourse to the arms of its enemies to defend itself against foes of similar character. Legions of barbarians were subsidised to guard the frontiers. A tribe of Franks, a nation of Germany, was long entrusted with the defence of the banks of the Rhine. At length, these barbarians, having learnt from the Romans the art of fighting, were moved to turn the knowledge to their own profit; they preferred invading the empire to merely guarding it, and amidst the disorder reigning within it, they conceived the project of forming durable settlements. The Vesogoths, or Visigoths, had installed themselves in Spain and the south of France; the Burgundians had fixed themselves in the east; and the Franks in Belgium. These Franks had been in closer relation with the Romans than the rest of the barbarians. They marched in several tribes, or armies, and at the head of each was an elective chief. The monks, who have written some wretched chronicles upon those times, have preserved the names of certain of these Frank leaders, of whom our zealous monarchical historians have made kings of France. Far-mund, Chlod, Merveg, Hild-rik, were more or less powerful. The existence of the first is uncertain.

[illegible] (a. d. 450), general of Valentinian III., gained [illegible] over the second, vanquished several [illegible] re-established, for a fleeting [illegible] the Roman [illegible]ity in the Gauls, except in Armorica (now [illegible]), which had declared itself independent. [illegible] that time (451), the cloud of Tartars which Attila, styled the scourge of God, was leading to the pillage of the world, fell in his progress on the Gauls. Aëtius made peace with the other enemies of the empire, joined his army to that of the Visigoths, and conquered Attila in the plains of Châlons in Champagne. Without the occurrence of that great victory, it is possible the race of the Gauls might have been at the present day mingled with that of the Huns.

At that period (459), the son of Merveg or Meroveus, whom we name Childeric, commanded the Franks, established at Tournay. His subjects deposed him because he seduced their daughters. It would appear that this right of the Franks was afterwards held to have fallen into disuse; but the fact itself is worthy of notice, because it proves that the Franks were accustomed to depose their kings. They chose in his place the leader of the Roman militia, Ægidius. But a Roman patrician, his enemy, having excited against him the Visigoths, and even the tribe of Ripuarian Franks, he formed an alliance with Childeric, and they conjointly overcame the Visigoths at Orleans, in 463. Childeric being an excellent warrior, recovered the favour of his Franks. He resided at Tournay, and made few incursions into Gaul. When he died (480), he left his son, a boy of sixteen, at the head of his tribe, which was called Salic. I have not touched upon all the events which the history of the Gauls presents at this epoch; even were space abundant, they are uninteresting; we have relations of numerous battles and alliances by turns between the Romans, the Franks, the Visigoths, and other barbarians; of ambitious generals, raised by the intrigues of the imperial court, speedily overthrowing their imbecile masters, and occasionally stimulating irruptions of the barbarians, when such a course was suitable to their designs. The empire of the west had come to a close during that era; the Saxons occupied Anjou and Maine; the Burgundians the country of the Sequani; the Visigoths the south as far as the Loire; the Allemanni and the Franks disputed the possession of the north; the Romans or Gauls preserved the rest; and the Armorici were independent.

CONQUEST OF THE FRANKS UNDER CLOVIS.—CIVIL STATE OF THE POPULATIONS IN FRANCE.

(A.D. 481.) The son of Hildrick was Hlodwech or Chlodovech; we call him Clovis, and this name appears to have a common origin with that of Illudvick or Louis. His territory was confined, and he had for neighbours different tribes of Franks. He was ambitious, and had all the talents of a conqueror. He conceived the project of rendering himself master of all Gaul. Having united under his standard another Frankish tribe, his first conquest was over Syagrius (486), the son of Ægidius, who governed the Gallo-Romans of Soissons, whom, having forced to surrender himself, he decapitated. Clovis subsequently allied himself with the Ripuarian Franks, and still more increased his power and influence in the Gauls by marrying Clotilda (493), the daughter of a king of the Burgundians. This princess was a Christian, and by espousing her, Clovis proclaimed himself the protector of all the Christians in Gaul, who composed the greatest part of the population, and at the same time secured their support in return. He soon had occasion for recourse to it; formidable competitors for dominion presented themselves in the Allemanni, whose army was composed of different hordes of German devastators. In conjunction with the Ripuarians, he gave them battle at Tolbiac (496), near Cologne, and routed them. The chronicler Gregory, in relating this victory, mentions a circumstance too much resembling the Labarum of Constantine, to induce me to consider it any thing but a fable. It is possible, however, that in the uncertainty of the battle, the Frank king publicly vowed to become a Christian, as a means of animating the courage of the numerous soldiers of that religion serving in his army. The bishop Remigius, or Remi, baptised him, it is stated, at Rheims, together with a part of his army; but the similarity of the name with that of the city throws an air of suspicion over the relation. The history of these times is thickly strewed with falsehoods and miracles.

The Romans had frequently decorated the barbarian princes with their titles of dignity, in order to gain them by flattering their vanity. Clovis had the title of master of the Roman militia; after the defeat of Ægidius, he was so in substance. His conversion drew all the orthodox Romans under his sway. The kings of the Visigoths were also Christians, but Arians, that is to say, they disbelieved the divinity of Jesus. The confederated Armorici, against whom Clovis had long waged war, and one of whose cities, Paris, he had taken in 494, were reduced to peace. The Visigoths and Burgundians alone remained for him to conquer, and he began with the latter. Clotilda herself excited him to the attack, to gratify her revenge against Gondeband, who had murdered her father. Clovis, who seldom entered upon an important enterprise without an ally, proposed to share the conquest with the powerful Theodoric, then reigning over the Goths, and endeavouring to restore the Roman civilisation in Italy; but Clovis achieved their subjugation without him (500), which did not prevent Theodoric taking possession of his stipulated portion. The defeat of Gondeband had been mainly owing to the defection of the Christians, which convinced that chief of the necessity of yielding to the predominant opinion; and having declared himself a Christian, Clovis replaced him on the throne as his tributary. This moderation was doubtless caused by the jealousy of Theodoric at the aggrandisement of Clovis, which likewise operated in delaying the subjugation of the Visigoths. However, their king Alaric having incurred the hatred of his subjects, Clovis seized the occasion, coalesced with Gondeband, and overcame the army of Alaric at Vouille, near Poitiers (A. D. 505). The consequence of that victory was the conquest of almost the whole of the south of Gaul, which received at a later date the name of France from its conquerors. Clovis returned in triumph to Tours (510), and made offerings at the tomb of St Martin. He there obtained from Anastasius, Emperor of Constantinople, the dignities of Roman consul and of Augustus, which were conferred by diploma. He assumed the consular purple in the church of St Martin. The honour could add but little to his real power.

Clovis afterwards fixed his residence in Paris, which was still called Lutetia, the principal abode in the city of the Parisians, and which had been occupied by the Cæsar Julian, when he administered the Gauls. To remove all fears of rivalry, Clovis caused the chiefs of the different tribes of Franks to be destroyed, and procured his own election in their stead. He died at Paris in 511. It will be observed that he resembled Constantine in more than one particular. Equally cruel and ambitious, he likewise knew how to make religion subservient to his designs. Charlemagne was aware of the same secret, as well as divers other spoliators.

The condition of the populations inhabiting France at this epoch, is an interesting subject of inquiry. The Franks were divided into the free and the servile; but the slavery of the latter was not so personal as amongst the Romans. They were governed by the Salic law, framed by Clovis for his own tribe, or by that of the Ripuarians. The free men assembled every year in the Field of Mars, and there made laws. They elected their kings, but generally nominated the eldest son of him whom they were to replace. The Burgundians, ruled by the law of Gondebaud, maintained themselves as a distinct nation even under the second race; their manners were more ferocious than those of the others. The Visigoths had for the most part passed into Spain. The Romans, or Gauls, preserved their civil rights, so far as was consistent with a state of conquest. As the clerks or ecclesiastics belonged to that nation, through them it retained a portion of influence. Religion was the only check that could be offered to brute force, and it is melancholy that it was so flagrantly abused at a subsequent period. But Christianity then preserved something of its primitive purity, and the simple faith of the barbarians rendered it a salutary instrument of peace and harmony. The bishops were respected from their exemplary manners, and they beneficently interposed between the conquerors and the subject populations. When a Frank assumed the priesthood, his long hair, which distinguished the free men of his nation, was shorn, and he was held to have become a Roman, or a man of letters. It is true that less was paid for the murder of a Roman than of a Frank; but it could not be otherwise in a code of conquerors who exacted pecuniary penalties for homicide proportioned to the importance of the deceased. On the other hand, the Romans were judged by their own tribunals, and when a cause was at issue between a Roman and a Frank, a tribunal was formed drawn equally from the two nations. The Latin language, though infinitely degenerated, had a marked predominance, and was used in the public acts of the Franks; furthermore, the Franks formed alliances with the Romans. A glance at the history of those times, in which not a single insurrection of the Gaulo-Romans against the Franks is noted, but in which, on the contrary, the ascendancy of the bishops in maintaining a degree of equality or union between the two races is distinctly to be traced, is sufficient to disprove the opinion of those who hold that the whole Gallic nation was reduced to slavery. We certainly cannot wholly adopt the deductions which an ingenious critic has drawn from the consulate of Clovis, when he perceives in that Frankish monarch a veritable inheritor of the Roman authority and magistracy, but we must deplore the passion with which a great man disputes that opinion, in order to sustain his pretended rights of conquest. Montesquieu, exalting the prerogatives of the Franks, and degrading the condition of the Gauls, because he had the inexpressible weakness to consider himself descended in a direct line from the former, shows us how aristocratic vanity can lead genius astray. But what matters it to the French of the present day whether they can trace a Frank or Gallic ancestry? What conclusion can be now drawn from the slavery of the whole Gallic people, even were the fact undoubted? Is not the eternal charter of the rights of man and the citizen in full force?

SUCCESSORS OF CLOVIS.—ORIGIN OF FEUDALISM.

The conquerors scattered through the Gauls did not assemble to name a successor to Clovis; his four sons divided his dominions amongst them. Similar partitions were frequently renewed, and hence great confusion arises in the history of the era. Little advantage can be derived from encumbering the memory with the names of a crowd of obscure kings who resided at Orleans, Metz, Soissons, or Paris, or with the wars which they carried on for what is called their inheritances. The annals of that age are but a tissue of barbarities, assassinations, and inglorious battles; no reign occurs illustrated by [illegible] political influences. The [illegible] desolation and disorder. A[illegible] completely subdued the B[illegible] wards drove the Goths fro[illegible] the year 537, the Empero[illegible] Frank kings the rights of t[illegible] provinces. Clotaire, who at [illegible] Soissons, was master of the whole [illegible] Clovis at the period of his death. His children made a partition, holding Paris in common. Their queens, Fredegonde and Brunehaut, excited perpetual wars between the brothers. The first was a prodigy of boldness, wickedness, and ability; she gained battles in person: the latter suffered a dreadful death, if we must believe chronicles full of falsehoods and contradictions. Dagobert was a prodigal king (A. D. 613), and overwhelmed France with imposts, in order to found monasteries and reward mistresses. Although a popular ballad styles him a good king, the massacre of 15,000 Bulgarians who had sought an asylum in his kingdom, and to whom he had given permission to pass the winter within it, is not significant of his humanity. But the monks made him a saint notwithstanding. Eloi, his treasurer and jeweller, administered the finances with the sole view of promoting pious foundations.

This period of history offers little interesting; but we must revert to it when we would learn the commencement of the feudal system which weighed for so long a time on France. It was then that hydra of a hundred heads was born, which was to devour the French people.

What was the tenure of the lands which fell to the Franks after their conquest, or which were given to them by the kings? This is a difficulty upon which critics have been unable to agree. What sort of lands were those called salic, and which, being granted with the burden of military service, could not pass by inheritance to females (whence came the salic law which excludes women from the throne)? The fact is, that the kings, after the example of the Romans, gave lands, or military benefices, at first for a certain time, subsequently for life. The great men, the leudes or fideles, who were most frequently with the kings, fought at their sides, formed their councils, and took oaths of fidelity to them, at length transmitted these concessions to their heirs. Each of them constituted what was called a seniority or lordship, names borrowed from the municipal hierarchy of the Romans, and by which the Franks designated the superiority of one estate over the neighbouring lands. Then commenced the system of feudalism, which was a sort of preposterous sovereignty vested in land, and exercised by the proprietor over the inhabitants. The seniores, or lords, became of necessity so many petty tyrants. They thenceforth exercised the rights of civil and political justice in their districts; fines and confiscations were the advantages they derived from this power. These lordships were at first few in number, but ultimately they covered Europe. Bishops and monks became lords, and soldiers got themselves nominated to bishoprics; kings, lords, and priests, united to pillage and enslave the people, but at this epoch the priests were the chief gainers. The most abject superstition possessed the minds of men, and the priests derived therefrom immense wealth.

When a king committed a flagrant crime, he was absolved by founding a monastery. When it was wished to get rid of a king, he was shut up in a cloister, and converted into a monk. However, the kings often usurped the nomination of bishops, who ought to have been elected by the people, the body of the faithful. If a layman on horseback met a priest, he was bound to dismount for the purpose of saluting him. These circumstances sufficiently characterise the age. We see that feudalism, barbarity, and clerical power, grew in concert.

MAYORS OF THE PALACE.—KINGS WITHOUT POWER.—CHARLES MARTEL.—FIEFS.

The great domestic offices in the palace of the emperors of Constantinople were imitated by the barbarian kings. The last monarchs of the Merovingian race had nothing but the shadow of authority; such weak princes were sure to be governed by audacious domestics or powerful nobles. The major domus, or mayor of the palace, was the first of the household dignitaries; and the system of hereditary succession, which began to pervade all employments, having been established in this the most important of all, a new race of kings resulted from the fact. The titular kings, secluded by the mayors of the palace, were condemned to inactivity and nullity, which has caused them to be called fainéants (sluggards). We need not speak of those obscure victims who were often immolated, and endured so mournful an existence with their legitimacy. The mayor Pippin, or Pepin, a man of great ability, succeeded in uniting all France under his sway in 690. He re-established the assemblies of the Field of Mars. His son Karl was one of our greatest warriors, and on that account was surnamed Martel, that is to say, the hammer. This Charles Martel kept the nobility incessantly under arms, and was their idol. The Saracens, who had conquered Spain under the standard of the Koran, advanced into the heart of France. Charles vanquished them at Poitiers in a memorable battle (732), and drove them beyond the Pyrenees. This victory perhaps delayed the return of civilisation; the Saracens possessed several arts and a degree of enlightenment, which long rendered Spain a flourishing kingdom.

What chiefly illustrates the reign of Charles is, that to recompense his officers, and defray the expenses of perpetual wars, he seized upon the possessions of the church, which held almost the whole territory of France; on which account the monkish historians have doomed him to execration. It is believed that the origin of fiefs is to be traced to the numerous benefices granted by him, under oath of fidelity and homage, and burdened with military service. It is remarkable that the greatest feudal lords were usurpers on the patrimony of the church.

PEPIN THE SHORT, THE FIRST KING OF THE CARLOVINGIAN RACE.—THE CLERGY, A POLITICAL ORDER.

Charles Martel disdained the crown; his son Pepin judged it necessary to his political views. He gained it with great address. He rendered himself popular with the influential classes; an able warrior, he gained the army; and he caressed the clergy, to whom he restored a part of their possessions. He dispatched an embassy to the pope for his opinion on a case of conscience. "Ought the title of king to belong to an individual incapable of reigning, when the royal power is in the hands of a man who wields it advantageously?" Zachariah answered, that he who had the power ought to take the title. The legitimate king was forthwith made a monk, and no more spoken of. Pepin was the first who conceived the idea of having royalty sanctioned by the ceremonies of the church; he had himself anointed or consecrated by a prelate (755). Thus, the coronation of kings was introduced into France by an usurper.

The reign of Pepin was sufficiently glorious. He drove the Saracens from the south, and rendered himself potent in Germany. He submitted all important affairs and the making of laws to those national assemblies, which were based on the principle that the law is made by the consent of the people, and promulgated by the king. The usurper was an especial favourite with the priests; the pope called him a second Moses, a second David. It was doubtless to reward the clergy for their submission, that Pepin resolved to introduce them as a separate political order into the national assemblies. The fact is important in itself, independently of its being peculiar to French history.*

CHARLEMAGNE.—THE WESTERN ROMAN EMPIRE RESTORED FOR A TIME.

A man endowed with great energy of character, and wielding powerful means of action, may found a new political order, but he will effect nothing durable, unless the people are disposed to second his exertions, and unless his projects are the expression of the general desire.

Pepin divided the kingdom between his two sons (768); one of them died prematurely, and the other, whom we call Charlemagne, reigned alone. The King of the Lombards, who possessed all the north of Italy, was a potent monarch at this period; having offered his daughter to Charlemagne, that prince accepted her for his bride, previously repudiating the wife he already had, in spite of the pope. In a short time he likewise dismissed his Lombard queen, and taking part against her father in favour of the people of Rome, his former enemies, he dethroned him (774), after having taken Pavia, his capital. Pope Adrian then placed on the head of Charlemagne the iron crown of the Lombards. Thus king of the Romans, Charles directed his power to subjugate a poor and valiant nation, whose only crime was hatred of dependence. It took him thirty-three years to overcome the Saxons; force of arms not succeeding so effectually as he wished, he sent missionaries amongst them, and forced them to embrace Christianity for the purpose of oppressing them. He put thousands of them to the sword, and transported entire populations into different portions of his dominions. Vitikind, their chief, was a man illustrious for his firmness and courage. The decrees which Charlemagne directed against the Saxons, are written in characters of blood. During the same period, he attempted to push his conquests into Spain, but his armies were less fortunate against the Saracens who held that country. He was, however, successful in a yet grander project. In the beginning of the ninth century (800), he set the imperial crown upon his head at Rome. Pope Leo III. assisted him in the execution of that object, and the people of decayed Rome exclaimed, "Long live Charles, the august and benign emperor of the Romans, crowned by the hand of God!"

The idea of re-establishing the empire of the Cæsars, is rather remarkable in a successor of those barbarian kings who had united to overwhelm it.

Feeling that it behoved him first of all to revive civilisation, he founded schools for the teaching of grammar, that is to say, reading, arithmetic, and church songs. These schools could only be held in cloisters and episcopal palaces, since the priests alone were acquainted with letters. An English monk was drawn to his court, with the view of founding a literary institute. Charles, continually sweeping over Europe with his troops, was nevertheless watchful of every interest, and learnt grammar himself. He usually passed the winter and spring at Aix-la-Chapelle, and there he held his Fields of May, or plaids, in which the nobles, the prelates, and certain free men admitted by favour, discussed the capitularies which he promulgated as laws. His legislation was perhaps as conformable to the general interests as the times permitted. Montesquieu, who pronounces so brilliant and effective an eulogy on Charlemagne, is of opinion that he prevented the nobles from oppressing the clergy and the people by keeping them constantly at war. The capitularies were doubtless of great benefit at an era when so many nations, gathered into one empire, had different laws. Charlemagne loved industry and the arts, and possessed in an eminent degree those ideas of order and uniformity, without which all attempts at permanent establishments must fail. Indefatigable in his objects, he was ever present where his helping hand was needed. We can scarcely doubt he was of all men the most capable to grapple resolutely with barbarism, and yet he was unable to raise again either the empire or the civilisation of ancient Rome, because he was, in fact, the only Roman of his age, and because the nations were utterly unfit for the new civilisation, which was destined to spring up many centuries after the tomb had closed on him.

* M. Bodin must mean early French history, as the clerical order took a distinct rank in the national assemblies of all Europe at a later date, in a feudal capacity certainly at first. But in Magna Charta, the prelates and abbots are named distinctly from the magnates or nobles.

During his long reign, Charlemagne was engaged in negotiations with the court of Constantinople, received an embassy of congratulation from Haroun the Just, and presided over councils. In order to lessen the influence of the bishops, he exempted them from military service, and in return established tithes. He applied himself to the reformation of ecclesiastical discipline, and imposed curbs on the grasping spirit of the priests. He prevented the abuse of the right of sanctuary in cloisters from degenerating into impunity for crime. He enacted several sumptuary laws and regulations for currency and commerce. He established administrative assemblies in the provinces, to which certain officers resorted to superintend the due execution of the laws entrusted to the counts in conjunction with the bishops, and to collect the complaints of the people. But the system of fiefs gradually gained ground even in his time.

Charles, conqueror of the Saxons, Bavarians, and Hungarians, and master of the greatest part of known Europe, divided the empire with his children (809). He made Pepin king of Italy, and Ludwick, or Louis, king of Aquitaine. The latter alone surviving, he associated him in the government of the empire (813). He afterwards crowned his grandson Bernard king of Italy. However, the close of this great reign was saddened by gloomy presages. The pirates of Denmark and Sweden, who were then called Nordmans, or men of the north, began to devastate the French coasts. Charles determined to put them in a state of defence; he visited the ports in person, and caused vessels to be constructed (814). Death surprised him at the time he could already foresee the disasters that those rapacious barbarians would inflict on France.

Charlemagne was of an astonishing stature and strength. Historians are agreed upon his private qualities; he was sober, just, economical, and generous; simple in his tastes, and attentive to the minutest details. He administered his own domains in the same spirit as his empire, and caused even the produce of his garden to be sold. We may well ask, how could such a prince massacre thirty thousand Saxons?

LOUIS THE GOOD-NATURED. POWER OF THE CLERGY. JUDICIAL ORDEALS.—THE DUEL.—LANGUAGE.

The bonds which had been kept tight by superior force, were soon relaxed by weakness, and in a short interval the mighty edifice of Charlemagne was shaken to its foundation. Louis the Pious, or the Good-natured, had excellent private qualities and virtues; he was brave, learned, and humane; but much more was required in the successor of Charlemagne. He likewise divided the empire with his sons (A. D. 817), and associated one of them with himself. As he was incapable of securing obedience, enemies quickly arose against him. Four revolts against the feeble emperor rendered his reign one long warfare. Bernard, King of Italy, was subdued and chastised (818); the emperor, departing for once from his usual moderation, caused his eyes to be put out (he had been condemned to death); but, speedily yielding to scruples of [illegible], he [illegible] all the acts of penitence [illegible] clergy thought fit to impose [illegible]. This conduct caused [illegible] Bavaria, his second wife, [illegible] second dismemberment [illegible] her son [illegible], whereupon his other sons revolted. The emperor yielded, confessed his error, and consented to the imprisonment of the empress (830). He soon recalled her, and attempted to resume authority over his sons; they again rose, drew the pope to their party, seduced the emperor's troops from their allegiance, and deposed him (833). Lothaire placed himself on the throne. Some infamous prelates condemned the unfortunate monarch to a public penitence for all the acts of his life. He was clothed in sackcloth, gave up his arms, threw ashes on his head, and retreated into a cell. This revolting degradation moved the people in his favour. A party was formed, to which the kings of Bavaria and Aquitaine, his two other sons, overcome with remorse, united themselves. Lothaire was vanquished, but obtained his pardon, and kept his kingdom of Italy. The bishops, who had so outraged fallen greatness, were punished. However, the ambition of Judith for the aggrandisement of her son, provoked another war. The emperor subdued the rebel Louis (840), and shortly after died, overwhelmed with grief.

What tends to fix our attention upon this reign, is the part played by the church during its continuance. Charlemagne had made use of the clergy as a political instrument; Louis submitted to them as a superior power. The first made a temporal prince of the pope, in order to secure, through his gratitude and dependence, the fidelity and obedience of the people. The latter prostrated himself at the feet of those bishops of Rome who had knelt at the feet of his father. From this reign, we may date the insolent pretensions of the tiara over crowns, and that theocratic despotism which became so terrible under Innocent III. The bishops alleged themselves possessed of the only legitimate power; their riches were immense, and their lives scandalous. They even assumed the armour of men-at-war; an abbot, named Alcuin, had an army of 20,000 serfs. Louis desired to reform abuses so opposed to the precepts of the Gospel, which roused against him the rage and vengeance of the clergy. To attempt reforms in a class whose supremacy he almost fully acknowledged, was a project equally dangerous and absurd.

In this same age, the most stupid barbarism perverted justice. It was believed that God would perform a miracle rather than allow an innocent person to suffer wrong; so, as the criterion of criminality, it was necessary to plunge the arm into boiling water, to grasp hot iron, or submit to other ordeals; and if no injury resulted, an acquittal was pronounced. At other times, disputes, or crimes, were judged by the duel. The adverse parties pleaded as combatants, and accusations were to be made good by a champion. Each monastery had one to defend its interests; the lawyers of those days were gladiators. Charlemagne substituted the club for the sword in these combats, but afterwards the serfs were the only parties who used the club. The witnesses, even the judges themselves, were often obliged to fight. Religious ceremonies preceded these trials, which were derived from the Burgundians, a German nation.

The Romans had popularised the Latin language in the Gallic provinces; the Franks and other barbarians corrupted it. There resulted a dialect named Romanesque, in which the Latin predominated, but largely mixed with Celtic, Teutonic, and Gothic. After eight centuries of polishing, this language has become the modern French.

DECAY OF THE EMPIRE UNDER CHARLES THE BALD. THE FEUDAL SYSTEM.

Under Louis, the monarchy, though torn by intestine divisions, maintained itself against foreign attacks; but under his son, Charles the Bald, the whole fabric fell to pieces. He was weak and cowardly, and his reign was one continued series of calamities. After the death of their father, the three brothers still waged war against each other. The one who bore the title of emperor, was defeated by the others at the battle of Fontenay, in Burgundy, in which 100,000 men perished. The bishops, who then disposed of the crown, deposed him, and made a new partition. At this period, the Danes, or Nordmans, were a frightful scourge to France. They pillaged half the kingdom, burned Paris, and, like the emperors of degenerate Rome, Charles was reduced to offer them money to induce them to withdraw, which only served to stimulate them to fresh inroads. With every year new fleets of brigands landed on the coasts, and the king overwhelmed the people with imposts to satisfy their rapacity. In the midst of the disorder, the nobles and the bishops were engaged in a contest for power. (846.) The first prevailed, in an assembly to which the people were not admitted; the latter revenged themselves by deposing the king (858), and giving his crown to his brother, whom they afterwards excommunicated. Thus, the priests and nobles were solely occupied in disputing and dividing amongst themselves the spoils of the people, whilst the pirates were carrying fire and sword through the land. The King of Lorraine narrowly escaped being despoiled of his kingdom by excommunication (860), because he had divorced his wife. It was at this time that Baldwin, a French lord, who was likewise excommunicated for the abduction of Charles's daughter, received from that king the county of Flanders, which he transmitted to his descendants. It is necessary to explain here how a new kind of government was established, which inflicted so much misery on the human species.

At the era of the Frank conquest, the provinces were governed by Roman officers named counts, or companions of the emperor, and sometimes commands were given to dukes, or generals. The kings continued to nominate the same civil and military functionaries, who presided over the administration of justice, and commanded the provincial militia. Amidst the chaos of Charles the Bald's reign, they rendered themselves independent of the royal power, and even wrung from his weakness an hereditary property in their functions. By such means a new government was established, or rather the government was divided amongst so many members as it had employed agents, into as many monarchies as there were provinces. The king, however, was considered the supreme head; but his power was illusory—force was required to confirm it; and where force is ever necessary, it becomes a state of perpetual war. This political system was based on the principle of fidelity. The inferior was called a vassal, and the superior, suzerain or lord. The king was the vassal of no one, unless of God, as it was said, and his vassals had under them other vassals of whom they were the lords; and these subdivisions were infinite. The fief was a sort of usufruct; the lord granted it to the vassal under burden of following him in war; and in return he guaranteed him security and protection. There could be no order in such a system, except when the reciprocal obligations were religiously guarded; it was, in truth, an organised insubordination. The villeins, or rustics, were not vassals, but subjects of the lord; and when required by him, they were bound to march under his banner. In this political ladder, each grade had direct authority only over the grade immediately below it. Such is the exposition, so far as it is possible to compress into a few words what is but indifferently elucidated in huge volumes, of that grotesque political system which is known by the name of the feudal.

DECAY OF THE ROYAL POWER AND OF THE CARLOVINGIAN RACE. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE NORMANS.

The weakness of Charles was surpassed by his successors, who sank into almost complete nonentity. Their names and periods of existence are all they furnish to history. Louis the Stammerer was son to Charles the Bald (877). Louis III. and Carloman succeeded him after his death. In their time a lord erected a petty kingdom in Provence. The Stammerer left another son, named Charles, five years old. The crown was offered in 884 to Charles the Fat, who reigned in Germany with the title of emperor. The Normans, who had never ceased their depredations, laid siege to Paris. Odon, or Eudes, who was Count of Paris, made a valiant defence. After withstanding a siege of two years, the emperor marched to his relief with an army, but the Normans intimidated him, and he was fain to purchase a peace. He died amidst universal contempt, a superstitious terror of the devil having previously reduced him to madness. The Count Eudes then accepted the crown (888), as guardian of the young Charles, when he might have seized it for himself. Charles IV., called the Simple, occupied the throne on the death of Eudes in 898, after having shared it with him for a short interval. It was at this epoch that the pirates of the north established themselves in that part of France called Neustria, and which took from them the name of Normandy. Thus the descendants of the Franks, weakened by feudalism, had to submit, in their turn, to the affront their ancestors had given the Romans. The king sent to their chief, Rollo, his daughter, and an invitation to become a Christian (911). The Norman willingly testified his acquiescence, but he refused, when rendering feudal homage to the king, to kiss his foot. One of his officers who undertook that formality, performed it in such a manner that he nearly threw Charles upon his back. This scornful demeanour only excited a smile—to such a point had the feudal system reduced France. However, Rollo rendered Normandy prosperous. That former robber chief enacted the most severe laws against pillage, and his people turned their attention to agriculture.

The minister of Charles the Simple having excited the discontent of his lords, they charged the crime upon the king and dethroned him (922). Rotbert, or Robert, brother of the late King Eudes, took his place, but in a battle which the king gave him, he was slain by the royal hand. From this it appears that Charles was, at all events, not deficient in military courage. Hugh, called the White, son of Robert, gained the victory in another battle; and the king having fled for refuge to the castle of a noble, was there kept prisoner for the remainder of his days. Hugh, who had the title of Duke of France, was indifferent to that of king, and allowed it to be assumed by Raoul, Duke of Burgundy (924), whose reign was a series of intestine wars. A powerful lord had taken it into his head to make his son, a child of five years old, an archbishop, with the approbation of the pope. An eighteen years' war was the consequence, in which the bishops took a prominent part, either in levying soldiers or in fulminating excommunications. On Raoul's death, Hugh put in his place the son of Charles the Simple, Louis IV., surnamed Transmarine, because he had been educated in England (936). This young king attempted to emancipate himself from his protector, but Hugh soon taught him that a king of feudal France was a shadow. He made him prisoner, but afterwards released him.

A question of legitimate right was under discussion in Germany about this time, namely, whether the representation should go in the direct line, and a grandson thus exclude his uncles from the throne. The case was decided by a duel between two champions. The champion of the direct representation prevailed, since which time the grandson has always stood in the place of his deceased father.

Louis having died in 954, Lothaire, his son, took the crown. Hugh made no opposition, and died two years after, transmitting his power to his son Hugh Capet.* Lothaire, who had some strength of mind, recovered a portion of authority over the feudal lords. Under his reign, Lorraine, which for a hundred years was a subject of contest between the French and German monarchs, was abandoned to the Emperor Otho, who did homage for it to Lothaire, as his suzerain. (A. D. 986.) Louis V. succeeded him after his death. He reigned a year, and was the last of the Carlovingian kings. The brother of Lothaire ought to have succeeded his nephew, according to the principles of legitimacy; but Hugh Capet, being duke of France, and sufficiently powerful, had himself proclaimed king by his vassals and friends (987). The other dukes and counts, who attached very little importance to the royalty of that age, gave him no disturbance in his assumption of the regal title. They did not consider themselves the less his equals on that account.

ACCESSION OF THE RACE OF THE CAPETS.—DESPOTISM OF THE MONKS.

Hugh Capet was, as has been stated, grand-nephew of Count Eudes, who had been king. This Eudes was the son of one Robert the Strong, a man of surpassing bravery, who had been sent by Charles the Bald into Anjou to defend it against the Normans, and there met a glorious death in battle.† Hugh did not fail to have himself consecrated and crowned at Rheims; and adopting the precaution usual with men founding a new dynasty, he associated his son Robert with him, in order to secure to him the succession to the throne. The legitimate pretender endeavoured to make good his right by force of arms, but he was made prisoner at Laon, and died two years afterwards (996). Hugh closed his career at Paris, much regretted by the priests and soldiers, whom he had equally favoured; the people were held as unworthy of regard. The elevation of the Capets was owing to feudal anarchy, and with King Hugh feudalism mounted the throne. He sent one day to ask a revolted noble, "Who made thee a count?" to which the other replied, "Who made thee a king?"

Robert was a very devout and a very unfortunate prince. He was the relation of his wife in the fourth degree, and had been her godfather. Although the bishops had granted a dispensation, the pope judged the union incestuous, annulled the marriage, and suspended the prelates, who excommunicated the king, notwithstanding his regularity in chanting the services. He was thereupon abandoned by all his lords, and shunned by his domestics, who were afraid to touch him, and threw the remains of his food into the fire. He was no longer a king, nor even a man, in the eyes of his fanatical subjects. How could a regular government exist with such ideas? This same prince, after undergoing penance, allowed unfortunate people who rejected the mysteries they were unable to comprehend, to be condemned and burnt. His second wife, Constance, was a fury, who drove his two sons to revolt (1026). He had caused one of them, Henry, to be crowned. Under his disastrous reign, a frightful famine desolated the land, and the people ate human flesh.

Henry I. had to sustain a contest with the queen-mother Constance (1031), who stirred up his brother against him. He afterwards attempted to wrest Normandy from the young Duke William, with whose father he had formerly found an asylum, but he was defeated. His reign is remarkable from the universal sovereignty of the popes being solemnly proclaimed in it. Leo IX. held a council in France in spite of Henry, in which the pope was declared supreme head of the church, and France was afterwards often governed by legates. In 1059, the king wishing to have his son crowned, assembled the bishops, monks, and lords, to procure his previous election. The legates granted him their suffrage, and the permission of the pope. It is thus evident that the crown of France was almost purely elective at that period.

The state of France at this epoch claims a notice. Pure feudalism was at its height—that detestable system which weighed upon France for nearly three centuries, and reduced the human species to the last degree of misery. The whole population had become serfs or slaves. Their condition was scarcely superior to that of beasts. Every lord could strike, mutilate, and even slay his serf, with impunity. Many free men voluntarily renounced their liberty, to shroud themselves from the vexations of the lords in the ignoble but defended state of serfage. The ancient maxim, no land without a lord, proves that the nobles disregarded all rights of property, and plundered wherever they were able, for they were in fact robbers by condition. Such was the dreadful consequence of feudalism, that men were compelled to be either oppressors or oppressed. The clergy, generally at war with the lords, pillaged the people equally with the latter. Brute force or religious fear was the sole instrument of influence. Justice was out of the question, in a society where disputes were judged and injuries redressed by an appeal to arms. The use of horses for war, which had been almost unknown to the Franks, was the exclusive privilege of the nobles, as well as the bearing of arms. A lord on horseback, and cased in iron, made a whole district tremble. The serfs, who were driven by blows to war, fought on foot. Overwhelmed with compulsory labour, tolls, fines, and taxes of all sorts, imposed by the nobility or the church, degraded by seignorial rights revolting to decency and nature, their existence was the most deplorable that can be conceived, and they must have fought only with the desperate hope of escaping from their galling fetters. The people of the country were called villeins, those of the towns burghers. None in either class could produce for individual profit; all was the property of the lord, who often quartered himself upon them, and lived at discretion with his men, serjeants, and varlets. These latter were aspirants to the profession of knighthood, or of a man-at-arms.

The lords likewise fought incessantly amongst themselves; their declarations of war included all relations and allies. A family quarrel often steeped a whole province in blood for thirty years. The state of war was in truth the habitual state of all; every castle, every abbey, was a fortress and a den for plunder; 100,000 ruffians roamed over the face of the country, issuing from their strongholds and retreating to them with their booty, and rendering all France one vast field of battle. At last the carnage and devastation wearied even the ferocity of chivalry. The expedient of a council was adopted to impose on the belligerents what was called the peace of God, as that of man was not to be anticipated. The bishops ordained fasts and penances, during which humanity had a respite.

* These Hughs, counts of Paris and dukes of France, had seized upon several of the richest abbeys, and enjoyed their revenues, as the lay lords of that age had little scruple in doing. They even took the title of abbot. The surname of Capet (Cappatus) came, it is said, from the cope they wore as possessors of the Abbey of St Martin of Tours.

† Genealogists have composed many volumes on the origin of this Robert; some have asserted him a Frank, others a Gaul, a Visigoth, and a Saxon. Louis XIV. was desirous that his descent from the Franks should be established. His history may be read in the "Historical Inquiries upon Anjou," by J. F. Bodin, deputy of the Maine and Loire.

But this peace, for which the truce of God was substituted, which prohibited all fighting from Saturday evening to Monday morning, soon fell into disregard. It was a miracle that the brigands paused even for a time.

Such were the results of that monstrous feudal system, a veritable anarchy of the sword, tempered occasionally by priestly anathemas.

FIRST CRUSADE.—POWER OF THE MONKS.

(A. D. 1060.) The long reign of Philip I., son of Henry, is an era of remarkable events. William the Bastard, Duke of Normandy, passed the channel (1066) and conquered England, where he established a harsh tyranny combined with feudalism. He had the firmness to refuse homage to the pope. A joke of the French king upon the obesity of William, provoked a war, whence the long enmities between France and England are dated. Normandy and Beance were the first fields of battle. The quarrels between the emperors and the popes concerning investitures, began also at this period. The imperious and turbulent Hildebrand, as Gregory VII., originated them. He was the pontiff who issued a decree that emperors and kings were to fall at his feet, and who extended his absolute power over the church itself.

King Philip being disgusted with Bertha, his wife, got genealogists to prove that she was his relation in some remote degree, and, according to the usage of the age, dismissed her. He then abducted and espoused Bertrade, Countess of Anjou, of whom he was enamoured. Being excommunicated by Urban II. (1095), he separated himself from Bertrade, but subsequently took her back, and the greatest disorder resulted from the papal anathema upon the act. Another pope came to Poitiers to promulgate it afresh in a council, at which the nobles and bishops pelted each other with stones. The anathema declared rebellion to Philip acceptable to God. But the lords who had changed their wives, like the king, took his part. He himself, a brave and prudent prince, associated his son Louis in the government, the better to enable him to ride out the storm; but Bertrade grew jealous of his influence, and attempted to poison him. At length the bishops thought it for their interest to give the king absolution (1104), which he went to receive, by the gracious permission of the pope, in frost and with bare feet, in a council held at Paris.

In the state of brutal torpidity to which feudalism had reduced the human race, a shock was needed to arouse it, and the want was opportunely supplied by religious enthusiasm.

A pope had already conceived the idea of conquering the Holy Land—that is to say, Palestine—and a hermit was destined to realise it. Peter having returned from the pilgrimage of Jerusalem, which was then in great esteem, traversed all Europe, preaching in courts, in towns, and in councils, and succeeded in exciting a burning zeal for the holy sepulchre, and against the Mahometans who taxed pilgrims. So dismal was the condition of society, that a project so full of hazard was embraced with avidity;—the serfs to escape from slavery, the vassals to get rid of the tyranny of the suzerains, debtors to wipe off obligations by indulgences—all to gain paradise. Old men, women, children, princes, monks, lords, bishops, began their march, crying, It is the will of God! On their garments they wore a cross of red stuff, and thus they were called Crusaders. This undisciplined multitude, having Peter for their general, spread devastation upon its line of march, slaughtered all Jews, and found a grave in Hungary. A body of 30,000 men, the remnant of a regular feudal army, took Jerusalem in 1099, and made one of its leaders, Godfrey of Bouillon, king thereof. This was what is called the first crusade. These extravagances, arising from a mixture of the devout and the warlike spirit, were ultimately useful to humanity, though causing such a deluge of blood. The people were delivered from the presence of a great many lords, and these sold a part of their lands to the king, in order to defray the expenses of their expedition. Relieved from them, the royal power began to be established somewhat more firmly.

The prowess of the Norman and French knights in England and Judea possesses a tinge of the marvellous, which romancers and poets have not failed to carry to an exaggerated pitch. A handful of Norman knights likewise conquered and founded the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily. To the Crusades is attributed the use of armorial bearings, which served to distinguish the chiefs amongst themselves, and to secure their recognition by their retainers. At the same time the Arab numerals came into use, an invention somewhat more useful than armorial bearings.

During this period the ecclesiastical power was almost exclusively exercised by the Benedictine monks, who, from the reformation of Cluny in 910, had declared they owed obedience only to the pope. They were the militia of Rome at that era. The secular clergy were nearly all married. Owing to the weakness of the royal power, the election of bishops was re-established.

It was about this time that the worship of images was introduced, as likewise the usage of confession, which had formerly been restricted to ecclesiastics.

FIRST RISE OF THE BOROUGHS UNDER LOUIS THE FAT.

The domain of the kings of France did not then extend beyond fifteen or twenty leagues round Paris. Louis VI., called the Fat (1108), had, upon his accession, to fight in the district of Orleans, in Normandy, and in the Isle of France, against the barons his neighbours, formidable brigands, who robbed travellers. The reduction of one of them required him thrice to lay siege to a feudal castle. In a war against England, the advantages were divided between the French and Normans, in spite of the courage exhibited by Louis. The emperor, who was son-in-law to the King of England, took part with his relative, and marched to the invasion of France (1124). Louis summoned the great vassals of the crown, who were bound to serve under the royal standard* against a foreign enemy. They formed an army of 200,000 men, and the Germans repassed the Rhine. The French might have then overwhelmed the Anglo-Normans, but the dukes and counts, afraid of rendering the king's power too great, all betook themselves home, and left him without an army. Although Louis was very pious, he could not escape excommunication, which was pronounced against him by the Bishop of Paris. He died in 1137, after securing the coronation of his son.

The most important event of his reign, was the melioration which began to take place in the lot of the miserable people. Divers insurrections had occurred in towns possessed by the clergy or the barons within the royal domain. The king, unable or unwilling to repress the insurgents, judged it more advisable to make them useful allies. Being himself perpetually at war, and incapable of protecting them from the invasions of his neighbours, he found it expedient to give them liberty to defend themselves. They were authorised to assemble and name their own magistrates, even whilst they were forbidden to change their place of abode, or marry without the permission of the lord. They fixed their taxes, composed their militia, and, shut up within their ramparts, could breathe somewhat in peace. These little democracies, thus independent of their lords, under certain restrictions, were called boroughs (communes). They had, however, to pay for the charters by which the king granted them these privileges, but it was a mighty thing to gain them at all, for they excited infinite choler amongst the barons, bishops, and monks, who looked upon themselves as defrauded by the crown. Afterwards, several feudal suzerains followed the king's example, and, as a means of replenishing their coffers, sold liberty to the serfs in the towns of their lordships. In many places the burghers rose in arms, and established their freedom of themselves. The plebeians were thus enabled to enjoy comparative repose, and pursue industrial avocations. But liberty was restricted to the walls of the enfranchised towns; and the better to maintain it, they placed themselves as much as possible under the protection of the king, who increased his own strength by forming a close union with them. He attached them to him still more, by establishing appeals from the seignorial courts, in certain cases, to the royal judges, who defended the people against feudal oppression. In the previous century, the bishops had drawn the greater proportion of causes before the ecclesiastical tribunals, which, bad as they were, were better than those of the lords.

* It was then the Oriflamme, the banner of the Abbey of St Denis. Miraculous virtues were attributed to it, which may be deemed fabulous, as well as the holy blister, and the power which our ancestors believed possessed by the kings of France, from the time of Louis VI., of curing the evil.

SUGER.—CONQUESTS OF PHILIP AUGUSTUS.—THE ALBIGENSES.

(A. D. 1137.) Louis VII., surnamed the Young, by marrying Eleanor, heiress of Aquitaine and Poitou, enlarged the domain of the crown for a period. In a war against the Count of Champagne, he set fire to a church, by which 1300 persons were burned to death. A fanatic, called Saint Bernard, who was not without genius, having preached a second crusade, Louis was suddenly struck with remorse, and, in a paroxysm of pious zeal, he assumed the cross, together with his queen, his court, and 200,000 men. This second crusade had no better result than the devastation of the countries through which it journeyed. Still, it was useful in another sense. A foundling, named Suger, who had become abbot of St Denis, at a time when abbots were the counsellors of kings, was regent of the kingdom, and pursued the policy commenced by Louis the Fat, whose minister he had been. Suger was admirably fitted for administration, since his attention was mainly directed to the interests of the people; he rendered France as flourishing as was possible in that age. But the king, on his return, committed, contrary to his advice, the fault of divorcing his wife. She espoused Henry Plantagenet, who already possessed Anjou and Normandy, and subsequently became King of England. She carried him, as her portion, the third of France; thus, an antipathy between a man and his wife changed the extent of two kingdoms. The sons of the King of England having revolted against their father, Louis assisted them, but without advantage. After exhibiting himself simply as a devout and imprudent king, he died.

(1180.) His son, Philip II., surnamed Augustus, began his reign by a proceeding which was too much in accordance with those times of superstition and robbery to be at all surprising. The Jews were masters of the little commerce which was then carried on, since their political position forced them to habits of industry; the king expelled them from his dominions by an edict. He showed great firmness in a dispute with the Count of Flanders. He exterminated the banditti called Brabanters, and refused obedience to a legate of the pope. He defeated the King of England, who held the half of France, and took the cross, in unison with his successor Richard the Lion-hearted, to recover Jerusalem from the famous Saladin. (1189.) These two kings, however, succeeded only in taking St Jean d'Acre. On his return, Philip invaded Normandy during the absence of Richard. Having divorced his wife, he was excommunicated by the pope, and his kingdom put under interdict, that is to say, mass and the offices of religion were no longer performed, meat was forbidden to be eaten, marriages were put off, and communication by speech sternly interdicted (1200). Philip had sense enough to despise the interdict, and he seized upon the bishops' temporalities. He performed another energetic action. John Lacklands, King of England, had murdered his competitor the young Arthur. Philip caused him to be judged by his court of peers as a vassal of France, and procured a declaration that Normandy, Anjou, Touraine, &c., reverted the crown, which judgment he put in execution with an army. The French royalty, dilapidated by the feudal system, thus began to resume its strength.

A fourth crusade which took place at this period (1204), resulted in the temporary conquest of the Greek empire instead of the Holy Land. The crusaders crowned their leader Baldwin at Constantinople. A more deplorable crusade was directed against the Christians of the south of France, who were named Albigenses (1208). They were exterminated by thousands, and consumed at the stake, because they hesitated to believe in certain mysteries.

Pope Innocent III. having offered the crown of England to Philip, John, on his part, surrendered his kingdom to the pope, who thereupon became his protector. A formidable league threatened Philip. John, the Count of Flanders, and the emperor, collected 200,000 men. Philip, with 50,000, beat them in the field of Bovines (1214). A French bishop distinguished himself in that famous battle, by knocking out enemies' brains with an iron club.

In the twelfth century the human mind made various efforts to emerge from the darkness in which it lay buried. Schools began to be established in the seats of episcopacy. That of Paris soon became the most celebrated in Europe, though the instruction it gave was very imperfect. Three thousand students listened in the open air to the lectures of the logician Abelard, the lover of Heloïse, names immortalised by a passion which seems too sublime for so gross an age. Truth was then sought for, not in nature and reason, but in the absurd precepts of Aristotle; professors were not reasoners, they were only casuists. During this age chivalry was in most flourishing condition in palaces and castles, and if the people were oppressed, they had the satisfaction of suffering from the most gallant men in the world. The Troubadours were ever on the alert to sing the praises of beauty and love, opening the career of poetry to Dante and Petrarch, the fathers of modern Italian literature. Philip Augustus was the first of the French kings who kept paid troops on foot, thereby giving another blow to feudalism. The crusaders had brought a frightful malady from Asia, which covered France with lepers. As to contagious pestilences, they were in that age as common as famines. The incessant wars, interrupting cultivation, produced scarcity and mortality, and the unburied corpses tainted the air, and engendered the plague. Thus one scourge brought on another.

REIGN OF LOUIS IX.—JUSTICE BEGINS TO DISPLACE THE FEUDAL FEROCITY.

(A. D. 1223.) Louis VIII., called the Lion, overcame the King of England, who attempted to re-establish his power in France, and then made war on the Count of Toulouse, with the intention of despoiling him of his dominions, under the pretext that he regarded heretics with an indulgent eye. He was not successful in his project, and, in 1228, died, leaving his son, twelve years' old, on the throne, and his widow, Blanche of Castille, regent of the kingdom.

The young Louis, whom the church has designated Saint Louis, was in reality as excellent a prince as his times permitted. Together with personal bravery and political courage, he had the constancy of a true Christian. He twice overcame the English, who had supported a rebellious vassal in Saintonge. The pope, who had excommunicated the emperor, being driven from Rome, came to seek an asylum in France. Louis had the firmness to refuse assistance to this disturber of the public peace, who thereupon betook himself to Lyons, a town of which the archbishop was feudal lord. (1245.) However, this same king, being threatened with death, took a vow to prosecute a crusade. Neither the queen nor the bishops could alter his resolution, and Louis departed upon his expedition, which was in every sense disastrous. He was taken prisoner in Egypt, and had to pay an enormous ransom. At the death of his mother, he returned to France, and devoted himself to the administration of his kingdom. He maintained peace amongst the great vassals of the crown, as far as he was able, and often yielded to the pretensions of the kings his neighbours, rather than plunge the country into war. Never was a king with a more scrupulous conscience, or more enamoured of concord. The English barons wishing to depose their king because he infringed the great charter, Louis was chosen arbiter between them, and gave his decision for the maintenance of all liberties compatible with the royal authority.

The pope having placed the King of the Two Sicilies under interdict, offered the crown to Louis IX.'s brother, who held the county of Anjou as an appanage, reserving to himself an annual tribute. The count accepted the gift (1266), and passed into Italy with a host of volunteers, who assumed the cross because they fought in the name of the pope, and believed they were performing a work of piety in dethroning an excommunicated prince. Naples was speedily conquered, and the usurper cut off the head of the legitimate king.

France enjoyed a certain prosperity for so miserable an age, owing to the wisdom of the king, who sequestrated the temporalities of the bishops when they oppressed the people too grievously, but who, nevertheless, would have become a Franciscan monk but for the remonstrances of the queen. He still kept the cross on his garments, intending to proceed on a second crusade, which he finally determined upon in spite of his advanced age and the entreaties of his counsellors. Persuaded that he could easily convert the King of Tunis, he disembarked in Africa (1270), and after witnessing the destruction of his army under its burning sun, he himself died in miserable plight.

The reign of Louis IX. was an era of great political ameliorations. The capitularies of Charlemagne having fallen into disuse, no written laws prevailed, and the greatest confusion resulted from the various local customs which held the place of laws. Louis framed a code of establishments for that part of France directly under his sway, in which the judicial duel was abolished, and numerous improvements in the administration of justice were instituted, by which the vicious proceedings of the barons and their courts were mitigated or annulled. The family feuds, which included all the relations of the belligerents, were interdicted under penalty of forfeiture. The right of coining money, which a great number of lords had usurped, was restricted. The code of Justinian, discovered at that time, became known in France, but was proscribed by the clergy. The priests, or clerks, being the only instructed class, performed the functions of advocates, and even practised medicine. When a person died intestate, and the church was thereby baulked of the legacy, which was almost indispensable in testaments, it confiscated the whole succession, and beggared the family of the defunct. Louis's establishments abrogated this infamous abuse. This king was in truth the restorer of justice, but his religious zeal often carried him to absurd lengths. He pronounced inhuman punishments upon those who ventured to swear by the name of God, or of any of the saints. He exhibited, however, an unbroken firmness in opposing the grasping despotism of the popes; in his famous ordinance, called the Pragmatic Sanction, he asserted the maxim that the kingdom depended on God alone.

ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL ASSEMBLIES UNDER PHILIP THE HANDSOME.—THE TEMPLARS.—PARLIAMENT OF PARIS.

After the death of Louis, his son, Philip III., continued the war against the Tunisians, and granted them peace upon their paying tribute. Such was the conclusion of the last of those distant expeditions which depopulated Europe. The young king returned to France, and united to the crown the vast possessions of his uncle, the Count of Poitiers, who had died without issue. He allowed himself at first to be governed by his father's barber; but that person having excited unjust suspicions against the queen, he was convicted of treason, and hanged. The most remarkable event in this reign occurred out of France. The Sicilians, determined to throw off the oppressive yoke of Charles of Anjou, arose at the hour of vespers and massacred all the French attached to the fortunes of the new king (1282). This slaughter extended itself over the whole of Sicily. The King of Arragon then endeavoured to seize upon the island, which drew upon him a papal excommunication; a crusade was even preached against him. Philip put himself at the head of the crusaders against this Christian prince, and after taking Gironne by a tedious siege, he returned to Perpignan, and died (1285). Upon his death, two monasteries disputed the possession of his heart; rather a small matter, one would think.

Philip IV., surnamed the Handsome, his son, succeeded him. Edward I., King of England, rendered him homage for Guienne, which he acknowledged to possess as a vassal of the French crown. But disputes occurring between the two nations, Philip cited Edward to his court, and, upon contumacy, poured an army into Guienne, and reduced it (1295). War afterwards broke out with the Count of Flanders, who had made an alliance with Edward. The English were conquered, and Flanders subdued. Boniface VIII., a pope whose arrogance was quite equal to that of any of his predecessors, was the next antagonist whom Philip encountered. The cause of the quarrel was an attempt of the king to lay a slight tax upon the clergy, as he was in great distress for money, and the people were utterly incapable of supplying the incessant demands made upon them. The pope forbade the ecclesiastics to contribute the smallest coin to the necessities of the state, and Philip, in return, forbade his subjects to pay any thing to the pope. Peace was at length restored; the pope undertook to canonise Louis IX., and a trifling impost was granted him for the glory of St Peter.

However, it was not long before the insolent pretensions of the pope were renewed; a French bishop, his legate, carried his impertinence to such a pitch that the king drove him from his presence. The pope, furious at the insult, fulminated fresh bulls, and summoned the king, under the penalty of having his kingdom placed under interdict, to acknowledge himself king by the grace of the pontiff. Philip, far from being intimidated, answered with boldness; and desirous of finding support in the nation, he convoked a national assembly (1290). This is one of the most important events in the French annals. The assemblies usual in the earlier times of the monarchy had fallen into complete oblivion. Following the example of the King of England, Philip caused the deputies of the boroughs to form part of it; they were then styled the third estate. The three orders voted separately to maintain the independence of the crown; the clergy made an attempt to influence a conciliatory demeanour towards the pope, but the nobles opposed it. As to the third estate, it was overwhelmed with astonishment at its being honoured with consultation; but money being wanted, and the people the supplying source, their presence was judged necessary. An old historian of France has said on this subject something new:—"Diets are excellent expedients to governments for obtaining subsidies."

The pope replied by calling a council, in which he procured the assertion of the sovereign right as vested in the tiara. The king retorted by an assembly of nobles and bishops, in which the pope was accused of imposture and heresy. Thereupon, excommunication was thundered forth, and the crown of France offered to a prince of Austria. The pope was carried off by the French partisans, then set at liberty, and finally died in transports of rage. He had instituted the jubilee, which drew thousands of pilgrims to Rome, and vast sums from the whole of Christendom. During the course of these events, the Flemings had revolted under a weaver, and massacred the French. The Count d'Artois lost against the insurgents the battle of Courtrai, in which 20,000 Frenchmen perished. The king then marched in person, was unsuccessful, and found himself obliged to reinstate the Count of Flanders, with the reservation of certain towns. The excommunication was shortly afterwards taken off by the last pope's successor.

The process against the Templars, a religious and military order founded during the crusades, was a famous event in this reign. Philip the Handsome pursued their destruction with an inveteracy for which we cannot account, and which seemed equally participated in by the pope. They were suddenly arrested throughout the whole of France (1307); they were questioned under torture, and the rack compelled them to avow the crimes that were fixed upon them. When its anguish ceased, some of them retracted their confessions, and were accordingly consumed before slow fires (1312). The order was abolished, and the possessions given to the hospitallers, since the order of Malta. The grand-master and great officers, condemned by a papal commission, were burnt alive, all protesting their innocence, amidst the flames, to the last moment. What caused this frightful atrocity? The Templars were accused of detestable crimes, but all that we know of their offences is that they were rich, haughty, and debauched. Were those who burnt them one whit better?

Philip had overwhelmed the people with imposts, ruined credit by debasing the coin, and expelled the Jews to seize their wealth. The general discontent grew to such a height as to threaten an insurrection. Chagrin gnawed his heart, and killed him. To him are owing the convocation of the states-general, the union of Lyons to France, and the parliament being rendered stationary at Paris. Formerly it was a travelling tribunal, which followed the king, and was composed of noblemen nominated by him. As these men of the sword could neither read nor write, they associated in their judicial labours men conversant in the law, who attended them in the capacity of counsellors. By degrees, the nobles withdrew and left the lawyers to judge alone. The peers, the great territorial lords, or high domestics of the court, who were the leudes of the first race, or the barons and great vassals of pure feudalism, had right of entry to the parliament. The assembly itself was, properly speaking, the tribunal of the king. From the time of Louis IX., the parliament had cognizance of all the appeals of the kingdom. He recognised the excellent principles of justice laid down in the Roman code, created forms of legal procedure, rendered the study of law necessary, and drew to the men of letters and legal knowledge a part of the authority usurped by ignorant soldiers. It is not generally known that the Pandects of Justinian inflicted the greatest blow on feudalism.

After having gone through the thirteenth century, if we cast our eyes backwards we will find that the human species made some progress towards civilisation during its course. Under Louis IX., a library was collected. Roger Bacon, an English monk, a prodigy for that age, divined a portion of the physical sciences; he invented the camera obscura. His brutal contemporaries took him for a magician. Contemptible parodies, exhibited on scaffolds under the name of mysteries, were essays which had at least the merit of preparing the way for Racine and Molière. Theological disputes and scholastic casuistry still continued, and the Sorbonne was founded; but the burgher youth acquired ideas and habits of anti-feudal independence even amidst the disorders of a university education, and the brotherhoods, or guilds, advantageous at the period of their institution, provided it with the means, and conferred upon it the force, of political organisation. The provosts and magistrates were accustomed to resistance against arbitrary power; and the third estate, erected into a political order, began to acquire consistence, and the royal power found it useful to cultivate its alliance.

ENFRANCHISEMENT OF THE PEASANT-SERFS.—REVERSES UNDER PHILIP OF VALOIS.

The royal authority, which had made great strides under Philip the Handsome, was successively exercised by his three sons within a short period. Louis X., surnamed Hutin, condemned to death the superintendant of the finances, Enguerrand de Marigny (1314); the proof of his knavery was deficient, so he was accused of sorcery. The king afterwards repented of the iniquity of this execution. The most memorable event of this reign, was the enfranchisement of a great part of the rural serfs (1315).* The king commenced in his own domains, and the lords gradually followed his example. The preamble of the edict set forth these words—"Inasmuch as, according to the law of nature, every one ought to be born free." However, liberty was sold to the peasants in the same manner as it had been sold to the burghers. Many of them accustomed to slavery were anxious to continue it, finding that liberty in those times was not worth the price charged for it. The want of money has often caused injustice both to be committed and redressed. The Jews were recalled in 1316, in the hope of extracting enormous taxes from them.

Philip V., called the Long, who succeeded him in 1319, effected reforms in the administration. He excluded the bishops from the parliament, in which they preserved some influence. He is stated to have projected useful regulations, such as a general system of weights, measures, and currency. He disarmed the burghers, in order the more surely to suppress the right of private war. He named a captain to command the guard of the towns in the royal name; this burgher militia was a species of national guard, which is often mentioned in the wars of that age. Under his reign horrible cruelties were committed on Jews and lepers, who were charged with most absurd accusations. They were burned by hundreds, as a speedy means of securing their possessions. Foundations for persons afflicted with leprosy were very numerous, and all richly endowed; in consequence whereof they excited cupidity, and had their goods confiscated. When fanaticism and rapacity move in concert, no limit can be assigned to atrociousness. It was to these spoliating persecutions experienced by the Jews, that the invention of bills of exchange is owing, by means of which they could transfer their fortunes from one country to another

* There still remained, even in the reign of Louis XVI., serfs of mortmain, at St Claude in Franche-Comté, who were enfranchised by that king. They belonged to monks!

(1322.) Charles IV., called the Handsome, caused several rapacious financiers to be punished, as also some noblemen, who, although no financiers, nevertheless ruined the people. He made war on the English in Guienne. His sister was the wife of Edward II., whom she succeeded in dethroning. The famous Edward III. then assumed the English sceptre. Charles IV. having died without issue, Edward III. claimed the crown of France, as nephew, by his mother, of the last king (1328). The Salic law, which excluded females, was directly opposed to his pretensions. The peers decided that Philip of Valois, who was descended from St Louis by a younger branch, ought to be preferred.

The reign of Philip IV. was a continual chain of calamities. He first of all attempted to reduce the Flemings, who had revolted against their count under the conduct of a fishmonger. He afterwards succeeded in obtaining homage for Guienne from Edward III., who was not yet prepared for war. But a wretch, his brother-in-law, whom he had justly banished, having taken refuge in England, stimulated the king to that warfare which became so terrible to France. A fleet, stated to have been 120 vessels strong, and carrying 40,000 men, was defeated by that of England in the battle of Ecluse (1341), in which Edward himself was present. He afterwards made a descent on the coasts of Normandy, acting under the advice of another traitor, Geoffrey of Harcourt; and breaking a truce which Philip observed with too much faith, he advanced to the gates of Paris, whence he retired into Picardy, pursued by the French, who, yielding to their imprudent impetuosity, attacked him at Cressy. (1346.) The Genoese bowmen gave way, and threw the French army into disorder, which was defeated, and 30,000 men left dead on the field of battle. The success of the English was chiefly owing to their cross-bows, a weapon which the French would not use, from an excess of chivalric honour or martial pride, and therefore subsidised foreigners for that service. It is also said that the English used cannon in this combat, which was then a recent invention.

After his victory, Edward besieged Calais (1347), which surrendered after suffering the last extremes of famine. To all these reverses were added a famine and a plague, which depopulated France. The latter was general throughout Europe, and carried off, as is alleged, a fourth of the population. Discouragement paralysed the exertions of the country. Fanatics, named flagellators, scoured the fields, and scourged their bodies to the gushing of blood, as a propitiation of divine wrath. The king died (1350) a prey to chagrin, and an object of hatred to his subjects. He first established the gabelle, a tax on salt. Under his reign, disastrous as it was, Dauphiny was annexed to France, under condition that the heir-apparent should bear the name of Dauphin. During the same period, Jane of Anjou sold Avignon to the pope.

KING JOHN.—HIS CAPTIVITY.—THE STATES EXERCISED THE SOVEREIGNTY.—JACKERIE.

John, son of the preceding king, was equally impolitic, and still more unfortunate. His first act was to cut off the head of the Count d'Eu, his constable, without any one knowing why. He was afterwards exposed to the enmity of a wicked and powerful prince, Charles the Bad, King of Navarre, who inflicted much injury on his dominions. Edward III. likewise carried the war into France again, when John convoked the states-general in order to raise subsidies (1355). This is one of the most remarkable eras in French history, and deserves to be specially noted.

Philip the Handsome had succeeded in rendering the royal power in some degree absolute; he had emancipated it from the thraldom of the pope, and strengthened it by summoning the states-general, which had then no idea of their rights. The rivalry existing amongst the three orders could not fail to secure the preponderance to the king, even had the states imagined themselves invested with any more formidable character than that of a council appointed to register royal decrees. Now they prepared to take a very different attitude. We will not speak here of the states of Langued'oc, convoked in the south of France, as those of the north, or of Langued'oil, have had the chief influence on affairs. The states of 1355 acted upon the principle that the king had no right to exact any tax without the consent of the nation as represented by them. They determined even to superintend their collection and disposition, and sent deputies into the different balliwicks charged with the perception. They named a permanent commission, composed of three members from each order, to watch over the king's administration during the recess of the sessions. They took the greatest precautions to ensure the advantageous employment of any surplus funds, and to confine the king within a limited expenditure. They finally decreed a large levy of troops, and called the burgher militias into the field.

The Prince of Wales, generally called the Black Prince, the son of Edward III., and the great hero of his age, led a desolating horde into France. Being intrenched in an advantageous position near Poitiers with 8000 men, and attacked by John at the head of 60,000, he completely overthrew the French, and took the king prisoner. Charles the Dauphin thereupon convoked the states, which once more exhibited a knowledge of their rights. The three orders were unanimous in their discontent, and they ordered an inquiry to be made into the causes of popular complaint. A bishop named Lecocq, and Marcel, the provost of the trades, presided over this commission of inquiry. Subsidies were granted only upon conditions; the ministers and counsellors were to be displaced for deputies taken from the three orders. The court, indignant at this spirit, attempted to collect taxes without the sanction of the states, but the people refused to pay them. The states-general were therefore again convoked (1356), and it was found necessary to submit to the prescribed conditions.

The dauphin put in force a means of gaining money that had often been used by his predecessors, namely, the adulteration of the coin, an expedient pregnant with ruin. The people of Paris rose in insurrection, under the conduct of Marcel. The King of Navarre, who had been imprisoned by the king, escaped, and came to support the revolt. The people were alternately harangued by him, the dauphin, and Marcel. The last enjoyed the greatest degree of popularity; he was a patriot, and born in the burgher rank. Charles the Bad was actuated simply by a turbulent ambition, and was used as a mere instrument against the court. Paris was a perfect hotbed of democracy. The insurgents adopted as a rallying sign a red and blue cap. Marcel began even thus early to form a federation between the other towns of France and the capital, when the dauphin, who had taken the title of regent, escaped to Compiègne, and convoked the states-general (1358).

France was in a state of the most deplorable disorder. Taking advantage of the general disorganisation, the nobility attempted to reduce the peasants under their former yoke of iron, whilst they, on their part, arming themselves with pitchforks and clubs, pillaged the castles and massacred the nobles, who, collecting in armed bands, revenged themselves upon the undisciplined multitude. This war of extermination was called Jackerie, from the jacks or jackets worn by the peasants.

From the height of anarchy, and the excesses of civil war, there is generally but one step to absolute power, for all grow weary of evil, and readily concede any thing for peace and order. The states of Compiègne proved the truth of the remark. It is true that they granted imposts under the titles of aids and free gifts, but they annulled all that the preceding states had done, as the work of the seditious and traitorous. Several of the deputies were condemned to death. Paris was blockaded and taken by surrender. Marcel fell by assassination, and the regent made his entry into the capital.

A treaty with England restored liberty to John (1360), who agreed to cede the half of his kingdom, and to pay four millions of gold crowns; but the ransom was afterwards reduced to a third of France, and three millions of crowns. Being unable to raise this enormous sum, which would have completely drained the country, John returned to London, where he died. He was a man of scrupulous honour, and was accustomed to say, that if good faith were banished from other quarters, it should find a sanctuary in the hearts of kings. This phrase is often repeated, and kings would do well to be sincerely impressed with its excellence. Having acquired Burgundy by inheritance, John gave it as an appanage to one of his sons, and thus commenced the famous house of Burgundy. This evil system of appanages only tended to divide and weaken France, which was not so strong as to render its further reduction at all necessary.

CHARLES V.—DUGUESCLIN.—THE ROYAL POWER REGAINS THE SUPREMACY.—THE FOURTEENTH CENTURY.

When Charles V. mounted the throne (1364) the government was almost wholly to reconstruct: he was prudent and able, knowing how to select and employ men of capacity, and succeeded in repairing much of the general evil. Charles the Bad still continued his intrigues and injuries, and an excellent warrior, Duguesclin, was sent against him and repulsed him. The war in the meanwhile raged with unabated fury in Bretagne. Montfort, supported by the English, having gained a victory in which Duguesclin was taken prisoner, terms of peace were agreed upon. At this era, the class of men pursuing the profession of arms was a complete scourge to the country. When troops were disbanded, it seemed as if so many wild beasts had been unchained, and a new war was necessary to reduce them; so that peace itself became the cause of fresh bloodshed and confusion. A campaign in Spain opportunely offering, Duguesclin was sent there at the head of troops, which were re-engaged to rid France of their baneful presence. However, he was again defeated and made prisoner by the redoubtable Black Prince.

Charles V. was once more engaged in war with the English, which, under the generalship of Duguesclin, became advantageous for him. 1400 enclosed towns and 3000 fortresses were captured in Aquitaine alone. Fresh treasons on the part of the King of Navarre, and a long disastrous war undertaken against the Duke of Brittany, who was ably sustained by his own subjects and the English, occupied the close of Charles V.'s reign. The schism of the West occurred in his time. When the papal see was transferred from Avignon to Rome, two and even three popes were elected at the same time, and the kings sided with the one or the other as they found it best for themselves. Numberless were the wranglings, the combats, and the scandals, wherewith Christianity was overwhelmed.

Charles, remembering the sturdy spirit of the states-general, never convoked them when he became king. He contented himself with holding beds of justice in the parliament, in which he caused his decrees to be approved of, after a display of asking counsel. His administration, however, as it is said, was paternal, and historians have surnamed him the Wise. He was more engaged in strengthening the royal authority than securing to his people the enjoyment of liberty, and therefore philosophers have passed upon him many severe strictures. But, after all, the best of kings are prone to aggrandise their power, the most reasonable of aristocrats desire peculiar privileges, or a superiority of influence in the state, and the most moral of populations are drawn into excesses, when they endeavour to repair by force the hardships of the social state, and the inequalities of fortune: good laws alone are above corruption and the influence of passions.

In this fourteenth century, the human mind made an insensible progress. Whilst the capuchins were disputing, and even fighting, with each other, as to the comparative sanctity of round or pointed hoods, a Neapolitan invented the compass. Charles V. was a friend to learning; he collected 900 volumes, treating, however, upon astrology in general. The number of universities was increased, but theology and logic were the only subjects in repute. Sallust, Cæsar, and some other Latin works, preserved in the monasteries, were translated into French; the only service that the monks have rendered the human race, is having been its librarians and transcribers.

MINORITY OF CHARLES VI.—HIS MADNESS.—CIVIL WAR.

(A. D. 1380.) The reign of Charles VI. was one of the most disastrous in the French annals. On his accession he was under age, and his uncles disputed the regency. The Duke of Anjou, who obtained it, took advantage of his position to enrich himself with the spoils of the nation. He robbed the treasury of its last coin the moment the king reached his majority. The Parisians refused to pay any taxes, and the states-general were convoked as a last resource. They once more proclaimed the principle that taxes were illegal without the consent of the states. They granted certain subsidies, and the court endeavoured to establish others arbitrarily, but the people rose and massacred the officers of revenue. Troops were marched to Paris, which escaped sacking by paying a heavy contribution. The king, returning from Flanders, entered Paris at the head of his army (1385), caused the richest burghers to be arrested, and some of them executed, amongst whom is mentioned a venerable magistrate upwards of seventy years old; he then declared that all deserved death, but he would limit his vengeance to the exaction of an immense ransom. He subsequently placed the Constable Clisson at the head of affairs, to enable him the better to shake off the yoke of his two uncles. The Duke of Bourbon (a descendant of Louis IX. by a junior line), returning, at this time, from an expedition more brilliant than useful he had made in Africa against the Mahometans, excited the imagination of the king, who took up the chimerical idea of a crusade, but got no farther than Italy, where he went to assist one of the two popes.

In 1392, the Baron of Craon, one of the most formidable ruffians who then enjoyed impunity in France, assassinated Clisson and fled into Brittany, where he was received by the duke. The king, being unable to procure his surrender, marched at the head of an army to take him by force. As he was passing through the forest of Mans, a man clothed in white, and of a hideous aspect, suddenly sprang from a thicket, and seizing his horse's head, exclaimed: "Advance no farther; thou art betrayed, oh king!" Such an incident was scarcely needed to turn so weak a brain as Charles VI.'s. He became raging mad. Having recovered some time afterwards, he relapsed into derangement at the end of a masked ball, in which his clothes caught fire. It was in vain that a pretended magician came forth to cure him; he remained demented, with lucid intervals. This malady of the king was the signal for disorders of the most frightful description. A truce was fortunately concluded with the English (1395), and Richard II. married the daughter of Charles VI.

In the midst of recriminations and executions, the Duke of Orleans was named lieutenant-general of the kingdom, which excited the jealousy and anger of John the Fearless, Duke of Burgundy. Open war was declared between these two princes (1404), and two furious parties were formed. John advanced with an army against Paris; the regent and the queen fled, and the conqueror got possession of the dauphin (1407). However, the two foes made afterwards a show of reconciliation. They took the communion together, and slept in the same bed; but the regent was suddenly fallen upon by assassins, and sacrificed. The perfidious John, who was unable to deny his crime, departed from Paris, but soon returned to it with his army, and seized upon the government, which he exercised despotically, holding the king and court in complete subjection.

The young Duke of Orleans, aided by the Count d'Armagnac, raised his standard to avenge his father's murder. War raged in almost every quarter of France, the two parties being called respectively Armagnacs and Burgundians (1411). The king, in an interval of reason, took part against John the Fearless, marched against him with an army, and put his name to several accommodations no sooner signed than broken. Yet greater calamities were in store for France, the recital of which will require a few words of introduction.

CONTINUATION OF THE CIVIL WAR.—THE ENGLISH AT PARIS.—PERMANENT PARLIAMENT.

It is evident that France, at the period under review, was solely a field for the ambition of the nobles; that is to say, for factions. This oligarchical anarchy lasted during the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries, and certain characteristics of this new disorder are worthy of observation. In the age of pure feudalism, the nobles were independent sovereigns, who despoiled each other of their possessions; but since the crown had regained pre-eminence, the great men, for the most part princes of the blood, disputed with each other for the exercise of the royal authority, and for the wealth of the whole nation. Nothing so effectually demoralises a people, as factions attached to princes; it speedily loses sight of its own interests to serve passions which it stupidly participates; the ruffians alone are the gainers, the mass of the people dupes and victims; like an inert body, struck by the hammer and repelled by the anvil, it is tossed to and fro between the contending parties, and is the invariable prey of the conquerors for the hour. Thus exclusively occupied with a civil war without a definable object, the French cast not a thought upon the states-general, an institution that might have been rendered so powerful a lever of regeneration. They soon experienced one of the inevitable results of court factions, the yoke of the foreigner.

The King of England, Henry V., perceived the circumstances auspicious for conquest (1415). Disembarking with a small army, he crossed the Somme; the French, greatly superior in number, gave him battle at Agincourt, in a disadvantageous position, and were defeated; but the victory was a sterile honour for the moment, and the English, too weak in force, ... the channel. The factions arose with in... rancour. D'Armagnac treated with Henry V., ...wledging him as King of France. The queen turned to the party of John the Fearless, who delivered her out of a prison in which the king had immured her, on account of her debaucheries. John was introduced into Paris, his enemies there were put to the sword,* and the executioner became his familiar associate. At the same time, Henry V. seized upon Normandy.

The dauphin had an interview with John on the bridge of Montereau, and the latter was assassinated in his turn (1419). The queen united with John's son in opposition to the dauphin; Henry V. came to meet them at Troyes, and was there proclaimed regent of the kingdom. He made his entry into Paris with great magnificence, married the daughter of Charles VI., and sent a marshal of France to the Bastille for looking him in the face. He died shortly after (1422), and was followed to the grave by Charles VI.

The schism in the church still continued, there being always two popes. The Council of Constance deposed one of them, and terminated the quarrel. Before separating, the fathers burnt John Huss and Jerome of Prague, who had been audacious enough to interpret the Gospel for themselves, and to preach reformation. They were the precursors of Luther.

The parliament, which had been formerly named for a year, became permanent, and the counsellors enjoyed the right of presenting new members to the king for appointment. Thence began the influence of that body, which ensured respect by its manners and integrity. We shall see that it subsequently abused its power.

THE MAID OF ORLEANS.—CHARLES VII.—FRANCE RECONQUERED.

The dauphin (Charles VII.), proscribed by the queen and Henry V., had, in his quality of regent, transferred the parliament of Paris to Poitiers. The marshal de Lafayette had gained for him the battle of Baugé over the English. Upon the death of the two kings, his party began to raise its head. The Duke of Bedford, on his part, had himself proclaimed regent of France at Paris for Henry VI., an infant in the cradle. The English possessed more than half of the kingdom, and ranked, as their allies, the powerful Duke of Burgundy and the Duke of Bretagne. Charles VII. was brave, but weak and voluptuous; he allowed himself to be governed by his companions in debauchery, and by his mistresses. He at first took a few towns, but lost the battle of Verneuil (1424). Dunois, Lahire, and La Tremouille, were valiant knights, but sad generals. The cause was in its last throes; Orleans was besieged, and on the point of surrendering, when a young peasant girl, gifted with an exalted imagination, came forward and announced herself as destined by heaven to save France. Her pretensions were laughed at in the first instance, but were subsequently admitted. She spoke as one inspired, and succeeded in communicating her own enthusiasm. Dressed in a coat of mail, and bearing a banner in her hand, she marched at the head of the army, and raised the siege. Persuaded that her mission was to crown the king at Rheims, she traversed with him eighty leagues of hostile country, and accomplished her astonishing enterprise. Upon this occasion, religious enthusiasm was productive of some good. But fortune abandoned the heroine; wounded and captured by the English, who wreaked a disgraceful revenge upon her, she was condemned as a sorceress by infamous judges, and burnt at Rouen (1431). Thus perished Joan of Arc, whose only crime was having saved her country.†

* Villaret reports that 3500 persons were massacred in three days in the prisons; the streets and the courts of the palace were flooded with blood. 2000 nobles, following the profession of arms, superintended these septembrizers in their labours, and their lead... the Luxembourgs, the Harcourts, the Chevreuses, &c., enriched themselves with the spoils of their victims.

† The tribunal that condemned her was composed of nine doctors ... the Sorbonne, and of thirty-five abbots and monks, under the presidency of Martin, Vicar of the Inquisition, and Cauchon, Bishop of Beauvais.

In the mean time, Henry VI. was crowned at Paris, and Charles VII. consumed his feeble resources in festivals; as Lahire said to him, "No one could lose his kingdom with more gaiety." But events took a new aspect, and his character rose to a level with them. The Duke of Burgundy, weary of Bedford's despotism, and ashamed of his alliance with a foreigner against his own relation, entered into a treaty with Charles VII. (1435.) Paris opened a gate to him, the English evacuated the capital, and the king made his solemn entry therein. Agnes Sorel, his mistress, stimulated his mind to activity; he signalised himself at Montereau, Normandy was conquered, and the English ultimately driven out of France (1451). The nation had recovered its energy and force in union. The king devoted himself to the re-establishment of a system of order in the government during the remainder of his reign, which was only disturbed by the revolt of the dauphin, a wicked prince, who was afterwards known as Louis XI. The king died in 1461, oppressed with disquiet and chagrin. His mother, the infamous Isabel, had died in misery at Paris during the occupation of the English.

In the course of this reign, a permanent body of cavalry, or gendarmerie, was established, as also one of foot archers, paid by a tax levied without consent of the states, which were quite forgotten. The council of Basle had limited the power of the popes in 1431, and an assembly of the clergy, held at Bourges, framed in the same spirit the famous Pragmatic Sanction, the charter of the liberties of the Gallican church. It abolished reserves and first fruits, re-established the election of bishops, and prevented the abuse of appeals to the pope. It was registered by the parliament.

LOUIS XI.—OPPRESSION OF THE PEOPLE, AND HUMBLING OF THE NOBLES.

Louis XI., the prince of dissemblers, began his reign by falling into a snare of the pope, who obtained from him the abolition of the Pragmatic Sanction. That law, however, so odious to the papal court, remained in partial execution. The king early exhibited his intention of humbling the power of the nobles, the better, doubtless, to oppress the people when relieved from their intervention. They formed against him a league which they called "The league of the public good," under a pretext common to all factions. Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, in conjunction with the Dukes of Bretagne, Bourbon, and Berry, fought the bloody but indecisive battle of Montlhéri against the king (1465). But Louis, the ablest politician of his day, finished the war by negotiations, and ultimately resumed possession of Normandy, which he had granted as an appanage to his brother; a seizure sanctioned by an assembly of the states-general convoked by him at Tours.

England had been long a prey to intestine factions; but in an interval of repose, its king renewed the old pretensions of his crown on France. Louis maintained peace by engaging to pay a tribute, and indemnified himself in other quarters. He got possession of Anjou, the dominion of René of Anjou, King of Sicily, and annexed it to the crown of France. Provence shared the same fate, at a later date, by the will of René's heir. Louis's conquests were all made by the pen and by trickery. However, his astuteness was foiled by the marriage of the heiress of Burgundy with Maximilian of Austria, the emperor's son. This alliance brought a potent enemy into the heart of France. Burgundy, according to the law of appanages, was ultimately replaced under the French sceptre, but Flanders refused to submit to Louis. He attacked it, conquered Franche Comté, and gained Artois by treaty for a time. Thus terminated the ducal appanage of Burgundy, which had caused so many evils to France. Flanders, one of its portions, was the subject of numerous wars with the house of Austria.

The latter years of the cruel and cunning Louis XI. were filled with terrors and crimes. Shutting himself up in a fortress, he was suspicious of his domestics, his son, and even his physician. Knavish and superstitious, he wore relics on his squalid garments, and perjured himself without remorse. He died in 1483, clinging with tenacity to life, although it was to him but a torment of perpetual apprehension.

Whatever may be said to the contrary, I cannot regard Louis XI. as a popular king, merely because he decapitated, or put in iron cages, the princes and nobles of his time. Crimes only serve to demoralise the people. He was cruel to the great, and a despot to the weak. If he protected the burghers and encouraged industry, it was from avarice; he desired prosperity to gain increased means of taxation. If he were the first to establish the post, it was to stretch out with more rapidity his hand of iron. He was anxious that civil justice should be well administered, for an absolute king has nothing to fear from the equality of his subjects. He caused 40,000 of his subjects to be executed, and children to be sprinkled with the blood of their parents; yet he was the first to assume the title of "most Christian king!" His great maxim was, "He who knows not how to dissemble, knows not how to reign." He deceived himself; frankness is the best means of succeeding with the people

CHARLES VIII.—STATES-GENERAL.—CONQUESTS AND REVERSES IN ITALY.—FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

Charles VIII. was thirteen years old at the death of his father. His eldest sister was regent. The Duke of Orleans, a descendant of Charles V., was ambitious of that office, and strove by agitation to obtain it. The states-general were convoked at Tours to decide the question, and he lost his cause. They were likewise occupied with the misery of the people, which the records describe in forcible characters. They were accustomed to wander without subsistence in the forests; men, women, and children, yoked themselves to the plough at night, for fear of being plundered during the day by the tax-gatherers and men of arms. The reduction of two-thirds of the taxes, wherewith Louis XI. had overwhelmed the nation, was decreed. The ministers pretended that they were clipping the king's wings, but it was answered, that the interest of the king was that of the people, and that to alleviate the condition of the latter was to benefit the former. The states afterwards evinced a more docile spirit. In the mean time, the Duke of Orleans had retired into Bretagne to form a party, but was beaten at St Aubin by the army of the court. At this period, Anne, the heiress of Brittany, was marriageable. Maximilian of Austria, her suitor, was outwitted, and she was married to Charles VIII. (1491.) Brittany was united to France, and the Duke of Orleans taken into favour. He was the same who afterwards became Louis XII.

The young king took a fancy one day to become a conqueror, and all his courtiers applauded the idea, and prognosticated its auspicious execution. He recollected that he had some rights on Naples, from the succession of Anjou. He set off with an army, designing to subdue that kingdom, and afterwards Constantinople. He successively entered Florence and Rome. He was alternately assisted and betrayed by the execrable Borgia, Alexander VI., a pope, poisoner, and assassin. Naples was conquered by a march, and divers fêtes and tournaments celebrated the event. But a powerful league was formed in Lombardy. The French army repassed the Apennines, and 8000 men defeated in less than an hour 30,000 Italians at Fornoue. (1498.) However, the conquest of Naples was already lost. The artful Ferdinand, King of Spain, who seemed an ally, drove out the remnant of the army by means of Gonzalvo of Cordova.* The only acquisition of the French in this expedition was a horrible malady; and Charles VIII. himself died soon after, in a fit of apoplexy. Comines describes him as a prince of good heart, but of an indifferent head.

We have arrived at the end of the fifteenth century. Columbus had discovered America, and Gama had sailed round the Cape of Good Hope. The compass had opened the road to a new world, and commerce, as well as ambition, was directed towards it. Speculations, hitherto repressed within narrow limits, were extended over both hemispheres. The wonders of distant voyages and travels enlightened mankind, and removed the barrier of ancient prejudices. A German by inventing printing, rendered a still greater service to the human race. The light of the arts and sciences was thenceforth to be shed over the universe with an imperishable lustre. By multiplying books, barbarism and fanaticism will be ultimately driven from the face of the earth. In the mean time, disputes go on, and will continue to go on. From age to age, political, religious, and purely speculative questions, will be changed with the era, for which men will be ever ready to enter the lists. But with the progress of time, the number of thinkers, as well as of lessons, will increase; doctrines will become less imperious, creeds less exclusive; and mankind will pay more and more attention to their true destiny on earth.

LOUIS XII.—EXTERNAL WARS.—PATERNAL ADMINISTRATION.

We enter upon a reign which would have been the happiest in French history but for its exterior politics. Louis XII. was perhaps the best of the kings who have sat on the French throne. He was actuated by a true love for his people, whose father he was called; he also repressed the nobles without maltreating them. Unfortunately, a mania for conquests had seized upon the nation, and he yielded to the phrensy. Political relations were then beginning to be extended in Europe. Louis XI. had introduced therein the cunning and perfidy of which Machiavelli reveals the secrets. That ridiculous diplomacy of modern Europe, unknown to the ancients, which treats a people as a dowry, an inheritance, or an indemnity, and risks the lot of nations upon art and capacity in negotiation, was then in full vigour.

Louis XII. repudiated his wife, in order to marry the widow of Charles VIII., and preserve Brittany. Then, having rights on the Milanese through his grandmother, he departed with an army to enforce them. (1501.) In twenty days, the Milanese was conquered; Naples subsequently met the same fate: but Ferdinand once more drove the French out of that kingdom. Louis was about to give away the hand of his daughter, and a third of France for her dowry, when the states, which he assembled at Tours (1506), turned him from the design. He was afterwards engaged in a contest with Julius II., a pope who made war and mounted the breach in person. The league of Cambray, formed by almost all Europe against Venice, was the next great event. It involved France in war with Spain, and the Milanese was eventually evacuated by the French. La Tremouille, having returned into Italy, was defeated by the Swiss at Novarre. At the same time, the English, united with the imperialists, beat the French in Picardy, and the Swiss penetrated as far as Dijon. Louis XII. entered into a treaty with Henry VIII., King of England, and married his sister; he finally died, without doing France all the good he desired. (1515.) He was economical, and reduced the taxes, could distinguish merit in obscurity, protected labourers and artisans, watched over the administration of justice, and strove to render the law paramount. The Cardinal d'Amboise was his worthy minister.

Unfortunately, the states-general were only once convoked in this reign. The only authority which had the semblance of a national check was the parliament, which, according to its institution, was merely to concern itself with the decision of lawsuits. However, the people, deprived of the states, saw with pleasure a respected and permanent body stand forth as their defender, although with the view of increasing its own importance. The parliament sometimes resisted the royal power, by refusing the formality of registering edicts, and thus participated in some degree in a legislative veto. It at least subjected arbitrary power to certain forms, and to a prescribed procedure, which so far restrained its action.

FRANCIS I.—CHARLES V.—LUTHER AND CALVIN.—REVIVAL OF LETTERS.

Louis XII. was called the plebeian king; Francis I. was the king of gentlemen. He was likewise descended from Charles V. by another branch. He was a prince of graceful mien, brave, profuse, gallant, of chivalric honour, vastly brilliant as a knight, worthless as a politician. To enable him to carry on the war in Italy, Francis exposed the office of judge to sale, and proceeded to gain the battle of Marignan over the Swiss in the emperor's pay. He afterwards concluded with Leo X. a concordat, which annulled the Pragmatic Sanction, and abolished the principle of election (1516): the chancellor Duprat made this disgraceful treaty because he was ambitious of being a cardinal. The imperial throne becoming vacant, the king declared himself a candidate with the heir of Austria and Spain, who defeated his pretensions, and became his most unrelenting foe, under the title of Charles V. Francis allied himself with Henry VIII., but Charles succeeded in dissolving their union. Another enemy, Leo X., assisted the emperor in wresting the Milanese from the French, who had made themselves detested in that dutchy. Nearly the whole of Europe was in league against France, and one of its greatest warriors, the Constable Bourbon, passed over in disgust to the side of its enemies. But Francis was not intimidated; he entered Italy and fought the disastrous battle of Pavia, was made prisoner, and carried to Madrid (1525). Francis purchased his freedom by ceding Burgundy, &c.; but the treaty was not executed, as the states of Burgundy refused to pass under a foreign sway. Having entered into a league against Charles with a new pope, Henry VIII., and the Venitians, the king again passed the Alps, besieged Naples, got the plague in his army, and once more evacuated Italy. A peace was signed at Cambray, and the ransom was liquidated for 2,000,000 of gold crowns. Previous to this period, the Duke of Bourbon, being in want of funds to pay his soldiers, had led them to the pillage of Rome. The pope, who was taken prisoner, had likewise to pay a heavy ransom to Charles V., who asked pardon for the violence committed on the head of the church.

At this era a religious schism prepared a new burst for the human mind, and new combinations of a political order. We refer of course to the Reformation, which great event, the subject of so many descriptions and disputes, need not be enlarged upon here.

The Duke of Milan, Sforza, having provided a pretext, the king brought forward his old pretensions. (1535.) The emperor undertook on his part an invasion of France, but was not successful. Being accused of poisoning the dauphin, he was cited before the parliament, which confiscated Artois and Flanders by a decree pronounced in contumacy. Francis afterwards contracted an alliance with the Sultan Soly-

* Spain was then becoming an imposing power. The Christians, descendants of the Iberians and Visigoths, had succeeded in expelling the Moors, who had occupied their country for nearly eight centuries; and the crowns of Arragon and Castille were united by the marriage of Ferdinand and Isabella.

man, which was exclaimed against in Europe, though a pope had once before allied himself with the Turks. The plan concerted failed; the artful Charles obtained a truce, and a passage through France to proceed to Ghent, which had revolted against him. Any other than Francis would perhaps have seized the occasion of exacting a ransom in his turn: the confidence of a man of bad faith is an illustrious homage to the scrupulous honour of his dupe.

The two monarchs having soon quarrelled again, a new war broke out (1542), which was prosecuted on all the frontiers. The galleys of France were united with those of the Turk Barbarossa. The Count d'Enghien gained the battle of Cerisoles in Italy, without any advantage to France. Charles, in alliance with Henry VIII., penetrated as far as Soissons, and peace was once more signed at Cressy, but scarcely procured a single moment of repose. In the mean time, Francis I. expired from the consequences of a loathsome disease (1547).

Francis was one of the most absolute of the French kings, and oppressed the people with unauthorised taxes. For the states-general he substituted assemblies of notables, that is to say, of courtiers, who were chosen for the purpose of being consulted, and who were always sure to approve. He enslaved the Gallican church, and corrupted the nation by the profligacy of his manners. He is called the restorer of arts and letters, because they were revived when he happened to be on the throne: he protected them, doubtless, but their age was come, and did not need him. The republican genius had prepared the way in Italy; liberty had peopled Florence with great men, and the Medicis, who rose from merchants to princes, seconded them. The only praise due to Francis is that of founding the college of France, and establishing the use of French in public acts.

HENRY II.—CONTINUATION OF THE WARS OF FRANCIS I.

The character of Henry II. bore a great resemblance to that of his father Francis, and their reigns had some parallel points. The war continued against Charles V. The king wrested from him Metz, Toul, and Verdun (1553), and the emperor advanced to Metz with 100,000 men. The Duke of Guise, the first celebrated man of that Lorraine family which became so potent in France, repulsed him. Charles revenged himself by destroying two towns, and shortly after astonished Europe by surrendering the empire, and retiring to die in a convent (1555). Ferdinand, his brother, became emperor, and Philip II., his son, king of Spain. The latter was the Louis XI. of his age, and the most powerful prince in Europe, which he moved by a mighty lever, the gold of Peru and Mexico. Whilst the French were carrying on an unsuccessful warfare in Italy, his general, the Duke of Savoy, gained a victory at St Quentin (1557), which threatened the most disastrous consequences to France. Terror spread into every quarter; Paris was fortified, and the Spaniards might easily have entered it, had not Philip judged it expedient to retrograde. The Duke of Guise, named lieutenant-general of the kingdom, repaired the misfortune by taking Calais from the English. A peace was signed at Chateau-Cambresis. The celebrated Queen Elizabeth then reigned in England. Henry II. did not long survive the treaty, being killed in a tournament (1559).

In this reign, as well as in the preceding, women exercised considerable influence at court. Their intrigues have been always fatal to France. Henry II. allowed himself to be governed by his mistress, Diana of Poitiers, who had previously governed his father. The ingenious Rabelais has painted these two kings and their courts, under the veil of a fantastic allegory; and Brantome has depicted the dissolute manners of the age with a truth inconsistent with decency. In 1558, the states were assembled conjointly with the parliament, which appeared therein as a fourth order: this singular representation was not repeated.

RELIGIOUS FACTIONS UNDER FRANCIS II.

The nobles, humbled by Louis XI., had become courtiers under his successors: the luxury of the court drew them to the royal abode, and there they were moulded to obedience. But when foreign wars ceased to give them occupation, they fell into factions. Religion was the motive or the pretext. The Prince of Condé, and the King of Navarre, his brother, of the Bourbon branch, were the chiefs of the Protestant party; whilst Guise, the uncle of Mary Stuart, the king's wife, directed the Catholic party. The Constable Montmorenci had likewise his faction. The queen-mother, Catherine de Medicis, a faithless and imperious woman, protected and betrayed them in their turns. She sought to hold the balance between them, acting upon her favourite maxim of dividing in order to rule; an infamous maxim, since it fixes the security of the throne on the misery of the nation.

A magistrate having been hanged as a Protestant, his co-religionists formed a league at Amboise to revenge him (1560). Guise repressed it by force of arms. The punishments on the Calvinists were redoubled; they defended themselves, and made a vain assertion of the right to liberty of conscience in the assembly of Fontainbleau. It was resolved to convoke the states at Orleans, in order to draw the Bourbons to attend it. Condé was there arrested, condemned to death, and about to be executed, when the king died. Francis II. was an amiable young man, but is a mere cypher in the history of his reign. His brother succeeded him at the age of ten years, under the title of Charles IX.

CHARLES IX.—CIVIL WAR.—ST BARTHOLOMEW.

The states made no step towards pacification. A virtuous citizen and philosophic magistrate, L'Hôpital, vainly strove to move the respective parties to moderation and union. Catherine afterwards proposed a conference to terminate the disputes with the Calvinists (who were called Huguenots, from a German word signifying confederates), which was held at Poissy (1561), and ended in rendering them more bitter. It was at this time that the Jesuits established themselves in France, and yet liberty of conscience was proclaimed by the queen-mother. Certain outrages committed by the retainers of the Duke of Guise, occasioned a massacre of the Huguenots at Vassy in Champagne. A civil war exploded (1563). The Protestants were defeated by the royalists at Dreux; the generals of both armies were made prisoners in the battle. The Duke of Guise besieged Orleans, and was assassinated: he was an ambitious man, who made use of religion to aggrandise himself. A short peace was then made. The vexations of the Catholics were renewed, and suffered with impunity; the Huguenots were again driven to exasperation. Condé attempted to carry off the king, in order to be master of the government, but he failed in his enterprise. The battle of St Denis (1567) took place shortly after, in which the victory was doubtful. Montmorenci perished in the conflict. After a treaty, the war recommenced. Aided by the Protestants of Germany and England, the Huguenots gave battle at Jarnac, and were defeated by the Duke of Anjou, the king's brother (1569). Condé was assassinated on the field of battle when in the act of surrendering. Coligny, a prudent general, repaired this defeat, and rallied the Calvinist forces. The young Henry of Navarre, whom he was training to war, was placed at the head of the party. Anjou was again victorious at Montcontour.

Notwithstanding these two checks, the Protestants concluded an advantageous peace. But it was a perfidious snare. After yielding them four towns as pledges, and civil and religious liberty, Catherine drew the chiefs to court, and lulled them into a blind confidence. The young Henry went to espouse the king's sister (1572). The rejoicings were scarcely concluded, when suddenly, in the dead of night, the royalists broke into the houses of the Huguenots, and massacred them without distinction of age or sex. The detestable king fired from a balcony on his own subjects. The same horrors were enacted simultaneously in several of the provinces. The aged and illustrious Coligny was immolated, and Henry and the young Condé were forced to abjure their errors. The king openly avowed that the whole had been done by his orders; and the parliament decreed an annual procession to celebrate this massacre of 100,000 Frenchmen. It is sufficient at the present day to mention St Bartholomew to excite horror; and yet that day has had its apologists.

The effect of persecution and cruelty is invariable martyrs engender proselytes. The Protestants increased in number; and war being renewed (1573), the Duke of Anjou lost 24,000 men at the siege of Rochelle. The following year the party of malecontents was organised, which the Huguenots joined, and fresh conflicts occurred. During these events, the king died (1574). We learn with surprise that this monster had wit, made verses, and protected letters.

THE LEAGUE.—THE SIXTEEN.—HENRY III.

The Duke of Anjou, who had gone to Poland, where he had been elected king, returned to France under the name of Henry III. He had shown talents as a general, but on the throne he was idle, silly, empty, superstitious, and addicted to infamous debaucheries. He was advised to conciliate the Calvinists, but he declared against them. His brother, the Duke of Anjou, and Henry of Navarre, united against him. The Protestants obtained some political advantages by an edict of pacification issued in 1576. Then the holy league was formed, a confederacy of those whom we may call ultra-Catholics, who bound themselves to defend religion and the king, whilst yielding a blind submission to their leader Henry of Guise. The states were convoked at Blois, the leaguers predominated in them, and the king sanctioned the league. Each party took up arms and stood on the watch. The leaguers, contemning the king, consulted the pope whether they might disobey a monarch for the advantage of religion; and he responded in the affirmative. Guise put forward the old Cardinal de Bourbon, who published a manifesto in the name of all the Catholic monarchs in Europe. Pope Sixtus V. excommunicated Henry and Condé, who laughed at him. The war called that of the three Henries broke out (1587); Henry of Navarre defeated the royalists, commanded by Joyeuse and other favourites, at Coutras; whilst Henry of Guise defeated the German Calvinists who were advancing to his aid.

During this period, the insurrection, known by the name of the sixteen, was organised at Paris. The appellation was taken from the sixteen quarters of the commune, corresponding to the sections of 1792. The Sorbonne, which was favourable to the insurgents, decided that the government might be taken from an incapable prince. The leaguers, assembled at Nanci, dictated orders to the king; he endeavoured to evince resistance, and called some Swiss to Paris. The burghers immediately ran to arms, barricaded the streets to the Louvre, and encompassed the troops. The king fled, and abandoned the capital to Guise and the league. A new union against the heretics was imposed on the king by the leaguers.

A meeting of the states-general was held at Blois in 1588, in which the leaguers had again the majority. The Guises had reached the summit of power, and might easily have played the part of Pepin or Capet The king was conscious of the truth, and being unable to resist them openly, he had them assassinated. The rage of the leaguers knew no bounds; they cursed the king in the pulpit; and the parliament which opposed them was sent to the Bastille, and replaced with new members. The Duke of Mayenne succeeded Guise, his brother, as head of the leaguers, whose party was still predominant. Only a few towns remained to the king, who at length perceived the necessity of reconciling himself with Henry; they embraced, and forgot mutual wrongs (1589). Excommunicated by the pope, the king, conducted by Henry, marched on Paris. They were already at St Cloud, when a young Dominican, incited by the leaguers, slew the king with the thrust of a knife. The Parisians celebrated the murder, and Jacques Clement was regarded as a saint. The Catholic theologians of that era proved by the aid of scripture that it was lawful to kill kings. The intriguing Catherine died in 1589, cordially detested by all parties.

END OF THE LEAGUE.—ENTRY OF HENRY IV. INTO PARIS.—SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

The branch of Valois was extinct. Henry of Bourbon-Navarre took the crown as descendant from Louis IX., and deserved it by his eminent qualities. Only recognised by a few provinces, and ill provided for war, he struggled against Mayenne, whose numerous army included a portion of Spanish infantry, then the best in Europe. He had almost decided upon retiring into England, when, meeting Mayenne at Arques, he defeated him with 5000 men (1589). He immediately marched upon Paris, and nearly succeeded in taking it. The old Cardinal de Bourbon, his cousin, had been declared king, under the title of Charles X. Henry again vanquished Mayenne at the battle of Ivry (1590), and blockaded Paris. The leaguers defended themselves with a species of phrensy, kept up by fanaticism; whole regiments of monks and priests were formed to resist the heretic. A frightful famine raged; bread was made with dead men's bones; but Henry permitted provisions to pass into the besieged city when in this extremity. The celebrated Farnese, Philip II.'s general, advanced with an army to raise the siege.

In the mean time, the flames of war were lighted up in every corner of France, either by foreign or domestic foes. In this disastrous state, a new party sprung up in Paris, the party of politicians, who joined themselves to the malecontents. They were moderate Catholics, who aimed at a pacification by recognising the king. Wearied with so long and bloody a strife, all parties at length were disposed to reconcilement, and met together in conference. The king resolved upon an abjuration, saying, "Paris is well worth a ss." Mayenne signed a treaty, and the league sunk under the shafts of ridicule and contempt, giving forth its last furious groan in an attempt to assassinate Henry IV. That prince entered Paris on the 22d March 1594.

Thus finished the sixteenth century, one of the most glorious to the human intellect, illustrated as it is by so many great names. Copernicus, Galileo, Torricelli, Bacon, Montaigne, Grotius, Luther, Calvin, Erasmus—every name involves a mighty revolution.

REIGN OF HENRY IV.

Henry's first measure was to re-establish the parliament; and he then attempted a sort of amalgamation between the Calvinists and leaguers. In the mean time several endeavours were made to take away the king's life, for assuredly the Jesuits loved him not. They were driven forth the realm (1595) by the advice of the parliament, of the university, and of the church. Mayenne, however, was not quite reduced to submission, and Henry needed another victory over him, which having gained at Fontaine-Française, he pardoned him. The Duke d'Epernon, having also revolted, was subdued, and war declared against Philip II., who had taken Calais. The king wanted money to resist him, and therefore convoked an assembly of notables to ask their advice, and told them that his most glorious title was his quality of a gentleman. The Spaniards were repulsed. Mercœur, governor of Bretagne, who still held for the league, was subdued, and a treaty signed with Philip (1598), who died shortly after. The Calvinists assembled at Saumur, and loudly exclaimed against the little favour with which they were regarded. Henry gave them the edict of Nantes, in which the exercise of their religion was subjected to the restrictions of a galling toleration. The edict was far removed from religious liberty, and yet the ultra-Catholics regarded it as a most unjust concession.

The latter events of this reign were the recall of the Jesuits, solicited by the pope; the conspiracy of Henrietta d'Entragues, to whom Henry had given a promise of marriage; and the mediation (1609) between the pope, Venitians, Spain, and Holland. Henry was arming against Austria, and projected, as is said, a plan for an European confederation and a perpetual peace, long the object of philanthropic prayers, when he was assassinated by a fanatic. It was Ravaillac, since we are bound to name him: history is too complaisant in immortalising ruffians and assassins.

Assisted by Sully, his friend and minister, Henry IV. introduced order and economy into the finances: formerly not more than the fifth of the taxes ever reached the royal treasury. He had a good heart, and possessed the art of making himself beloved; but he reigned as an absolute monarch. He repressed every symptom of resistance, even to the obstinacy of the parliament, by the vain parade of beds of justice. We may ask how a prince, who desired the good and comfort of the poor, could sign the atrocious ordinance which condemned them to the galleys for killing a rabbit? We must acknowledge, although with reluctance, that the despotism of Richelieu and Louis XIV. can be traced back to Henry IV. With that conviction, it is unnecessary to reproach him for having been too fond of play and of his subjects' wives. Nevertheless he was popular, and still lives in the recollections of the people; a glory which, as far as we know, is peculiar to him.

RICHELIEU.—LOUIS XIII.—DESPOTISM.

Louis XIII. being on his accession (1610) only nine years old, the parliament gave the regency to his mother, Mary of Medicis, thus attributing to itself a prerogative of the states-general. The benefits of the preceding administration were lost; Sully was dismissed, and his savings dissipated. The Florentine Concini (afterwards Marshal d'Ancre), and his wife Galigaï, ruined France by their influence over the regent. Factions began to rend the kingdom again. The states-general were thereupon convoked (1614), the time of which was consumed with the affairs of the clergy. It was their last assembly before the Revolution. The complaints of the parliament concerning the administration of affairs were rejected, and the Prince of Condé, who was at the head of the malecontents and Calvinists, was arrested. A young page attending the king, named Luynes, who had gained complete sway over the royal mind, persuaded his master to rid himself of the minister, in order to throw off the yoke of the regent. The king, cruel from imbecility, caused Concini to be assassinated. His wife was accused of witchcraft, and burnt. The new favourite inherited the immense wealth which they had hoarded by their malversations. Louis XIII. was one of those weak creatures who derive their energy from the suggestions of others, and revenge themselves for their habitual submission by bursts of brutal ferocity. He exiled his mother, and treated her with great harshness. She got up two revolts by the assistance of certain lords. The Calvinists likewise rose several times in insurrection, and obtained advantageous terms of peace.

Then appeared Richelieu (1624), a creature of Concini, who had lived in retirement since his patron's downfall. This man had a most stern and inflexible will, with an unremitting assiduity in imposing it upon others; a despot in every sense of the word, he annihilated every instrument of resistance. Throwing suspicion upon the designs of the nobles, he imitated the conduct of Louis XI., and had several of them condemned to death by commissions. He suppressed the great offices of admiral and constable, which formerly conferred so vast an influence, and which were already degraded, since the latter had been given to Luynes, a simple gentleman. Appearing at first disposed to conciliate the Calvinists, he soon formed the project of oppressing them, by seizing their places of security, the feeble guarantees of their religious freedom. After a year spent in the siege of Rochelle, conducted by himself in person, and which was defended with heroic courage, displayed amid the horrors of famine, he took that town, although supported by an English fleet. He destroyed that bulwark of the Protestant faith, and reduced Rohan, the leader of the Huguenot army. It is stated that the plan of the reformers was to found a federative republic, such as they saw prospering in Holland. If they had succeeded, how different would the history of Europe have been!

It is not the reign of Louis XIII., but of Richelieu, that is to be related; before him all bent the knee. The king was accounted a cypher. Roussillon was conquered in 1628. The house of Austria was humbled. Several wars were maintained against the Spaniards, with varying success; Catalonia gave itself up to France. The genius of Richelieu shone in a skilful use of the arts of political intrigue, and under him France took a commanding station in Europe. Nevertheless, his reign has something mournful and monotonous in its aspect, like every thing marked by the hand of despotism. From time to time, feeble attempts at resistance were provoked, which were always suppressed by severe punishments: the Marshal de Marillac was executed in 1630; the Duke de Montmorenci, taken with arms in his hands, was condemned by the parliament of Toulouse and executed in 1632, in spite of the king's pardon; Cing-Mars and De Thou were decapitated in 1642, for having conspired against the cardinal, at the instance of the king himself, irritated at the haughty thraldom of his minister. At length this tyrannical priest died. Louis XIII. had scarcely time to breathe freely, before he likewise paid nature's debt (1643); as if Richelieu, unwilling that he should reign an instant, had ordered him to follow him to the tomb.

The absolute power of Charles V. and Henry IV., preserved at least the elasticity of the French character. Richelieu, like Louis XI., broke and degraded it. France was perfectly miserable under him; it seemed as if despotism struck the minds of men with stupor, and the soil with sterility. The pretensions of the parliament, which formerly claimed to be a portion of the sovereign power, were out of season under such a master. One day that the magistrates had refused to register a decree, Richelieu had them summoned before the king, and kept them on their knees during the whole audience. To him, however, was owing the institution of the Academy, which had the patience to pronounce a periodical eulogium upon him during a space of 150 years; but The Cid, which he caused to be condemned, gave the true impetus to French literary genius; whilst Descartes, persecuted by the zealots, was driven to pursue philosophy in Sweden.

MAZARIN.—MINORITY OF LOUIS XIV.—THE FRONDE.

Louis XIV. was five years old on his accession. The parliament again arrogated the right to confer the regency. The queen-mother, Anne of Austria, a vain and frivolous woman, obtained it. The Italian, Mazarin, her favourite, a disciple of Richelieu, governed in her name. He was an adroit and supple minister, who carried on despotism by cunning, and seemed to regard the art of reigning as synonymous with the art of making dupes. The war continued with Austria without any object. The young D'Enghien, who became the great Condé, distinguished himself in its course. He conquered at Rocroi and Fribourg. Turenne was successful at Nordlingen (1644), and took Dunkirk; and Condé was again victorious at Lens. This war, in which the Swedes were useful allies, was terminated by the treaty of Westphalia (1648).

After the peace, the nobles gave vent to their discontent against Mazarin; they made common cause with the parliament, and were sometimes aided by the people, who, upon one occasion, erected barricades in Paris, and compelled the court to set two magistrates at liberty. However, the people had no real interest in the quarrels of a few turbulent and ambitious men; bowed beneath the iron yoke of despotism, they had not even an idea of deriving any popular advantage from such contests. The factions at this time were little more than coteries; laughter and jokes were as plentiful as blows. A sprightly prelate bethought him of enacting the character of Catiline, and in the recital of his fantastic exploits, he has rendered civil war a very amusing relation. Condé, disgusted with the court, which he had previously served, abandoned it. Mazarin caused him to be arrested, then released him; and, seeing the storm increasing, quitted the kingdom, into which he returned with 7000 men. Condé and the Frondists had formed an alliance with the Spaniards. The armies came to close quarters in the faubourg St Antoine. The royalists were commanded by Turenne. The parliament named the irresolute Gaston, Duke of Orleans, lieutenant of the kingdom. Mazarin again retired, and the Fronde, having no further pretext to allege, was dissolved; whereupon the king and Mazarin entered Paris (1653). The natural result of this revolutionary display, so ill supported, was to give additional strength to absolute power. Condé had rejoined the Spaniards in the Low Countries. The war between him and Turenne continued for a long time, and was terminated by the treaty of the Pyrenees (1659): France kept Artois, Roussillon, and Alsace; and Louis XIV. married the Infanta Maria Theresa. Mazarin died, leaving despotism in excellent hands. Louis now declared that he would reign in his turn (1661). He had already entered the parliament in his hunting-dress, booted and whip in hand, to enjoin it to abstain from any interference in affairs of state.

PROSPERITY OF LOUIS XIV.

Louis XIV. conceived the project of becoming the most powerful monarch in Europe, and he succeeded therein by the assistance of superior men, whom he had the sagacity to discover and draw out. Colbert restored the finances, cherished commerce and industry, protected learning, and organised the whole administration. A man of genius, Riquet, consecrated his life and fortune to the construction of the Languedoc canal. A marine was created, capable of opposing the navies of Holland and England. The king alleged pretended rights upon the death of Philip IV., as a pretext for declaring war against Spain. (1668.) Flanders was conquered in a short time, and Franche-Comté was overrun in three weeks. Holland, England, and Sweden, formed an alliance in favour of Spain. By the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, the Comté was restored; but France retained Flanders, which the celebrated Vauban fortified.

Holland gave Louis XIV. divers causes of irritation and antipathy, presenting in its republican form of government so striking a contrast to his own. He collected against it 200,000 men, after having deprived it of all its allies; and he made with Condé, Turenne, Luxumbourg, &c., that passage of the Rhine which was celebrated as a military prodigy, at a time when a king who made war in a carriage, surrounded by his court, was compared to Cæsar. Holland was invaded, and Louis proposed conditions of a most humiliating and oppressive character. Despair stirred up the Dutch to the last pitch of exasperation. Ruyter, who from a cabin-boy had become an admiral, frequently beat the French and English fleets. The Dutch flooded their country to preserve its freedom (1673); and Louis XIV. was compelled to evacuate it. A general league was formed to curb the freaks of this imperious despot. But he was the strongest; he again overran Franche-Comté, and laid waste the Palatinate by means of Turenne. Condé gave battle to the Stadtholder of Holland at Senef (1678), which was attended with no other result than the destruction of 25,000 men. Duquesne rendered the French flag formidable in the Mediterranean, and the peace of Nimeguen consolidated the conquests of France.

The stadtholder, however, attempted an invasion, and was repulsed by Luxumbourg. In 1681, Strasburg was taken. Louis sent a fleet to bombard Algiers, as a hint to the pirates to respect French commerce in future. He likewise bombarded Genoa, for having assisted Algiers. He was at the summit of power; no king was ever regaled with such incense; his very person was idolised as the type of beauty and dignity. The extravagant magnificence of his court, in which the wealth of France was ingulfed, intoxicated his vainglorious mind. In his delirium he resolved to extirpate heresy. The women, poets, and Jesuits, applauded his design. Missionaries were sent into the Cevennes, accompanied by dragoons, who massacred the Calvinists by way of converting them. The edict of Nantes was revoked (1685); the churches were demolished, and children torn from their parents to be made Catholics. Eight hundred thousand peaceable citizens migrated, and carried into foreign countries their industry and resentment; their possessions served to reward sycophants. Indignant Europe coalesced at Augsburg (1687) against this intolerant despotism. The Prince of Orange was the soul of this confederacy; he was called, under the title of William III., to the throne of England, whose parliament once more expelled the Stuarts; and Louis XIV. offered his protection to the dethroned king, James II. A fierce war was the result. The Palatinate was again devastated, by the order of Louvois. Luxumbourg conquered at Fleurus, Steinkerque, and Nerwinde, the king, William, a brave warrior, and a man of great ability, but unfortunate in battle. Catinat, a philosophic and plebeian general, triumphed over the Duke of Savoy at Staffarde and Marseilles. On the other hand, Tourville lost fourteen ships of the line at La Hogue. In every quarter humanity suffered, and groaned amidst useless carnage and desolation. Peace was concluded at Ryswick (1697) from mutual exhaustion: Louis no longer reigned as master, and France was ruined. Any expedient was adopted to get money; nobility was sold for 2000 crowns, as it had been bought before Henry III. by fiefs.

REVERSES OF LOUIS XIV.—THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.

The King of Spain, having no direct heir, made, after long hesitating between the houses of France and Austria, his will in favour of a grandson of Louis XIV. (1700). That prince accepted the inheritance, knowing, however, that he exposed himself to a terrible war. He again excited the anger of England, by declaring for the son of James II. He sent Philip V. into Spain, saying to him, "There are no longer any Pyrenees." An abbé, whom the superb Louis had despised, and who became the best general of the emperor, Prince Eugene, obtained great advantages over the old Villeroi in Savoy. The Duke of Savoy, Victor Amadeus, abandoned the French party, notwithstanding the ties that attached him to the Bourbons. Marlborough triumphed in the Low Countries; but Villars conquered the imperialists at Hochstet (1703), where the French were in the following year vanquished, in their turn, by Eugene and Marlborough. The English took Gibraltar and Barcelona. Vendôme repulsed Eugene in Italy (1706), when Marlborough gained the decisive battle of Ramillies over Villeroi. Then fortune changed in the south; the French army was beaten at Turin; Toulon was besieged; the archduke was crowned at Madrid; and Philip V. would have lost Spain, if Berwick had not gained for him the battle of Almanza (1707). Eugene fought both in the south and the north; in 1709, he took Lille in concert with Marlborough. Louis craved peace; harsh conditions were offered him; and he preferred continuing the war, notwithstanding the extreme misery of the people. After a brave resistance, the French army, commanded by Villars, was defeated at Malplaquet (1710). The king again humbled himself, and his offers were rejected. Vendôme restored affairs in Spain; Marlborough, disgraced by his court, retired, and a truce was concluded with England. Villars, having surprised Eugene at Denain, gained one of those striking victories which save empires. The peace of Utrecht was the consequence (1713). Villars passed the Rhine, repulsed the Austrians, and signed with Eugene the peace of Radstadt (1714). The issue of this ruinous war was less disastrous to France than it had reason to expect. The most humiliating condition was the destruction of the port of Dunkirk. The almost simultaneous deaths of the dauphin and his son, the duke of Burgundy, completed the misfortunes of Louis XIV. He died in 1715, in his seventy-seventh year, after a reign of seventy-two years. He left France two thousand six hundred millions of debt; and in the course of his career he had destroyed more than a million of men.

The seventeenth century is called the age of Louis XIV., because he contributed to give it lustre by his magnificence and his taste for a certain species of grandeur. But what good did he perform for the human race? He rendered France powerful in Europe, and enslaved it at home; he was the cause that, during a century, the French had no national spirit. By constituting himself the dispenser of glory as well as of fortune, he demoralised the nation; it forgot itself in thinking only of him; and when he uttered the phrase, "I am the state!" it believed him. His idle splendour corrupted the ideas of a nation which has always been too prone to concentrate upon the man of the moment its admiration, its idolatry, and its own destinies. Under Louis XIV., Racine, Boileau, and Molière, purified taste, and produced masterpieces of genius. Without him, Corneille, Pascal, La Fontaine, Fénélon, and La Bruyère, would not the less have adorned France; reason would have had freer organs, and genius, emancipated from an absorbing contemplation of the grand monarch, would have risen to more noble, that is to say, more useful, conceptions. The spirit of independence, awakened by the struggles of the Fronde, would not have been smothered; the inquiry into the true interests of humanity would not have been retarded; and the seventeenth century might have been the age as well of reason as of genius.

The better to repress freedom of opinion, despotism availed itself of the yoke of religious intolerance. Bossuet was the apostle of Louis XIV.'s monarchy, and preached its infallibility. The Jansenists were persecuted, not on account of their doctrines, but because they thought for themselves, and invaded the unity of belief. All France was bound to think like the king. Thence came that hypocritical varnish which covered the corruption of manners. The Tartuffe, permitted at court, was an extraordinary anomaly, and evinces the triumph of genius. In conclusion, this Louis XIV., so absolute a king, and who had never suffered himself to be governed by his mistresses, finished by sharing his throne with his confessor and an old woman whom he had married, the widow Scarron (Madame de Maintenon).

THE REGENCY.—REIGN OF LOUIS XV.—THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

The great-grandson of Louis XIV. was likewise king at the age of five. The parliament annulled the will of the deceased monarch, and nominated his nephew, the Duke of Orleans, unlimited regent. He was a refined debauchee, and indifferent as to affairs. The dull grandeur of the last reign, joined to its misfortunes, had at last disgusted the French: delivered from the galling restraint of tiresome ceremony and hateful intolerance, which had pervaded the very manners of the people, they abandoned themselves to the license of unrestrained folly, like children let loose from a stern taskmaster. During a war against Spain, excited by an old Italian priest, Alberoni, who was bent upon embroiling and throwing into confusion all Europe, schemes were entertained for paying off the debts of Louis XIV. The adventurer Law arrived from Scotland, with a financial system, which was seized upon with avidity. The whole was paid with the money of dupes, who received in exchange paper and mighty promises. The Mississippi scheme plunged the nation into a vortex of madness, and turned the period into a saturnalia of fallacious wealth. The minister of the regent, the Abbé Dubois, was as vile as his master was corrupt: he made himself the creature of the Jesuits.

The king entered upon his majority when the regent died (1723). The Duke of Bourbon, his first minister, signalised his administration by persecutions against the Protestants. The Abbé de Fleury, who succeeded him, was a very moderate and prudent man, seventy-three years old: he had the talent of appeasing and conciliating. He procured France a long peace, which was troubled by the expulsion of Stanislaus, King of Poland, the king's father-in-law. Alliances were formed, and war was declared against the emperor, who on his part contracted an alliance with Peter the Great, the first czar who made Russia's influence felt in Europe. The campaign which occurred in Italy (1734) was decisive. Peace was signed at Vienna; France gained Lorraine, of which Stanislaus had the life-sovereignty secured to him.

The war of 1740, for the succession of the emperor, which his illustrious daughter Maria-Theresa wished to preserve entire, was less fortunate. Several French armies were destroyed without fighting. Frederick, the famous King of Prussia, exhibited great political and military talents: he conquered Silesia. In this war, France was the ally of Prussia and the Elector of Bavaria, the pretender to the empire, and fought against England, Holland, and Piedmont. The battle of Fontenoy was gained by the Marshal de Saxe against the two first powers (1745). Success was divided in Italy, and the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle rewarded the courageous perseverance of Maria-Theresa (1748).

The war soon recommenced (1749). England coveted Canada, and began hostilities without a declaration. The French armies were at first successful both in America and Europe. The old political system of Europe was overthrown in this war: France was united with Austria against Prussia and England. Soubise marched against the King of Prussia with the powerful army of the coalesced powers, which Frederick routed at Rosbach, as completely as, fifty years later, the Prussians were scattered at Jena. The war was continued until the peace of Paris (1763), which despoiled France of her possessions in America, with the exception of New Orleans. The alliance contracted at that time with Spain, under the title of the Family Compact, was disastrous to France. Chatham governed England, whose power he carried to an exorbitant pitch.

To complete the picture of this reign, we should speak of the interminable religious quarrels and political intrigues, resulting from a bull Unigenitus, proclaiming the infallibility of the pope. We should recall the persecution raised by the Jesuits and the crown against the Jansenists and the parliament, as well as the absurd miracles with which they endeavoured to defend themselves. We should relate the excesses of the court, and the scandalous life of a king who hated the people—of a king who, abandoning himself to the most shameless women, gave the government as a reward to debauchery, and passed in disgraceful orgies the time in which his people were crying for bread. We should describe the infamous despotism of lettres de cachet; and tell how, in the face of the nation, a Chancellor Maupeou had the audacity to put his creatures in the place of judges who were found too upright. But why linger on the revolting spectacle of such degradation? It has produced the greatest benefits, and that is enough. The reign of Louis XV. is the one to which France is the most deeply indebted; it made people reflect with an earnestness before unknown; opened their eyes, by removing the deceptive halo which surrounded the despotic throne, and hastened the advent of national hardihood. A degraded despotism is as instructive to nations as a despotism crowned with glory is mischievous to them.

We need only speak a word about the ministry of De Choiseul, who restored some dignity to France in the eyes of foreigners, and conquered Corsica. The expulsion of the Jesuits is also worthy of commemoration. Avignon, which had been seized, was restored to the pope, as a recompense for abolishing the Jesuitical order.

The eighteenth century, upon which the maledictions of the partisans of ignorance have been so profusely heaped, has so often been described in its intellectual characteristics as to render any notice here a superfluous task. It is sufficient to know that the human mind advanced with rapid strides in every branch of inquiry during its course, and that it has been justly deemed to have prepared France for her revolution.

HISTORY OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

PREFACE OF M. THIERS.

I propose to write the history of a memorable revolution, which has deeply agitated the minds of men, and still divides their opinions. I do not conceal from myself the difficulties of the undertaking, for passions which were thought to be stifled under the influence of military despotism have been again aroused. Men, tottering with the weight of years and labours, have suddenly felt revived within them resentments which were apparently hushed, and have imparted them to us, their descendants and successors. But if we have to support the same cause, we are relieved from the necessity of defending their conduct, and we are permitted to separate liberty itself from those who have served or injured it, whilst we possess the advantage of having heard and observed these aged men, who, still full of their recollections, still swayed by their impressions, display to us in more vivid characters the spirit and nature of bygone parties, and teach us better to comprehend them. Perhaps the moment in which the actors are about to vanish from the scene, is the most fitting for the compilation of history; we may gather their testimony without participating their passions.

Be that as it may, I have endeavoured to divest myself of every sentiment of animosity: I have, by turns, imagined myself born beneath the thatch, and animated with a just ambition, longing to obtain what the disdain of the higher classes unjustly denied me; and again, reared in palaces and the inheritor of ancient privileges, feeling the pain of renouncing a possession which I viewed as a legitimate subject of ownership. Thus, any emotions of anger could not fail to be calmed: I have felt pity for the combatants, and solaced myself by an admiring contemplation of generous minds.

CHAPTER I.

ACCESSION OF LOUIS XVI.—COMMENCEMENT OF THE REVOLUTION.

The revolutions of the French monarchy are recorded in the pages of history: it is known that the Greeks, and afterwards the Romans, carried their arms and their civilisation into the midst of the Gauls, then in a state of semi-barbarism; that after them, the hordes of northern Europe established their military hierarchy in those provinces, and that this hierarchy, transferred from individuals to lands, was, as it were, implanted in the soil, and thus formed the feudal system. In that system, authority was divided between the chief, called the king, and the secondary chiefs, called vassals, who in their turn were kings of their own people. In our times, when the eagerness of all parties for mutual accusation has induced so close a search for reciprocal wrongs, it is sufficiently established that authority was first disputed by the vassals, which those, indeed, invariably do who are most nearly affected by its exercise; that this authority was afterwards partitioned amongst them, during which period feudal anarchy reigned paramount; and that it finally returned to the throne, where it was concentrated into despotism under Louis XI., Richelieu, and Louis XIV. The French population gradually enfranchised itself by labour, the first source of wealth and liberty. Agricultural in the first ages, subsequently commercial and manufacturing, it acquired so considerable an importance, that it formed the nation in its collective capacity. Introduced into the states-general in a suppliant posture, it appeared there to be taxed according to mercy and forbearance; but Louis XIV. at last announced that he would have no more of these abject assemblies, and declared his resolution to the parliament with a horse-whip in his hand. Thenceforth, we behold a king, seated at the head of the state, invested with a power ill defined in theory, but absolute in practice; nobles, who had abandoned their feudal dignity for the favour of the monarch, and who disputed amongst themselves, by ways of intrigue, what was thrown to them from the substance of the productive classes; underneath, an immense population, holding no farther relation with this courtier aristocracy than a customary submission and the discharge of imposts. Between the court and the people interposed parliaments, possessing the power of administering justice and registering the royal volition. Authority is always disputed; when it is not so in the legitimate assemblies of the nation, it meets opposition in the very palace of the prince. By refusing to register the royal decrees, the parliaments stayed their efficacy, which abeyance was ended by a bed of justice, and some concession when the king was weak, and by an unreserved submission when the king was strong. Louis XIV. had no occasion even to concede a favour, for in his reign no parliament durst utter a remonstrance; he drew the nation at his heels, and it glorified him for the marvels which itself accomplished in war, in arts, and in sciences. The subjects and the prince were in perfect concord, and moved by an identical impulse. But Louis had scarcely expired, before the regent offered to the parliaments an opportunity for revenging their long degradation. The pleasure of the monarch, so reverenced in his lifetime, was contemned at his death, and his last will abrogated. Authority was then once more made the subject of contest; and a lengthened struggle ensued between the parliaments, the clergy, and the court, in sight of a nation exhausted by long wars and weary of contributing to the prodigality of its masters, given by turns to voluptuous excess and to a rage for war. Previously, its genius was exclusively displayed in ministering to the purposes and pleasure of the monarch; thenceforth, it directed its powers for its own advantage, and to the consideration of its own interests. The human mind moves incessantly from one object to another. From the theatre and the pulpit, the French genius was borne towards the moral and political sciences, and then all was changed. Let us conceive, during an entire age, the usurpers of all national rights tearing at each other for an emasculated authority; the parliaments fulminating against the clergy, and the clergy against the parliaments; these, again, contesting the power of the court; the court, careless and tranquil amidst the strife, calmly devouring the substance of the people, encompassed by the most alarming disorders; the nation, enriched and aroused, attentive to these divisions, arming itself with the avowals springing from mutual recrimination, deprived of all political action, dogmatising with boldness and ignorance, because it was limited to theories; eager, above all things, to recover its rank in Europe; and vainly offering its gold and its blood to resume a position which the imbecility of its rulers had lost it;—such was the eighteenth century.

The scandal had reached its height when Louis XVI., an equitable prince, moderate in his tastes, negligently educated, but impelled to good by a natural bias, mounted in the flower of life the throne of his ancestors (1774). He called to his side an old courtier* to take charge of his kingdom, and divided his confidence between Maurepas and the queen, a young princess of the house of Austria, lively, amiable, and exercising the greatest ascendancy over her consort. Maurepas and the queen were in hostility; the king, yielding sometimes to his minister, at others to his queen, early commenced his long career of vacillation. Aware of the state of his empire, he agreed with the philosophers on that point; but, reared in the strictest Christian principles, he entertained the greatest repugnance towards them. The public voice, loudly expressed, pointed out Turgot to him, one of the economists, a man of simplicity and virtue, endowed with a firm character, slow in forming his opinions but obstinate in maintaining them, and of profound reflection. Convinced of his probity, and charmed with his projects of reform, Louis XVI. was wont to repeat, "There are only myself and Turgot who are friends of the people." The reforms of Turgot miscarried through the resistance of the first orders in the state, interested in preserving all those abuses the austere minister designed to abrogate. The king dismissed him with regret. Throughout his life, which was but a long martyrdom, he had always the misfortune to be sensible of what was beneficial, sincerely to desire it, and to lack the force necessary to put it in execution.

The king, placed between the court, the parliaments, and the public, beset by intrigues and suggestions of every kind, changed his ministers with every gust. Giving way once more to the public voice, and the necessity for reforms, he called to the financial department Necker (1777), a Genevese, enriched by his labours as a banker, a partisan and disciple of Colbert, as Turgot was of Sully; a thrifty and upright financier, but vain and conceited, laying claim to the office of regulator in all things—religion, philosophy, and liberty, and, led astray by the eulogies of his friends and the public, flattering himself with capacity to lead and arrest the minds of others where his own stopped short.

Necker infused order into the deranged finances, and found means to meet the heavy expenditure of the American war. Less comprehensive in his grasp of intellect, but more flexible than Turgot, enjoying, above all, the confidence of capitalists, he procured for the moment unexpected resources, and succeeded in reviving credit. But something more than financial manœuvres was needed to terminate the embarrassments of the treasury, and he fell upon the expedient of reforms. The higher orders were not more accommodating to him than they had been to Turgot; the parliaments, apprised of his projects, united to oppose him, and drove him from the helm of affairs.

The conviction of abuses was universally entertained and proclaimed; the king himself was aware of them, and endured much anguish from the consideration. The courtiers, who prospered upon these abuses, would have willingly seen the financial difficulties removed, but not at the cost of a single sacrifice to themselves. They descanted much at court, and gave vent within its precincts to philosophical maxims; professed infinite sorrow for the vexations inflicted on the agriculturists whilst pursuing their darling chase; had been seen even to applaud the independence of America, and to receive with distinguished honour the young Frenchmen, when they returned from that scene of popular triumph. The parliaments likewise called lustily upon the public weal, set forth in sounding phrases the miseries of the poor, and yet opposed the equal distribution of the taxes, as well as the abolition of the remains of feudal barbarism. All spoke of the general welfare, few really desired it; and the people, not yet distinguishing their true friends, gave their voices to all who resisted power, their most apparent enemy.

By removing Turgot and Necker, the state of affairs had not been changed; the exigences of the exchequer were not the less urgent. Had not their very existence been threatened, had not the prodigality of the court seemed doomed to curtailment, the courtiers would have gladly submitted to a long prorogation of an appeal to national interference. The difficulty, got rid of for the moment by the displacement of a minister, by a loan, or by the forced enactment of a tax, soon re-appeared in an exaggerated form, like every neglected evil. They hesitated, as it always happens when a distasteful but necessary course is rendered incumbent. An intrigue carried M. de Calonne to the ministry—a person in little favour with the public on account of his share in the persecution of La Chalotais. Of sprightly temperament, and fertile in resources, Calonne relied upon his genius, upon fortune, and upon the co-operation of men, and contemplated the future with marvellous indifference. His doctrine was that premature alarm was foolish, and that it was time enough to discover an evil the day before it was proposed to remedy it. He gained the good graces of the court by his manners, moved it by his readiness to grant all that was asked, procured for the king and all around him a few blissful moments, and caused the gloomy presentiments that darkened every brow to be exchanged for smiles of joy and confidence.*

* "The selection which Louis XVI. made at his accession to the throne, of Maurepas, especially contributed to impart an irresolute, vacillating character to his reign. The young monarch, alive to his duties and his own inexperience, had recourse to the wisdom of an old man of seventy-three, who had been disgraced under Louis XV. for his opposition to the mistresses. But, instead of a sage, he found only a courtier, whose disastrous influence brooded over his whole life. He accustomed him to half measures, to changes of system, to fitful absurdities in the exercise of power, and more than all, to the habit, amounting to a necessity, of doing every thing through others, and nothing of himself."—Mignet's French Revolution.

This future, upon which such sanguine hopes were founded, drew portentously nigh; decisive measures could at last be no longer delayed. It was impossible to burden the people with additional taxes, and yet the public coffers were empty. Only one mode existed of remedying the mischief, and that was to reduce the expenditure by the suppression of all sinecures; should this expedient not prove sufficient, then to extend taxation over a larger contributing surface; or, in other words, to include the nobility and clergy in the fiscal fold. These projects, successively attempted by Turgot and Necker, and now resumed by Calonne, seemed to him capable of succeeding only by obtaining the consent of the privileged classes themselves. Calonne, therefore, conceived the idea of gathering them into one assembly, under the name of Notables, to lay before them his plans, and extract their consent by address or conviction. This assembly, which opened on the 22d February 1781, was composed of members taken from the nobility, the clergy, and the magistracy; of numerous masters of requests, and certain provincial functionaries. By means of this composite infusion, and more especially by the aid of the popular and philosophic nobles whom he took care to call, Calonne felt assured of carrying all before him.

The too confident minister deceived himself. In public opinion he was never forgiven for occupying the post of Turgot and Necker. Pleased at seeing a minister obliged to render accounts, the people supported the resistance of the notables. The most stormy discussions ensued. Calonne had the indiscretion to throw upon his predecessors, and partly upon Necker, the forlorn condition of the treasury. Necker retorted, was exiled, and the opposition became in consequence more vehement. Calonne met the storm with presence of mind and great composure. He caused M. de Miromenil, the keeper of the seals, to be dismissed for abetting the parliaments in their outcries. But his triumph lasted only for two days. The king, who was attached to him, had promised more than he could fulfil, when he engaged to support him. He was shaken by the representations of the notables, who undertook to accede to the plans of Calonne, but on condition that their execution should be intrusted to a minister less unscrupulous, and more worthy of confidence. The queen, by the advice of the Abbé de Vermont, proposed and induced the king to nominate a new minister, M. de Brienne, Archbishop of Toulouse, one of the notables, who had mainly contributed to the overthrow of Calonne, in the hope of succeeding him.*

The Archbishop of Toulouse, an obstinate and vain old man, had all his life been dreaming of the ministry, and pursued his darling object by every possible expedient. He rested his hopes chiefly upon his credit with the women, whom he assiduously courted, and succeeded in pleasing. He was accustomed to refer with exultation to his administration of Languedoc. If, on becoming minister, he did not obtain such general favour as would have been accorded to Necker, he had at least the merit of supplanting Calonne. At first he was not made prime minister, but he soon became so. Seconded by M. de Lamoignon, keeper of the seals, a bitter enemy to the parliaments, he opened his career under somewhat happy auspices. The notables, bound by their promises, consented with alacrity to all they had previously refused; a land-tax, a stamp-duty, the suppression of compulsive labour (corvées), and provincial assemblies, were granted with affected warmth. It was not to these measures, but to their author, they pretended to have been repugnant. Thus public opinion triumphed. Calonne was pursued with imprecations, and the notables enjoyed the public esteem; an honour they nevertheless regretted, when acquired at the expense of such great sacrifices. If M. de Brienne had known how to profit by his position; if he had executed with activity the measures sanctioned by the notables; if he had presented them in the aggregate, and on the instant, to the parliament when the adhesion of the higher orders was beyond recall, all had been accomplished perhaps: the parliament, pressed on all sides, would have agreed to every thing; and this concession, though partial and forced, would have in all probability long retarded the impending struggle.

No such course, however, was adopted. By imprudent delays, time was given for zeal to cool; the edicts were presented one after the other, and thus the parliament had opportunity to discuss, take courage, and recover from the sort of surprise in which the notables had been caught. It registered, after long debates, the edict for the abolition of compulsory labour, and another for allowing the free exportation of corn. Its antipathy was principally directed to the land-tax; but it was apprehensive that by its refusal the public would too clearly perceive the interested motives of its opposition. It was hesitating, when the embarrassment was removed by the edict for the stamp-duty being laid before it at the same time as that for the land-tax, and by opening the discussion with the former. It was thus enabled to refuse the first, without pronouncing upon the second; and by attacking the stamp-duty, which affected the great majority of tax-payers, it seemed to be the champion of public interests. During a sitting in which the peers were present, it denounced the abuses, the profligacy, and the prodigality of the court, and demanded states of expenses. An advocate, playing on the word, exclaimed, "It is not states, but states-general that we want." This unexpected cry struck every body with astonishment. People had hitherto resisted because they suffered acutely; they had aided all kinds of opposition, whether favourable or not to the popular cause, provided they were directed against the court, to which

* "Calonne was confident and sanguine, brilliant and skilful, fertile in resources, calm, and indifferent. His system of administration, whether designedly or otherwise, was diametrically opposed to that of his predecessor. Necker had been the advocate of economy, Calonne preached up prodigality; Necker had fallen by the arts of courtiers, Calonne rested on them for support. His sophisms were backed by largesses; he won the queen by fêtes, the great lords by pensions, and seduced even capitalists themselves, by displaying at first exemplary regularity in his liquidations."—MIGNET.

* Calonne was banished in 1788 to Lorraine, and joined the emigrant princes at Coblentz in 1791, after a short sojourn in England. After running to and fro for several years, he died at Paris in 1802. He was born at Douay.

every evil was attributed. But they scarcely knew what they should seek; they had always been so devoid of influence over the government, and so accustomed to confine themselves to complaints, that they kept murmuring without entertaining any idea of acting or provoking a revolution. A single word, opportunely uttered, suggested an unthought-of object; every one repeated it, and the states-general were vociferously demanded.

D'Espremenil, a young advocate, an impassioned orator, an agitator without purpose, a demagogue in the parliaments, an aristocrat in the states-general, and who was declared in a state of madness by a decree of the Constituent Assembly, exhibited himself on this occasion as one of the most violent of the parliamentary declaimers. But the opposition was secretly directed by Dupont, a young man gifted with a capacious mind, and possessed of great firmness and perseverance, who alone, perhaps, amidst the present troubles, had a future in view, and designed to lead his class, the court, and the nation, to an end very different from a parliamentary aristocracy.

The parliament was divided into old and young councillors. The first desired to form a counterpoise to the royal authority, in order to give weight and importance to their own body; the last, more ardent and disinterested, desired to introduce liberty into the state, without, however, overturning the political system under which they were born. In the mean time, a serious admission was made by the parliament; it acknowledged that it had no power to sanction taxes, and that to the states-general alone belonged the right to impose them. It likewise demanded from the king official statements of receipts and expenses.

This avowal of incompetence, and even of usurpation, might be justly considered extraordinary, since the parliament had hitherto arrogated to itself the right of warranting taxation. The ministry, irritated at such an opposition, instantly summoned the parliament to Versailles, and caused the two edicts to be registered in a bed of justice (6th August 1787). The parliament, on its return to Paris, entered solemn protests, and ordered prosecutions on account of the prodigalities of Calonne. An immediate decree of the council annulled its resolutions, and exiled it to Troyes. (15th August.)

Such was the position of affairs on the 15th August 1787. The two brothers of the king, Monsieur and the Count d'Artois, were sent, the one to the court of accounts and the other to the court of aids, to procure by them the registration of the edicts. The first had become popular from the opinions he had manifested in the assembly of the notables, and was hailed by the acclamations of an immense concourse of people, who escorted him back to the Luxembourg amidst universal applause. The Count d'Artois, being known to have supported Calonne, was assailed with murmurs, his attendants were attacked, and an armed force was found necessary for his protection.

The parliaments had a numerous dependancy around them, composed of lawyers, functionaries of the courts of justice, clerks, and students; an active stirring population, always ready to exert itself for their behoof. To those natural allies of the parliaments were joined the capitalists, who dreaded a national bankruptcy; the enlightened classes, who took part with all opposers; and finally, the multitude, which always follows at the heels of agitators. The disturbances were of a most serious description, and the executive had great difficulty in repressing them.

The parliament, sitting at Troyes, assembled daily, and called causes. Neither advocates nor attorneys appeared, and the course of justice was suspended, as had often happened during the century. The magistrates, however, grew weary of their exile, and M. de Brienne was without funds. He boldly asserted that he wanted none, and calmed the court, anxious only upon that one point; but he was in fact utterly destitute, and, unable to terminate the difficulties of his position by an energetic determination, he entered into a negotiation with certain members of the parliament. His conditions were a loan of 440 millions (about eighteen millions sterling), distributed over four years, at the expiration of which period the states-general should be convoked. On these terms, Brienne abandoned the two imposts, the causes of so many feuds. Assured of a few members, he thought himself equally certain of the whole body; and the parliament was recalled on the 10th September.

A royal sitting was held on the 20th of that month. The king came in person to present the edict containing provisions for the successive loan, and for the convocation of the states-general in five years. No explanation had been vouchsafed as to the nature of this sitting, and none knew whether it were intended as a bed of justice or not. A deep gloom sat on every countenance, and a profound stillness reigned; when the Duke of Orleans rose, his features agitated, and evincing all the symptoms of strong emotion, and addressing himself to the king, he asked him if the sitting were a bed of justice or a free assembly. "It is a royal sitting," replied the king. The councillors, Freteau, Sabatier, and D'Espremenil, spoke after the Duke of Orleans, and declaimed with their accustomed vehemence. The registration was forthwith enforced; Freteau and Sabatier were exiled to the Isle of Hyères, and the Duke of Orleans to Villers-Cotterets. The states-general were prorogued for five years.

Such were the principal events of the year 1787. The year 1788 was ushered in by fresh hostilities. On the 4th January, the parliament passed a resolution against arbitrary imprisonments (lettres de cachet), and for the recall of the persons exiled. The king quashed this resolution, and the parliament confirmed it anew.

In the mean time the Duke of Orleans was impatient under his exile at Villers-Cotterets. This prince, by his quarrel with the court, had enlisted public opinion in his behalf, though it had been at first unfavourable to him. Deficient equally in the dignity of a prince and the firmness of a tribune, he could not endure even so slight a punishment; and to procure his recall he descended to solicitations, even towards the queen, his personal enemy.

Brienne was exasperated at obstacles which he lacked the energy to overcome. Inefficient abroad against Prussia, to which he sacrificed Holland, and inefficient at home against the parliaments and nobles of the kingdom, the queen was his only prop; and, to add to his griefs, his labours were often suspended by bad health. He was incapable either of repressing insurrectionary movements or putting the retrenchments in force which had been ordered by the king; yet in spite of the imminent exhaustion of the exchequer, he affected an inconceivable serenity. However, in the midst of all his difficulties, he was not so distracted as to forget heaping additional benefices on himself, and new dignities on his family.

Lamoignon, the keeper of the seals, less feeble, but also less influential than the Archbishop of Toulouse, concerted with that prelate a new plan for striking at the political power of the parliaments; for that was the main object of the executive at this period. It was of the last importance to preserve secrecy. All was prepared in silence; private instructions were forwarded to the commanders of provinces, and the office where the edicts were set in types was surrounded with guards. It was intended that the project should be made known only at the moment of its communication to the parliaments. The time drew near, and rumours were rife that a great political act was in agitation. The Councillor D'Espremenil succeeded in seducing by bribery a journeyman printer, and obtaining a copy of the edicts. He immediately proceeded to the Palace of Justice, called together his colleagues, and boldly denounced the ministerial scheme. According to this plan, six great bailiwicks, established in the jurisdiction of the parliament of Paris, were destined to curtail its too extended authority; whilst the right of judging in the last resort, and of registering laws and edicts, was transferred to a plenary court, to be composed of peers, prelates, magistrates, and military officers, all selected by the king. The captain of the guards, even, was intended to have a deliberative voice in it. This project attacked the judicial functions of the parliament, and utterly annihilated its political power. The members, struck with amazement, knew not what course to adopt. They could not deliberate upon a project which had not been submitted to them, and yet it behoved them to take care they were not surprised. In this state of embarrassment, they decided upon a line of action at once strenuous and dexterous; this was to sum up and consecrate in a resolution all that they called the organic laws of the monarchy, not omitting to comprise in their number the existence and the rights of parliament. By this general declaration, they completely avoided any seeming anticipation of the government designs, and guaranteed all that they desired.

Consequently, on the 5th May, it was resolved by the parliament of Paris—

"That France was a monarchy governed by the king according to the laws; and that of these laws, several, which were fundamental, embraced and consecrated—1, the right of the reigning family to the throne, male after male, in the order of primogeniture; 2, the right of the nation freely to grant subsidies through the organ of the states-general, regularly convoked and composed; 3, the customs and capitulations of the provinces; 4, the irremovability of the magistrates; 5, the right of the courts to verify in each province the decrees of the king, and to ordain their registration when conformable to the constituent laws of the province, as well as to the fundamental laws of the state; 6, the right of every citizen never to be carried on any pretence before other judges than his natural judges, being those the law designed; and, 7, the right, without which all the others would be useless, of not being arrested, by any order whatsoever, unless to be handed over to the jurisdiction of the competent tribunal. And that the said court protested against every scheme which might be aimed at the principles above expressed."

The minister answered this energetic resolution by the usual expedient, always a bad and fruitless one; he wreaked his vengeance on certain members of the parliament. D'Espremenil and Goislart de Monsalbert, learning that they were personally menaced, sought an asylum in the bosom of the assembled body. An officer, Vincent d'Agoult, appeared at the head of a company, and not knowing the proscribed magistrates, called them by their names. At first a deep silence reigned in the assembly; but at length the councillors cried out that they were all D'Espremenils. The true D'Espremenil ultimately came forward, and followed the officer sent to arrest him. The tumult was then at its height; the people accompanied the magistrates, showering upon them benedictions. Three days afterwards, the king commanded the registration of the edicts in a bed of justice; and the assembled princes and nobles presented the image of that plenary court which was intended to supersede the parliaments.

The court of the Châtelet instantly passed a resolution against the edicts. The parliament of Rennes declared all those infamous who should enter the plenary court. At Grenoble, the inhabitants defended their magistrates against two regiments; the troops themselves, stimulated to mutiny by the nobles in the army, soon refused to act. When the commandant of Dauphiny assembled his colonels, to inquire if their soldiers might be trusted, they all preserved silence. The youngest, who was called upon to speak first, replied that he could not answer for his men, from the colonel downwards. The minister met all this resistance by decrees of the privy-council, which annulled the decisions of the sovereign courts; and he fulminated a sentence of exile against eight of them.

The court, goaded by the higher orders, who attacked it under cloak of the public welfare, abetting the intervention of the people, took counsel of its adversaries, and had recourse to the same expedient. It resolved to call the third-estate to its assistance, as the kings of France had formerly done to annihilate feudalism. It thereupon promoted, by all its influence, the convocation of the states-general. It instituted inquiries into the manner of assembling them; it invited authors and learned bodies to give their opinions; and, whilst the congregated clergy declared that it was necessary to hasten the period of their convocation, the court, entering the lists with promptitude, suspended the plenary court, and fixed the opening of the states-general for the 1st of May 1789 Then occurred the retirement of the Archbishop of Toulouse (24th August 1788), who, by his rash and feebly executed projects, had provoked a resistance, which he ought either never to have excited or to have boldly overcome. At his retreat from the administration, he left the exchequer in want, the dividends of the Hotel de Ville in suspension, all the authorities in antagonism, and all the provinces in arms. As to himself, invested with benefices yielding an income of 800,000 francs, with the archbishopric of Sens, and with a cardinal's purple, if he did not make the public fortune, he at all events made his own. As his last advice, he urged the king to recall Necker to the finance department, in order to take advantage of his popularity in meeting an opposition of so formidable a character.

It was during the two years 1787 and 1788, that the French people made the transition from vain theories to practical views. The contests amongst the high authorities had aroused the desire and presented the opportunity. In the course of the century, the parliament had assaulted the clergy, and exposed their papal tendencies; from the clergy it had proceeded to the court, proclaimed its abuses of power, and execrated its profligacy. Being threatened with reprisals, and rendered uneasy as to its own existence, it came at last to the determination of restoring to the nation those prerogatives the court would have torn from it, with the intention of conferring them on a new and extraordinary tribunal. After having thus apprised the nation of its rights, it had exerted its powers in stimulating and protecting insurrection. And on their respective parts, the dignified clergy, by issuing mandates, and the nobility, by fomenting the spirit of disobedience amongst the troops, had joined their efforts to those of the magistracy, and summoned the people to arms for the defence of their own peculiar privileges.

Pressed by so many enemies, the court had resisted but feebly. Alive to the necessity of acting, and yet always deferring the moment, it had occasionally removed certain abuses, rather to profit the treasury than the people, and had forthwith relapsed into inertion. At last, when stormed in its stronghold from every quarter, and when it perceived that the higher orders called the people to the combat, it had resolved to take the initiative in leading them to the field by convoking the states-general. Opposed during the whole course of the century to the philosophical spirit, it now made an appeal to that great antagonist, and gave up to its examination the constitutions of the realm. Thus, the first authorities in the state presented the singular spectacle of wrongous holders, disputing a possession in presence of the legitimate owner, and ending by appealing to him as their judge.

Affairs were at this pass when Necker returned to the ministry. Confidence attended him, credit was instantaneously restored, and the most pressing difficulties were got rid of. He provided by temporary expedients for indispensable expenses, whilst waiting for the states-general, the universally anticipated panacea.

Already important questions relative to their organisation, began to be agitated. The part to be borne therein by the third-estate was the subject of lively discussion, involving the points, whether it should appear on a footing of equality or subordination; whether it should possess a representation numerically equal to that of the two first orders; whether the votes should be taken individually or by orders, and whether the commons should have only one voice against the two voices of the nobles and the clergy.

The first question to be settled was the number of the deputies. No philosophical controversy of the eighteenth century, however warm, had excited an agitation of equal violence. The vast actual importance of the point gave a zest to its discussion, which inflamed the whole nation. One concise, forcible, caustic writer, gained a rank in this contest which the great minds of the century had procured in philosophical warfare. The Abbé Sieyes, in a work which gave an extraordinary impulse to the public mind, inquired, "What is the third estate?" And he answered, "Nothing." "What ought it to be?—Everything."

The states of Dauphiny assembled in spite of the court. The two first orders, more sagacious and of more popular tendencies in that province than any where else, decided that the representation of the third-estate should be equal to that of the nobility and clergy. The parliament of Paris, already discerning the consequences of its imprudent provocations, clearly perceived that the third-estate would come, not as an auxiliary, but as a master; and on registering the edict of convocation, it enjoined by an express clause the observance of the forms of 1614, which utterly annihilated the influence of the third-estate. Having previously endangered its popularity by the difficulties it had opposed to the edict which restored civil immunities to the Protestants, it was on this occasion completely unmasked, and the court fully avenged. It was the first to experience the instability of popular favour; but if the nation, in after times, might appear ungrateful to the leaders whom it abandoned one after the other, it was now perfectly justified towards the parliament, for it stopped short before the nation had recovered any one of its rights.

The court, not venturing of itself to decide these important questions, or rather wishing to render the first orders unpopular for its own advantage, determined to ask their opinions, intending at the same time not to heed them should they be, as was probable, unfavourable to the third-estate. It therefore convoked a new assembly of notables, in which all the questions touching the constitution of the states-general were brought forward for discussion.* The debates were animated; on one side old traditions were relied upon, on the other, natural rights and reason. Even in appealing to traditions, the cause of the commons had the vantage-ground; for, to the forms of 1614, upon which such stress was laid by the higher orders, forms yet more ancient were opposed. Thus, in certain meetings, and upon certain points, the votes had been taken by tale; sometimes the deliberations had been by provinces instead of by orders; and frequently the deputies of the third-estate had equalled in number the deputies of the nobility and clergy. How then were these ancient usages to be reconciled? In truth, the powers of the state had been in a constant state of revolution. The royal authority itself, first supreme, then humbled and stripped, rising afresh by the aid of the people, and concentrating all powers in itself, presented an aspect of perpetual strife, and an ever-varying limit of possession. It was justly said to the clergy, that if reference to the olden time were decisive, they would be no longer an order; to the nobles, that the possessors of fiefs alone, by the same test, were eligible to sit, and that thus the majority of them would be excluded from the deputation; to the parliaments themselves, that they were but unfaithful officers of the crown;—in a word, to the whole of them, that the French constitution was but a long revolution, in the course of which each power had successively predominated; that all had been a series of innovations, and that in the present mighty conflict reason alone ought to decide.

The third-estate comprehended almost the entirety of the nation—all the productive, useful, and enlightened classes;* if it held only a portion of the lands, it at all events rendered the whole of them fruitful; and, according to reason, it was simply fair that it should have a numerical equality in the representation with the two other orders.

The assembly of notables pronounced against what it called the doubling of the third-estate. A single committee, over which Monsieur, the king's brother, presided, gave its suffrage for this doubling. Thereupon the court, taking into consideration, as it said, "the opinion of the minority and of several princes of the blood, the desire of the three orders of Dauphiny, the prayer of the provincial assemblies, the example of divers countries possessing similar institutions, the opinion of various publicists, and the hope expressed in a great number of addresses," ordained that the total number of the deputies should be at least one thousand; that they should be chosen upon a combined basis of population and contribution in each bailiwick; and that the number of deputies from the third-estate should be equal to that from the two higher orders united. (Decree in council, 27th December 1788.)

This declaration excited universal enthusiasm. Being attributed to Necker, it greatly augmented his favour with the nation, and his odium with the magnates. Still, nothing was decided in this document as to the vote by members or by orders; but it practically comprehended the solution of the question, for it was useless to increase the voices if they were not to be counted; and it left to the third-estate itself the charge of carrying, by a forcible demonstration, what was withheld for the moment. Thus it gave a striking idea of the weakness of the court and of Necker himself. In fact, this court was swayed by such a multiplicity of wills, that any decisive resolution was almost impossible. The king was moderate, just, well-disposed, and only too doubtful of his own judgment; really loving the people and forward to receive their complaints; he was, nevertheless, at times beset by panics and superstitious fears, and thought he saw anarchy and impiety stalking alongside of liberty and toleration. The philosophical spirit, at its first burst, was sure to wander into extravagance, and a timid and religious prince was equally sure to take alarm. Terrors, doubts, and imbecile emotions, perpetually working on his mind, the unfortunate Louis XVI., prepared for all sacrifices affecting himself, but incapable of imposing them on others, the victim of his easy disposition towards the court and his deference towards the queen, had to expiate numberless faults not of his own commission, but which became his because he had allowed them to be committed. The queen, fond of pleasure, and exerting around her the magic influence of her charms, was wishful that her husband should enjoy tranquillity, that the exchequer should be well filled, and that she herself should reign in all hearts. Sometimes she was in unison with the king upon the subject of reforms, when their necessity appeared urgent, and at other times, on the contrary when she imagined authority menaced, or her court-

* This assembly opened at Versailles on the 6th November, and closed its session on the 8th December following.

* "'The third-estate is the French nation, less the nobility and clergy.' In this phrase consists the whole groundwork of M. Sieyes' pamphlet."—Guizot's History of Civilisation.

parasites despoiled, she stopped the king, dismissed the popular ministers, and destroyed every means and every hope of good. She was mainly swayed by the counsels of a part of the nobility, who clung around the throne and fattened on grants and abuses. This court nobility was unquestionably desirous, like the queen herself, that the king should not lack the means of prodigality; and from this motive it was highly indignant at the parliaments when they refused taxes, but became their upholder when they defended its own interests, by the rejection, under specious pretexts, of the land-tax. In the midst of these contrary influences, the king, afraid to face his difficulties, to condemn the abuses, or to abrogate them of his own accord, yielded alternately to the court and to opinion, and never satisfied either the one or the other.

If, in the course of the eighteenth century, when the philosophers, gathered in a passage of the Tuileries, were offering up vows for Frederick and the Americans, for Turgot and for Necker; if, when their ambition was not directed to govern the state, but simply to enlighten princes, and a glimpse of distant revolutions, which the symptoms of discontent and the absurdity of the institutions were sufficiently unequivocal to deduce as probable, was all that floated before them—if, at that period, the king had spontaneously established a certain equality in burdens, and given a few guarantees, all had been hushed for a long time, and Louis XVI. would have been adored as another Marcus Aurelius. But when all the authorities in the kingdom were degraded by a lengthened struggle amongst themselves, and all the abuses laid bare by the assembly of notables; when the nation, called into the quarrel, had conceived the hope, and formed the determination, of vindicating its own importance; the opportunity was suffered to pass away, and the national will became imperious. The states-general were then promised, and the nation insisted that the period of convocation should be hastened; the demand granted, it claimed to wield the preponderance therein; this was refused, but, by doubling its representation, the means of enforcing it were secured. Thus, therefore, concessions were always made ungraciously, and never but when they could be no longer withheld; but now the national strength was increased and felt, and it aspired to all it thought within its reach. A constant resistance, irritating its ambition, was sure in time to render it inexorable and insatiable. But even then, if a great minister, infusing some degree of vigour into the king, conciliating the queen, and awing the privileged classes, had forestalled and promptly satisfied the national demands, by proffering a free constitution; if he had occupied that craving for action felt by the nation, by calling it without delay, not to remodel the state, but to discuss its yearly affairs in an assembly already constituted, it is very probable the contest might have been averted. To be beforehand with the crisis, instead of having to succumb to it, was the essential point, and above all, to have sacrificed various obnoxious pretensions. A man of strong conviction, and of a determination equal to his conviction, would have alone sufficed for the emergency; and such a man, certainly audacious, potential, overbearing perhaps, would have scared the court out of its senses, and been treated to a speedy dismissal. But, as it was, in order to conciliate both opinion and old interests at once, half-measures were adopted by the reigning influence, and, as we have seen, a minister, something of a philosopher, and partially bold and energetic, was chosen, who undoubtedly enjoyed a prodigious popularity, since at that time moderately popular tendencies in an agent of power surpassed expectation, and excited enthusiasm amongst a people whom the most violent demagogues were shortly scarce able to satisfy.

The people were in an universal ferment. Assemblies were formed throughout France after the example of England, and under the English appellation, that of clubs. In them were canvassed the abuses to suppress, the reforms to effect, and the constitution to establish. The effect of a severe examination into the condition of the country was the more fiercely to exasperate the mind, for in truth its political and social state was perfectly intolerable. Every thing was monopoly in individuals, classes, towns, provinces, and even trades. Shackles were upon all that appertained to the industry and the genius of man. Civil, ecclesiastical, and military dignities were exclusively reserved to certain classes, and in those classes to certain individuals. No profession could be embraced, except upon certain qualifications and certain pecuniary conditions. The towns had their privileges for the settlement, the collection, and the quota of taxation, and for the choice of magistrates. The very sinecures were converted by reversions into family properties, and the monarch had but little power to indulge in preferences. Only a few pecuniary gifts remained at his disposition; and so trammelled was he in this respect, that the Duke de Coigny maintained against him that he had no power to suppress a useless office. Every thing, therefore, was stagnant in a few hands, and in every quarter the smaller number was in hostile array against the plundered mass. Burdens pressed upon a single class alone. The nobility and clergy possessed nearly two-thirds of the lands; the other third, held by the commons, paid taxes to the king, a multitude of feudal dues to the nobles, tithes to the clergy, and suffered, in addition, the devastations of noble sportsmen and of the game. Articles of consumption being heavily taxed, were enhanced in price, and injuriously affected the largest body, namely, the people. The collection likewise was vexatious: the nobles remained in arrear with perfect impunity, but the people, on the contrary, were maltreated, immured, and condemned to expiate in their persons a deficiency in fortune. Thus they sustained in affluence, by oppressive toil, and defended, at the expense of their blood, those higher classes of society which denied to them the very means of existence. The burgher class, industrious, enlightened, less unhappy, doubtless, than the people, but enriching the kingdom by industrial labours, and illustrating it by eminent talents, possessed none of those immunities to which it had so undoubted a right. Justice, administered in some of the provinces by the nobles, and in the royal jurisdictions by magistrates elevated to the judicial bench by purchase, was tardy, often partial, always ruinous, and in criminal prosecutions absolutely atrocious. Individual liberty was violated by arbitrary warrants of arrest (lettres de cachet), and the liberty of the press by royal censors. Finally, France itself, ill supported abroad, betrayed by Louis XV.'s courtezans, and compromised by the imbecility of Louis XVI.'s ministers, had been recently dishonoured in the eyes of Europe by the disgraceful sacrifice of Holland and Poland.

Already the popular masses began to be agitated: even during the parliamentary contest frequent riots had occurred, and at the retirement of the Archbishop of Toulouse such troubles became more serious. His effigy had been burnt, the armed force insulted and even assaulted, and the agitators feebly prosecuted by the magistracy. The minds of men, violently stimulated, and impressed with a confused idea of an impending revolution, were in a continual buzz of excitement. The parliaments and higher orders even thus early experienced the thrusts of those weapons they had given to the people. In Brittany, the nobility had declared against the doubling of the third-estate, and refused to nominate deputies. The burghers, who had so strenuously aided it against the court, thereupon rose against it, and bloody conflicts ensued. The court, not yet sufficiently avenged upon the Breton nobility, had not only denied it succour, but even incarcerated some of its members who had come to Paris with complaints.

The elements themselves seemed unbridled. A hail-storm on the 13th July had laid waste the crops, and rendered the provisioning of Paris extremely difficult, especially amidst the troubles in agitation. All the activity of commerce scarcely sufficed to concentrate the necessary quantity of food in that immense metropolis, and just apprehensions were entertained that it would be shortly impossible to furnish subsistence to its population, when political conflicts should shatter confidence and interrupt the communications. Since the severe winter which followed the dismal reverses of Louis XIV., and immortalised the charity of Fénélon, none so rigorous had been witnessed as that of 1788-89. The benevolence, which was displayed in the most touching manner, was inadequate to mitigate the sufferings of the people. From all the corners of France a number of vagabonds, without profession or resources, had flocked to Versailles and Paris, and paraded their wretchedness and nakedness on the streets and highways. At the least disturbance they were seen to rush eagerly forward, to profit by chances always favourable to those who have all to gain, even to their daily bread.

Thus all things concurred to promote a revolution. An entire century had contributed to unfold abuses, and drive them to the pitch of aggravation. The last two years had served to excite revolt, and to accustom the popular masses to arms, by the appeal to their intervention in the quarrels of the privileged orders. Finally, the scourges of unpropitious nature, and a fortuitous concourse of adverse circumstances, provoked the catastrophe, the era of which might be retarded, but was sooner or later inevitable.

In the midst of these portents, the elections occurred. In some provinces they were tumultuous, in all active; but in Paris calm, since great unanimity of sentiment prevailed in that city. Lists were distributed, and endeavours made to act in unison, and in a spirit of mutual concession. Merchants, advocates, and men of letters, surprised at beholding themselves gathered together for the first time, gradually rose to the comprehension of liberty. At Paris, they themselves re-nominated the committees formed by the king, and, without changing the persons, gave efficacy to their authority by their own confirmation. The learned Bailly quitted his retreat at Chaillot; unused to intrigues, and profoundly moved at his noble mission, he proceeded alone and on foot to the assembly. As he went, he tarried for a moment on the terrace of the Feuillants: a young man unknown to him saluted the philosopher with respect. "You will be elected," said he. "I know not," replied Bailly; "the honour ought to be neither solicited nor refused." The modest academician resumed his walk, appeared in the assembly, and was successively named elector and deputy.

The election of the Count de Mirabeau was stormy: repudiated by the nobility, and welcomed by the third-estate, he convulsed Provence, the seat of his nativity, and soon exhibited himself at Versailles.

The court took no measures to influence the elections: it was not sorry to see a great number of parish priests chosen, as it made sure of their opposition to the great ecclesiastical dignitaries, and at the same time of their reverence for the throne. Besides, it was not overburdened with prescience; and the deputies of the commons appeared to it the opponents of the nobility rather than of itself. The Duke of Orleans was accused of strenuous efforts to procure the election of his partisans, as well as of himself. Already marked amongst the adversaries of the court, the ally of the parliaments, invoked as a leader, by his own connivance or otherwise, by the popular party, various intrigues were imputed to him. A deplorable scene took place in the faubourg Saint Antoine; and as an author must be found for every important event, he was held responsible for the present. A manufacturer of stained paper, by name Réveillon, who by his superior skill maintained large workshops, improved native art, and furnished subsistence to three hundred labourers, was charged with a design to reduce wages one-half. A mob threatened to burn down his house. It was dispersed, but collected again the following day (27th April), when the house was carried, set on fire, and completely gutted. Notwithstanding the menaces held out by the assailants on the previous day, and the open agreement to congregate on the morrow, the authorities interfered with great tardiness, and, when they did so, acted with excessive rigour. They waited until the mob was in possession of the house, then made a furious attack upon it, and were compelled to kill several of those ferocious and intrepid men, who afterwards showed themselves upon all occasions, and who received the name of brigands.

All the parties that had already taken form accused each other: the court was reproached with its early slowness and subsequent butchery; it was alleged that it had desired to draw the people into violence, in order to make an example, and give exercise to the soldiers. Money being found on the rioters, and certain words which fell from some of them, originated the suspicion that they were stimulated and led by a secret hand; and the enemies of the popular party charged the Duke of Orleans with having designed to make a trial of these revolutionary bandits.

This prince was born with many excellent qualities, and had inherited an immense patrimony; but, abandoning himself to evil habits, he had abused all these gifts of nature and fortune. Without consistency of character, alternately reckless of opinion and greedy of popularity, he was bold and ambitious one day, submissive and indifferent the next. Having quarrelled with the queen, he had declared enmity against the court. When parties began to be formed, he had allowed his name, and, as it was said, his wealth, to be made use of. Indulging in some vague future, he did enough to found accusations, not enough to succeed; and if his partisans really entertained any projects, he must have ruined them by his inconstancy of purpose.

CHAPTER II.

THE STATES-GENERAL.

The moment for the assembling of the states-general was at last arrived. With a sense of their common danger, the higher orders, making their peace with the court, rallied round the princes of the blood and the queen. They endeavoured to gain the country gentlemen by a show of courtesy, whilst they laughed at their rusticity behind their backs. The clergy strove to captivate the plebeians of their order, and the military nobility to win those belonging to the army. The parliaments, which had looked forward to the post of chief influence in the states-general, began to fear that their ambition had miscalculated. The deputies of the third-estate, strong in the superiority of talent, and in the energetic language of their instructions, fortified by continual intercourse, and stimulated by the very doubts which were expressed of the success of their efforts, were resolute in their determination not to yield.

The king alone, who had not enjoyed an interval of repose since his accession to the throne, beheld in the states-general the termination of embarrassments. Although jealous of his authority, rather for his children, to whom he thought himself bound to leave an unbroken patrimony, than for himself, he was by no means loath to surrender a portion to the nation, and throw upon it some of the difficulties of government. Thus he made preparations for this great assembly with alacrity and joy. A hall was made ready with all haste. The costumes even were arranged, and a humiliating etiquette imposed upon the third-estate. Men are not less jealous of their dignity than of their rights; and with justifiable pride, the instructions forbade the deputies to demean themselves by any degrading ceremonial. This new fault of the court sprang, like all the others, from the wish to maintain the symbol at least, when the substance was already gone. It was certain to cause deep irritation at a moment when, before joining battle, the parties paused in a mutual survey.

A solemn procession took place on the 4th May, the eve of the opening. The king, the three orders, and all the dignitaries of the state, marched to the church of Notre-Dame in Versailles. The court manifested an extraordinary magnificence. The two first orders were superbly apparelled. All the princes, dukes, peers, gentry, and prelates, were clothed in purple, and wore plumed hats on their heads. The deputies of the commons, clad in simple black mantles, followed in the rear, and, in spite of their unpretending exterior, appeared formidable by their number and their anticipated might. It was remarked, that the Duke of Orleans, placed in the last rank of the nobility, affected to remain behind and mingle with the first deputies of the commons.

This national, military, and religious pomp, the solemn chants, the warlike instruments, and above all, the grandeur of the event, made a profound impression on the hearts of all. The discourse of the Bishop of Nanci, replete with generous sentiments, was applauded with enthusiasm, notwithstanding the presence of the king and the sanctity of the place. Such assemblies tend to elevate the soul, to wean men from selfishness, and draw them into closer brotherhood: a general rapture was diffused, and more than one heart felt an irresistible impulse to dispel its lurking animosities, and melt into emotions of philanthropy and patriotism.*

The opening of the states-general occurred on the following day, the 5th May 1789. The king was seated on an elevated throne, the queen near him, the court in galleries, the two first orders on each side, the third-estate in the background of the hall and upon lower benches. A murmur arose at sight of the Count de Mirabeau; but his gaze and bearing awed the disturbers. The third-estate wore their hats as well as the other orders, contrary to established precedent. The king delivered a speech, in which he recommended disinterestedness to some, wisdom to others, and to all he spoke of his love for the people. The keeper of the seals, Barentin, afterwards pronounced a discourse, and was followed by Necker, who read a memorial upon the state of the kingdom, in which he descanted largely upon the finances, proclaimed a deficit of fifty-six millions, and wearied with his verbosity those who were not disgusted with his egotism.

It was prescribed that each order should, on the morrow, repair to the locality fixed for it. Besides the common hall, which was sufficiently capacious to contain the three united orders, two other chambers had been erected for the nobility and clergy. The common hall was appropriated to the third-estate, which had thus the advantage, whilst in its own locality, of being also in that of the states-general. The first operation to go through was the verification of the powers, and it was of importance to decide whether it should take place in common, or separately by orders. The deputies of the third-estate, alleging that it behoved each division of the states-general to be assured of the legitimacy of the other two, demanded the verification in common. The nobility and clergy, anxious

* I would not have cited the following passage from the Memoirs of Ferrières, if base detractors had not sought to misrepresent all the scenes of the French Revolution. The extract I am about to present will give an idea of the effect which the national solemnities of that great epoch produced on minds the least plebeian.

"I yield to the pleasure of here recording the impression that this august and touching ceremony made upon me; I will copy the account that I wrote down at the time, when still full of what I had felt. If this relation be not historical, it will possess with some readers perhaps a more lively interest.

The nobles in black coats, vests and facings of cloth of gold, silk mantles, lace cravats, plumed hats, turned up à la Henri IV.; the clergy in cassocks, large cloaks, square caps; the bishops with their purple robes and lawn sleeves; the commons dressed in black, cloaks of silk, and cambric cravats. The king was seated on a platform, richly decorated; Monsieur, the Count d'Artois, the princes, the ministers, and the great officers of the crown, were seated below the king; the queen sat opposite him; Madame, the Countess d'Artois, the princesses, and the ladies of the court, all superbly dressed and covered with diamonds, composed around her a magnificent cortége. The streets were hung with tapestries of the crown; the regiments of French and Swiss guards formed a line from Notre-Dame to St Louis; an immense concourse gazed at us passing in respectful silence; the balconies were ornamented with precious stuffs, the windows filled with spectators of both sexes and of all ages, with beautiful women elegantly attired. The variety of fashions and costumes, the amiable emotions depicted on every countenance, the joy sparkling in every eye, the clapping of hands, the expressions of sympathy, the eager looks which met us and followed us even after we were out of sight—all presented a ravishing, an enchanting picture, which I would vainly strive to embody in words. Bands of music, stationed at intervals, made the air resound with melodious tones; the martial tunes, the roar of drums, the clang of trumpets, the solemn chant of the priests, heard in turn without discordance, without confusion, animated the triumphant march to the temple of the Eternal.

Shortly plunged into the sweetest ecstacy, sublime but melancholy thoughts offered themselves to my mind. France, my country, I saw, leaning on religion, saying to us, 'Cease your puerile quarrels; now is the decisive moment which is to give me a new existence, or extinguish me for ever!' Love for my country, how thou spokest to my heart then! What! disturbers, ambitious fools, vile intriguers, seek in their crooked policy to disunite my country!—they will found their destructive systems on insidious pretences; they will say to thee, thou hast two interests; and all thy glory and all thy power, so envied by thy neighbours, will be scattered as a light vapour borne upon a southern breeze. No, I pronounce before thee the oath—may my withered tongue cling to my palate, if ever I forget thy grandeur and solemnities!

How religious ceremonies enhanced the lustre of this mere human pomp! Without thee, venerable religion, it had been but a vain parade of mortal pride; but thou purifiest and sanctifiest, thou aggrandisest grandeur itself! The kings, the mighty of the age, also render, if even with feigned reverence, their homage to the King of kings. Yes, to God alone belongs honour, empire, glory. These holy ceremonies, these songs, these priests in garbs of sacrifice, these perfumed odours, this glittering canopy, this sun streaming in golden and jewelled rays—I called to mind the words of the prophet: 'Daughters of Jerusalem, your king comes; take your nuptial garments and run to greet him.' Tears of joy gushed from my eyes. My God, my country, my countrymen had become me—one.

Arrived at St Louis, the three orders seated themselves on benches placed in the nave. The king and queen took their places under a canopy of azure velvet, sprinkled with golden fleurs-de-lis; the princes, princesses, great officers of the crown, and ladies of the palace, occupied the inclosure reserved for their majesties. The holy sacrament was borne upon the altar to the sound of the most impressive music. There was an Oh Salutaris Hostia. This hymn, so natural and truthful, melodious, freed from the noise of instruments which smother the expression; this exquisite harmony of voices, swelling and rising to the heavens, confirmed me that the simple is always beautiful, always grand, always sublime. Men are fools, in their vain wisdom, to treat with ridicule the worship that is offered to the Eternal. How can they behold with indifference that moral chain which unites man to God—which renders the deity visible to the eye, sensible to the touch? M. de la Fare, Bishop of Nanci, pronounced the discourse. Religion constitutes the strength of empires; religion causes the happiness of nations. This truth, which no wise man ever for a moment doubted, was not the important question to treat in this august assembly; the place, the circumstance, opened a yet vaster field: the Bishop of Nanci either durst or could not traverse it.

The following day the deputies met in the hall of the Menus. The assembly was not less imposing, or the spectacle less magnificent than the day before."—Memoirs of the Marquis de Ferrières, vol. i. p. 18.

to maintain the division of the orders, argued that each ought to constitute itself separately. This question did not comprehend that of voting individually or otherwise, for the powers might be verified in common, and the deliberations be subsequently pursued apart; but still it bore considerable resemblance thereto, and from the very first day it provoked a dispute which it required little foresight to have anticipated, and small ability to have prevented, by deciding the question beforehand. But the court never had the courage to refuse or to grant what was just, and it furthermore flattered itself with the hope of ruling by promoting divisions.

The deputies of the third-estate remained assembled in the common hall, abstaining from all action, and waiting, as they said, for the junction of their colleagues. The nobility and clergy, seated in their respective chambers, proceeded to deliberate upon the verification. The clergy voted the separate verification by a majority of 133 to 114, and the nobility by one of 188 to 114. The commons, persisting in their inaction, continued on the following day their conduct of the preceding one. They adhered to the plan of avoiding every measure which might be construed into an acknowledgment of their constitution as a distinct order. Accordingly, when deputing certain of their members to the two other chambers, they took care not to give them any express commission. They were sent to the nobility and clergy simply to notify to them that they waited for them in the common hall. The nobility were not sitting at the moment, but the clergy were assembled, and offered to appoint commissioners to reconcile the disputes that had arisen. They consequently adopted that course, and invited the nobility to follow their example. In this preliminary contest, the clergy evinced a very different spirit from the nobles. Amongst all the privileged classes, they had suffered most from the attacks of the eighteenth century; their political existence had been disputed, and they were disunited from the numerous body of simple priests included in their delegation. Besides, their bounden part was to invoke moderation and the spirit of peace, and, in accordance therewith, they proffered, as we have seen, a species of mediation.

The nobility, on the contrary, rejected all negotiation by refusing to name commissioners. Less prudent than the clergy, less dubious of their rights, and not holding themselves bound to moderation, but rather to an overbearing demeanour, they fulminated repudiations and menaces. Those very men who pardoned no passion in others, gave unlimited play to their own, and obeyed the impulse, like most large bodies, of the most violent spirits. Cazales and D'Espremenil, recently ennobled, carried the adoption of inflammatory motions, which they drew up beforehand in private meetings. It was in vain that a minority, composed of men either more sagacious or more prudently ambitious, attempted to reason with these fiery nobles; they would listen to no remonstrance, but spoke of fighting and dying, as they asserted, for the laws and justice. The commons, immovable in their purpose, received all these outrages with exemplary calmness; they brooded in silence upon their injuries, exhibiting the prudence and firmness of all powers at their commencement, and gaining the applause of those galleries, first of all appropriated to the court, but soon usurped by the public.

Several days had already elapsed. The clergy had attempted to ensnare the commons, by proposing to draw them into certain acts, which would have given them the character of a constituted order. But they had constantly rejected the overtures; and, adopting only such measures as were indispensable to their internal regulation, they had limited their action to the choice of a dean and assistants, in order to collect the votes. They refused to open letters addressed to them, and declared themselves to form, not an order, but an assembly of citizens met by virtue of a legitimate authority in expectation of other citizens.

The nobility, after having declined to appoint negotiators, consented at last to delegate members to confer with the other orders; but the commission intrusted to them became inoperative, because they were charged to declare at the same time that the decision of the 6th May, which enjoined the separate verification, would be persisted in. The clergy, on the contrary, faithful to their function, had suspended the verification already commenced in their own chamber, and pronounced themselves unconstituted, until the issue of the conferences to be held by the commissioners. These conferences were opened; the clergy took no part in the discussion; the deputies of the commons exposed their reasons with calmness, those of the nobility with violence. They separated more embittered by the dispute; and the third-estate, with its determination to yield nothing, was certainly not displeased to learn that all arrangement was become impossible. The nobility heard its commissioners give daily assurance that they had been superior in argument, and its arrogance swelled at the reports. By a fleeting gleam of prudence, the two first orders passed a resolution that they renounced their pecuniary privileges. The commons accepted the concession, but swerved not from their inaction, still always claiming the common verification. The conferences were continued, and a proposition was at length made that, in order to accommodate the differences, the powers should be verified by commissioners chosen from the three orders. The delegates of the nobility declared, in the name of their order, its refusal to accede to this arrangement, and withdrew without fixing a day for any fresh conference. The negotiation was thus at an end. The same day, the nobility came to a resolution, by which it declared once more that the verification should, for this session, be made separately, leaving to the states the task of determining upon any other mode for the future. This resolution was communicated to the commons on the 27th May. The states had met on the 5th, therefore twenty-two days had elapsed without any thing being done. It was high time to determine this state of things. Mirabeau, who gave the impulse to the popular party, pressed upon attention that an immediate decision was incumbent, and that it was absolutely necessary to commence the public business, which had been too long delayed. He proposed, therefore, in consequence of the known resolution of the nobles, to summon the clergy to give an immediate explanation, and declare at once whether they would or would not join the commons. The proposition was instantly adopted. The Deputy Target set out at the head of a numerous deputation, and proceeded to the hall of the clergy. "The commons invite the clergy," said he, "in the name of the God of peace, and in that of the national interest, to unite with them in the hall of the assembly, to deliberate on the means of securing concord, so necessary at this moment to the safety of the commonwealth." The clergy were struck by these solemn words; many of them responded with acclamations, and wished to accept the invitation upon the instant; but they were prevented, and the members of the commons were answered that their message would be taken into consideration. On the return of the deputation, the third-estate, inexorable in its determination, resolved to prolong the sitting until the answer of the clergy was received. This answer not arriving, a message was sent, intimating that it was impatiently awaited. The clergy complained of being hurried, and demanded that the necessary time should be granted them. They were answered with moderation, that they could consume as much time as they thought fit, and that their decision would be waited for, if it were necessary, all day and all night.

The position was critical. The clergy were aware that after their decision was pronounced, the commons would proceed to work, and take a decisive part. They wished to temporise, in order to concert measures with the court, and therefore asked until the next day, which delay was granted with reluctance. The following day, the king, now so desired by the two first orders, determined to interfere. At this period, all the enmities of the court and the higher orders began to be forgotten, at sight of that popular power which was rising with such formidable rapidity. The king, then, coming forward in the extremity, invited the three orders to resume the conferences in presence of his keeper of the seals. The third-estate, whatever may be said of its projects, which have been judged in reference to events, did not push its hopes beyond a limited monarchy. Knowing the intentions of Louis XVI., it was full of respect for him; and besides, being unwilling to injure its cause by any wrong, it answered that, from deference to the king, it consented to the resumption of the conferences, though, after the declarations of the nobility, they must be considered hopeless. To this reply it appended an address, which it deputed its dean to deliver to the monarch. This dean was Bailly, a man simple and virtuous, illustrious for his merit, learning, and modesty, who had been suddenly transported from the noiseless studies of his cabinet to the tumult of civil discord. Chosen to preside over a large assembly, he had felt alarm at so novel a task, believed himself unworthy to perform it, and submitted to it only from a sense of duty. But, rising at once to the exigences of the crisis, he found in himself an unexpected firmness and presence of mind; amidst so many conflicts, he vindicated the majesty of the assembly, and acted for it with all the dignity of virtue and reason.

Bailly had the greatest difficulty in reaching the king. When he insisted upon being introduced, the courtiers objected that he had not paid due respect to the grief of the monarch, afflicted by the demise of the dauphin. At last he was presented, avoided all humiliating ceremonial, and evinced equal firmness and respect. The king received him with kindness, but without explaining his intentions.

The government, having already decided upon submitting to some sacrifices to gain supplies, hoped, by keeping the orders in opposition, to become their arbiter, to wrest from the nobility its pecuniary privileges with the aid of the third-estate, and to curb the ambition of the latter by means of the nobility. As to the nobles, being supremely indifferent to the embarrassments of the administration, and thinking only of the sacrifices in store for themselves, they wished to provoke the dissolution of the states-general, and render their convocation fruitless. The commons, whom the court and higher orders refused to recognise under that title, and always styled the third-estate, continually acquired fresh strength, and, determined as they were to brave all dangers, were steadfast in their resolution not to allow an occasion which might never return to slip from their grasp.

The conferences requested by the king were held. The envoys of the nobility started difficulties upon every point, such as the title of Commons, which the third-estate had assumed, and the form and signature of the minutes. At last, they entered upon the discussion, and they were almost reduced to silence by the reasons brought against them, when Necker proposed, on the king's part, a new mode of reconciliation. By this project, each order was to examine its powers separately, and communicate them to the others; and in case difficulties arose, commissioners were to make a report of them to each chamber, and if the decision of the different orders were not uniform, the king was to judge in the last resort. Thus the court would have cut the knot very profitably for itself. The conferences were forthwith suspended, to obtain the adhesion of the orders. The clergy accepted the project simply and unconditionally. The nobility received it at first with favour; but, urged by its ordinary instigators, it contemned the counsel of the most prudent of its members, and ultimately modified the scheme. From that day all its misfortunes may be dated.

The commons, apprised of this resolution, waited until it should be formally communicated to them to explain themselves in their turn; but the clergy, with their ordinary astuteness, designing to throw them into a false position with the nation, sent a deputation to them, with a request that they would join with them in deliberation upon the misery of the people, which every day was aggravating, and devote their united energies, without further delay, to the mitigation of the scarcity and dearness of provisions. The commons, who would have been exposed to popular odium if they had appeared indifferent to such a proposition, retorted the manœuvre by another, and replied, that, deeply sensible of the same duties, they awaited the clergy in the great hall, for the purpose of entering with them upon those important objects. The nobility afterwards arrived, and solemnly communicated its resolution to the commons. It adopted, as it said, the plan of conciliation, but persisted in the separate verification, and deferred to the united orders and the supreme jurisdiction of the king, only so far as respected any difficulties that might arise touching the aggregate deputations of an entire province.

This resolution put an end to all the embarrassments of the commons. If the plan of conciliation had been adopted, they would have been compelled either to yield or to declare themselves at war with the upper orders and the throne; but the acceptance of the plan being burdened with serious modifications, they were relieved from explanation altogether. The moment was decisive of events. To concede the separate verification was not, it is true, to concede the vote by orders; but once to evince weakness was to be always weak. It was necessary either to submit to a part utterly insignificant, giving supplies to the executive, and resting contented with the destruction of a few abuses, when the regeneration of the state itself was within grasp, or to take a strong position, and seize with violence upon a portion of legislative power. It was to take the initiative in a revolution; but the assembly hesitated not. Accordingly, all the minutes being signed, and the conferences closed, Mirabeau rose. "Any project of conciliation being rejected by one party," said he, "can no longer be entertained by the other. A month has passed, and some decisive course is imperative. A Parisian deputy has an important motion to make; let him be heard." Mirabeau, having opened the debate with his accustomed daring, introduced Sieyes to the tribune, a man of comprehensive intellect, systematic and rigorous in his deductions. Sieyes shortly recapitulated, and defended the conduct of the commons. They had waited for and lent themselves to all the conciliations proposed; their long deference had been of no avail; they could not longer delay without being wanting to their mission; consequently, they ought to direct a final invitation to the two other orders to unite with them for the purpose of commencing the verification. This proposition, the expediency of which was logically demonstrated,* was hailed with enthusiasm; in fact,

* I think it incumbent on me to record the motives upon which the assembly of the commons grounded the determination in question. This first act, which began the revolution, being of great importance, it is essential to demonstrate its necessity, and I believe that cannot better be done than by adhibiting the considerations which preceded the resolution of the commons. This preamble, as well as the resolution, was drawn up by the Abbé Sieyes.

"The assembly of the commons, deliberating upon the overture of conciliation made by the commissioners of the king, has thought it right to take into consideration at the same time the resolution that the members of the nobility have hastened to pass upon the overture in question.

Lafayette

an inclination was manifested to allow the two orders but a single hour to effect the junction; but the term was prolonged. This sitting occurred on the 10th June, and the next day, Thursday, being sacred to religious solemnities, an adjournment until Friday was fixed. On Friday the final invitation was communicated: the two orders replied, they would proceed to deliberate, and the king that he would make known his intentions. The calling of the bailiwicks commenced: the first day, three priests appeared, and were overwhelmed with acclamations; the second, six arrived; the third and fourth, ten, amongst whom was the Abbé Gregoire.

During the call of the bailiwicks and the verification of the powers, a weighty discussion arose upon the title the assembly ought to assume. Mirabeau proposed that of "Representatives of the French People;" Mounier, that of "the Majority deliberating in the absence of the Minority;" the deputy Legrand, that of "the National Assembly." The last was adopted after a long debate, which continued until the night of the 16th June. It was one o'clock in the

It has seen that the nobility, notwithstanding the acquiescence originally announced, soon introduced a modification which almost entirely retracts the same, and that thus their resolution in this respect can only be regarded as a positive refusal.

With this impression, and seeing that the nobles have not even desisted from their preceding deliberations, contrary to the spirit of every project of union, the deputies of the commons think that it is absolutely useless to concern themselves further with a plan which can no longer be called conciliatory, since it has been rejected by one of the parties to be conciliated.

In this state of things, which replaces the deputies of the commons in their original position, the assembly is of opinion that it can no longer idly await the privileged classes, without rendering itself culpable towards the nation, which has an unquestionable right to demand from it a better employment of its time

It is of opinion that it is the bounden duty of the representatives of the nation, to whatever class of citizens they may belong, to form themselves, without any delay, into an active assembly, capable of commencing and fulfilling the objects of their mission

The assembly instructs the commissioners who have attended the various conferences called conciliatory, to prepare a recital of the long and fruitless efforts of the deputies of the commons to lead the privileged classes to an appreciation of just principles; it takes upon itself the task of proclaiming the motives which force it to pass from a state of expectation to one of action; lastly, it resolves that this recital and these motives shall be printed at the head of the present deliberative act.

But since it is not possible to constitute an active assembly, without a preliminary recognition of those who have the right to [illegible] it—[illegible], th[illegible] who p[illegible] the [illegible]alification to vote as representatives of the nation—the same deputies of the commons think it right to make a last experiment upon the members of the nobility and clergy, who have, nevertheless, hitherto refused to have themselves recognised.

Furthermore, the assembly being interested in placing on record the refusal of these two classes of deputies, in case they should persist in their wish to remain unacknowledged, judges it indispensable to make a final invitation, which shall be carried to them by deputies instructed to read it to them, and to leave them copies, in the following terms:—

'Gentlemen—We are instructed by the deputies of the commons of France to apprise you, that they cannot longer delay to satisfy the obligation imposed upon all the representatives of the nation. It is surely time that those who claim that character should be known by a verification of their powers in common, and at length begin to concern themselves with the national interest, which alone, and to the exclusion of all particular interests, presents itself as the object which all the deputies should promote with a common effort. In consequence, and from the necessity imposed upon the representatives of the nation to put their functions in activity, the deputies of the commons again entreat you, gentlemen, and their duty compels them to make to you, as well individually as collectively, a final summons to repair to the hall of the states, in order to attend, concur in, and submit, like them, to the common verification of powers. We are, at the same time, instructed to notify to you that the general call of all the bailiwicks will be made in one hour; that the verification will be then proceeded with, and default pronounced against absentees.'" morning, when the question was mooted whether the declaration of being constituted should be made in that sitting, or delayed until the following day. A part of the deputies maintained that not an instant should be lost in taking a legal character calculated to have an imposing effect on the court. A small number, desiring to interrupt the labours of the assembly, fell into a paroxysm of passion, and uttered furious cries. The two parties, ranged along the opposite sides of a long table, hurled menaces at each other in words and gestures. Bailly, seated in the centre, was called upon by some to break up the assembly, by others to put the motion for constitution to the vote. Calm amidst the shouts and tumult, he remained for upwards of an hour immovable and silent. The weather was stormy, the wind howled through the hall, and the violence of the elements added to the uproar. At length the outrageous members retired; whereupon Bailly, addressing the assembly, restored to tranquillity by the retreat of those who had disturbed it, urged it to adjourn until day the important act under proposition. It yielded to his counsel, and separated, applauding his firmness and prudence.

The next day, the 17th June, the motion was put to the vote, and by a majority of 491 voices to 90, the commons constituted themselves a National Assembly. Sieyes, again intrusted with drawing up the reasons for this decision, performed the task with his accustomed acumen.

"The assembly, on consideration, after concluding the verification of the powers, finds that it is already composed of representatives directly returned by at least ninety-six in a hundred of the nation. A deputation of such magnitude ought not to remain inactive on account of the absence of the deputies of some bailiwicks, or of certain classes of citizens; for the absentees who have been summoned cannot prevent those who have appeared from exercising their rights in full plenitude, especially when the exercise of those rights is an indispensable and imperative duty.

Moreover, as those representatives alone who have verified can concur in constituting the national voice, and as all the accredited representatives ought to be in this assembly, it likewise necessarily follows, that it belongs to it, and to it alone, to interpret and give expression to the general will of the nation.

There can exist between the assembly and the throne no veto—no rejecting power.

Accordingly, the assembly declares that the common labours for the national restoration may and ought to be commenced without delay by the deputies present; and that they ought to proceed therewith without intermission, as also without obstacle.

The title of 'National Assembly' is the only one suitable to the assembly in the present state of things, because the members who compose it are the only representatives legitimately and publicly known and accredited; because they are returned by almost the entirety of the nation, and because, the representation being one and indivisible, no deputy, in whatever order or class chosen, has the right to exercise any functions apart from this assembly.

The assembly will never relinquish the hope of gathering into its fold the deputies now absent, nor will it cease to call upon them to discharge the obligation they are under of concurring in the session of the states-general. It declares, that at whatever moment the absent deputies may present themselves during the session about to be opened, it will receive them with the utmost cordiality, and share with them, after the verification of their powers, the continuation of those weighty labours which are destined to accomplish the regeneration of France."

Immediately after this resolution, the assembly, desirous of giving a proof both of its power and of its disinclination to impede the course of administration, legalised the collection of taxes, although imposed without the national consent. Foreseeing the probability of its dissolution, it subjoined that they should cease to be exigible from the day on which it should separate. Furthermore, as bankruptcy was an expedient possible to the executive for terminating the financial embarrassments, and dispensing with a national appeal, it consulted both prudence and honour by putting the creditors of the state under the safeguard of French honesty. In conclusion, it announced that it would take into immediate consideration the causes of the scarcity and of the general distress.

These measures, which evinced equal courage and sagacity, produced a profound impression. The court and higher orders were astounded at their daring and energy. In the mean time, the clergy, in a tumultuous sitting, debated upon the expediency of joining the commons. An immense crowd waited without for the result of their deliberations; the inferior clergy ultimately prevailed, and it was announced that the junction had been carried by a majority of 149 to 115. Those who had voted in the affirmative were hailed with transports, the others were insulted and assailed by the people.

This crisis was calculated to cement the reconciliation of the court and the aristocracy. The danger was equal for both. The last resolutions affected the king as much as the first orders themselves, with whom the commons declared they could altogether dispense. The Duke of Luxembourg, the Cardinal de Larochefoucauld, and the Archbishop of Paris, threw themselves at the feet of the king, and entreated him to curb the audacity of the third-estate, and to support their threatened rights. The parliament offered to render the states unnecessary, by undertaking to sanction all the taxes. The king was surrounded by the princes and the queen; the emergency was too great for his weakness, and he was ultimately drawn to Marly, in order that a vigorous measure might be wrung from him.

The minister Necker, attached to the popular cause, made some representations, which the king thought just enough when his judgment was unfettered; but their effect was soon extirpated by the arts of the court. When Necker saw that the intervention of the royal authority was necessary, he conceived a project which seemed of marvellous boldness to his order of courage: he proposed that the monarch should hold a royal sitting, and ordain the junction of the orders, but only for measures of general interest; that he should assume to himself the sanction of all the resolutions passed by the states-general; that he should disallow beforehand every establishment contrary to a limited monarchy, such as that of a single assembly, and that he should promise the abolition of privileges, the equal admission of all Frenchmen to civil and military offices, &c. Necker, who had not had influence sufficient to precipitate the period for such a plan, had equally little now to enforce its execution.

The council had followed the king to Marly. There the plan of Necker, at first approved of, was again brought under discussion: whilst it was pending, a letter was suddenly handed to the king; the council was suspended, resumed, and adjourned until the morrow, notwithstanding the urgent necessity for despatch. The next day, new members were added to the council, amongst whom were the king's brothers. The project of Necker was modified. The minister resisted, consented to certain concessions, but seeing himself outnumbered, he returned to Versailles. Thrice a royal page brought him letters announcing fresh modifications, his plan was completely altered, and the royal sitting was fixed for the 22d June.

It was only the 20th of the month, and the hall of the states was already closed, under the pretence of preparations being in progress for the presence of the king. These preparations might have been easily made in half a day; but the clergy had resolved the day before to join the commons, and it was determined to prevent the junction. An order of the king accordingly suspended the sittings until the 22d. Bailly, deeming himself obliged to obey the assembly, which on Friday the 19th had adjourned to Saturday the 20th, proceeded to the door of the hall. Some of the French guards were gathered around it, with orders not to admit any entrance. The officer on duty received Bailly with respect, and permitted him to advance into a court to record a protestation. Some young and ardent deputies attempted to force the guard; Bailly ran to the spot, appeased their fiery spirit, and led them away with him, in order that they might not compromise the generous officer who executed his orders with so much moderation. The members rushed tumultuously together, and persisted in holding a meeting. Some spoke of assembling under the very windows of the king; others proposed the hall of the tennis-court. They immediately proceeded thither, and the proprietor joyfully granted the use of it.

This hall was spacious, but its walls were dark and bare, and there were no seats. A chair was offered to the president, who refused it, preferring to remain on his legs with the general body. A bench served as a desk; two deputies were placed at the door as a guard, but were soon relieved by the attendants of the place, who came to offer their services. The people flocked in crowds, and the debates commenced. Exclamations arose from all sides against the suspension of the sittings, and various means were proposed for preventing it in future. The excitement increased, and extreme measures began to suggest themselves to the heated imaginations. It was proposed to proceed to Paris; this opinion, hailed with warmth, was eagerly discussed, and a motion was even made to march there in a body, and on foot. Bailly was fearful of the outrages that the assembly might experience on the road, and apprehensive likewise of originating a schism; therefore he opposed the project. Thereupon Mounier moved that the deputies bind themselves by oath not to separate before the establishment of a constitution. This motion was received with enthusiasm, and the form of the oath was instantly drawn up. Bailly solicited the honour of swearing first, and read the formula, thus couched—"You take a solemn oath never to separate, to assemble wherever circumstances may require, until the constitution of the kingdom shall be established and confirmed upon solid foundations." This formula, pronounced in a loud and distinct tone, was heard beyond the walls of the building. Immediately all mouths uttered the oath, all arms were stretched towards Bailly, who, erect and stern, received this solemn engagement to secure by laws the exercise of national rights. The whole body afterwards raised cries of "Long live the assembly! Long live the king!" as if to prove that it claimed the recovery of what was due to the nation, without anger or hatred, but from a sense of duty. The deputies subsequently proceeded to sign the declaration which they had just made by word of mouth. One alone, Martin d'Auch, added to his name the title of "opposer." Considerable tumult ensued around him. Bailly, in order to be heard, mounted on a table, addressed the deputy in a tone of moderation, and represented to him that he had an undoubted right to refuse his signature, but none to record his opposition. The deputy was obstinate, and the assembly, fr respect for freedom of opinion, allowed the phrase, and let it remain on the minutes.

This new act of energy struck terror into the nobles, who the next day carried their sorrows to the foot of the throne, expressed their contrition in some degree for the restrictions wherewith they had shackled the royal plan of conciliation, and craved the king's assistance. The minority of the nobility protested against this step, alleging most reasonably that it was the height of folly to ask the royal intervention after having so indiscreetly spurned it. This minority, too little attended to by its colleagues, was composed of forty-seven members, amongst whom were some military men and enlightened magistrates. It numbered the Duke de Liancourt, the faithful friend of his king and of liberty; the Duke de Larochefoucauld, distinguished for unshaken virtue and an accomplished mind; Lally-Tolendal, already celebrated from the misfortunes of his father, and his eloquent protestations; Clermont-Tonnerre, remarkable for his oratorical talent; the brothers Lameth, young colonels, known for their spirit and valour; Duport, already mentioned for his comprehensive intellect and the firmness of his character; and lastly, the Marquis de Lafayette, the defender of American liberty, who united to French vivacity the resolution and simplicity of Washington.

Intrigue paralysed all the energies of the court. The sitting, fixed originally for Monday the 22d, was postponed till the 23d. A note, written at a late hour to Bailly, and after the separation of the privy-council, informed him of this adjournment, and gave sufficient token of the agitation that prevailed. Necker had resolved not to attend the sitting, in order that he might not sanction by his presence projects he disapproved.

Petty expedients, the ordinary resource of weak authority, were resorted to for the purpose of preventing the assembly meeting on the 22d. The princes caused the tennis-court to be retained, in order to play on that morning. The assembly proceeded to the church of Saint Louis, where it received the majority of the clergy, at whose head appeared the Archbishop of Vienne. This junction, effected with imposing dignity, excited the liveliest emotions of joy. The clergy announced that they came there to submit to the common verification.

The next day, the 23d, was fixed for the royal sitting. The deputies of the commons were appointed to enter the hall by a side door, apart from the entrance reserved for the nobility and clergy. With the exception of violence, every species of indignity was heaped upon them. Exposed to a heavy fall of rain, they waited patiently for a long time; the president, compelled to knock at this door, which was kept closed, had to repeat his knocks several times, and the only reply he obtained was, that the time had not arrived for opening it. The deputies were about to retire in disgust, when Bailly gave another summons: at length the door was opened, the deputies entered and found the two orders in possession of their seats, which they had secured by the precaution of forestalling them. The sitting was not like that of the 5th May, at once majestic and affecting by a certain effusion of feelings and hopes. A numerous guard and a mournful stillness distinguished it from that first solemnity. The deputies of the commons had resolved to observe a profound silence. The king pronounced a harangue, and betrayed the influence that had worked upon him, by using expressions much too energetic for his character. He was made to deal out reproaches and impose injunctions. He commanded the separation into orders, annulled the previous resolutions of the third-estate, but promised to sanction the abolition of pecuniary privileges, when their possessors had declared it. He retained all the feudal rights, both practical and honorary, as inviolable possessions; and he ordained not the junction upon matters of general interest, although he held out hopes of its probability from the moderation of the higher orders. Thus he enforced the obedience of the commons, whilst he contented himself with taking that of the aristocracy for granted. He left the nobility and clergy sole judges of what concerned them peculiarly, and concluded by saying, that if he encountered fresh obstacles, he would take the welfare of the people into his own hands, and consider himself as their only representative. This tone and language exasperated all minds, not against the king, who had feebly vented passions not his own, but against the aristocracy, whose instrument he had consented to become.

The instant his discourse was finished, he ordered the assembly forthwith to separate. The nobility followed him, with a part of the clergy. The greater number of the ecclesiastical deputies remained, and the commons also continued stationary, still observing a profound silence. Mirabeau, who was always the first to take the lead, arose. "Gentlemen," said he, "I confess that what you have just heard might be for the safety of the country, if the gifts of despotism were not always suspicious. A parade of arms, a violation of the national temple, to command you to be happy! Where are the enemies of the nation? Is Catiline at our gates? I call upon you, by the investiture of your dignity and of your legislative functions, to respect the sacred obligation of your oath; recollect it does not permit you to separate until the constitution is established."

The Marquis de Brézé, grand-master of the ceremonies, entered at this moment, and addressed himself to Bailly. "Have you heard," he asked, "the orders of the king?" and Bailly answered: "I am about to take those of the assembly." Mirabeau advanced. "Yes, sir," he exclaimed, "we have heard the views wherewith the king has been prompted; but you have here no voice, or place, or right to speak. However, to avoid delay, go to your master, and tell him that we are here by the power of the people, and that we will not be driven forth but by the power of bayonets." M. de Brézé withdrew. Sieyes then uttered these words: "We are to-day what we were yesterday: let us deliberate." The assembly disposed itself to debate upon the maintenance of its previous resolutions. "The first of these resolutions," said Barnave, "declares what you are; the second refers to the taxes, which you alone have the right to sanction; the third is the oath to do your duty. None of these measures needs the royal assent. The king cannot abrogate what his consent would not fortify." At this instant, workmen came to remove the benches, armed soldiers traversed the hall, others encompassed it outside, and the body-guards advanced even to the door. The assembly, without concerning itself with the interruption, remained upon the seats and collected the votes; there was no dissentient voice against adhering to all the previous resolutions. Nor was this all. In the heart of a royal city, in the midst of court retainers, and deprived of the aid of that people afterwards so formidable, the assembly was exposed to intimidation. Mirabeau repaired to the tribune, and proposed to decree the inviolability of each deputy. The assembly, merely able to oppose a majestic expression to brute force, instantly declared each of its members inviolable, and all who should do injury to their persons, traitors, infamous, and guilty of a capital crime.

In the mean time, the nobility, who believed the state saved by this bed of justice, offered their congratulations to the prince who had suggested it, and carried them from the prince to the queen. The queen, holding her son in her arms, and showing him to these enraptured servants, received their homage, and gave way to a blind and fatal confidence. At that very instant shouts were heard; all hastened towards the noise, and the intelligence was soon spread that the people, gathered into a crowd, were applauding Necker for not appearing at the royal sitting. Alarm immediately succeeded to joy. The king and queen caused Necker to be called, and those august personages were compelled to entreat him to retain his portfolio. The minister consented, and restored to the court some portion of the popularity he had preserved by absenting himself from that disastrous sitting.

Thus was the first revolution brought about. The third-estate had obtained the legislative power, and its adversaries had lost it by too great eagerness to grasp it all. In a few days this legislative revolution was consummated. Certain petty annoyances were again resorted to, such as impeding the internal communications in the halls of the states; but they were too contemptible to have any effect. On the 24th, the majority of the clergy repaired to the assembly, and demanded the verification in common, with the view of afterwards deliberating upon the propositions advanced by the king in the sitting of the 23d June. The minority of the clergy continued to occupy their peculiar chamber. The Archbishop of Paris, Juigné, a virtuous prelate, and charitable to the people, but obstinate in the cause of privileges, was attacked, and constrained to promise his junction. He proceeded in fact to the national assembly, accompanied by the Archbishop of Bordeaux, a prelate of popular tendencies, who afterwards became minister.

The greatest confusion prevailed in the ranks of the nobility. Its ordinary agitators inflamed its passions; D'Espremenil proposed to impeach the third-estate, and to order its prosecution by the attorney-general, and the minority, on the contrary, proposed the junction. This latter motion was rejected amidst deplorable tumult. The Duke of Orleans supported the motion, after having the day before promised the Polignacs to oppose it.* Forty-seven members, having resolved to join the national assembly in spite of this decision, repaired thither in a body, and were greeted with lively marks of public satisfaction. However, their countenances bore an expression of sadness even amidst the joy caused by their presence. "We yield to our sense of right," said Clermont-Tonnerre, "but we separate from our colleagues with grief. We come to take part in the public regeneration; each of us will make known to you the extent to which his mandate will permit him to go."

Every day brought with it fresh junctions, and the assembly saw the number of its members perpetually on the increase. Addresses poured in from all quarters, conveying the sympathy and approbation of the towns and provinces. Mounier stimulated those from Dauphiny; Paris originated its own; and even the Palais-Royal sent a deputation, which the assembly, still enveloped by dangers, received, in order not to alienate the populace. It did not then foresee its future excesses; it had need, on the contrary, to presume its energy and to hope for its support; many of the deputies were doubtful of both, for the resolution of the people was as yet but a pleasing anticipation. Thus the plaudits of the galleries, though often annoying to the assembly, had nevertheless served to animate it in its course, and it ventured not to forbid them. Bailly wished to pass a vote of censure, but his voice and motion were stifled amidst shouts of applause.

The majority of the nobility continued its sittings amid tumult and the most violent exasperation. Apprehensions spread amongst those who ruled that order, and the motion for a junction came from those very members who had formerly induced its resistance. But its passions, already too excited, were not easily controlled. The king was obliged to write a letter, the court and its high functionaries were reduced to entreat. "The junction will be but transitory," said they to the most stubborn; "troops are approaching: yield to save the king." Acquiescence was wrung from them in the midst of disorder, and the majority of the nobles, accompanied by the minority of the clergy, repaired, on the 27th June, to the general assembly. The Duke of Luxembourg, speaking in the name of all, said that they came to give the king a proof of respect, and to the nation an evidence of patriotism. "The family is now complete," answered Bailly. Assuming that the union was consummated, and that the question as to verification was disposed of, and that it remained for them only to deliberate in common, he added, "We shall now be able to proceed, without intermission and without distraction, with the regeneration of the kingdom and the public welfare."

More than one silly expedient was employed to support an appearance of not having done what necessity had superinduced. The new comers always entered after the opening of the sittings, all in a body, and so as to uphold their character as an order. They affected to remain standing behind the president, and in a manner to avoid the appearance of sitting. Bailly, with infinite address and firmness, succeeded in subduing their repugnance, and inducing them to take their seats. They wished likewise to dispute his right to the presidency, not by an open demonstration, but by secret intrigue, or by despicable trickery. Bailly was resolute in his retention, not from ambition, but from duty; and men beheld a simple citizen, known for no qualifications more imposing than virtue and talent, presiding over all the magnates of the kingdom and the church.

It ought to have been palpable to all understandings, that the legislative revolution was achieved. Although the preliminary dispute arose merely on the mode of verification and not on that of voting, although some had declared they joined only for the common verification, and others in obedience to the royal wishes as expressed on the 23d June—it was clear that the vote by voice was an inevitable implication, and that all opposition was consequently useless and impolitic. And yet the Cardinal de Larochefoucauld protested in the name of the clerical minority, and asserted that it had effected the junction simply to deliberate upon general questions, with a reservation of its right to form an order. The Archbishop of Vienne replied with vivacity, that the minority had no power to decide any thing in the absence of the majority, and could have no right to speak in the name of the entire order. Mirabeau expatiated with his usual vigour upon the absurdity of this pretension, saying it was strange that any should protest within the assembly against the assembly, and that it behoved all either to acknowledge its supremacy or to retire.

The question as to imperative mandates was then started. The greater number of the instructions expressed the views of the electors with regard to advisable reforms, and rendered those views obligatory on the deputies. Before acting, it was necessary to settle how far they could go; and this question, therefore, became the first. It was argued and re-argued several times. Some maintained that they should go back to their constituents, whilst others were of opinion that they could receive from their constituents the commission of voting for them only after the measures had been discussed and illustrated by the delegates of the whole nation, but that it was not competent for them to receive beforehand a prescribed judgment. If it were held, in fact, that the law should be made only in a general council, either because more enlightened views prevailed in an elevated body, or because a correct opinion could be formed only when all parts of the nation were mutually heard, it followed of course that the deputies ought to be unfettered, and without obligatory mandates. Mirabeau, sharpening reason with irony, exclaimed that those who considered the mandates imperative were wrong to come there at all, but should content themselves with laying their instructions on the benches, since those documents might sit as well as themselves. Sieyes, with his accustomed sagacity, foreseeing that, notwithstanding the most rational decision of the assembly, a great number of members would cling to their oaths, and that by intrenching themselves behind their consciences they would become invulnerable, moved the order of the day, on the ground that each was the judge of the force of the oath he had taken. "Those who feel themselves shackled by their instructions," said he, "can be regarded as absent, precisely as those who refused to have their powers verified in common assembly." If the assembly had constrained the malecontents, it would have furnished pretexts for faction, whilst, by leaving them at liberty, it was sure to induce their adhesion, for its victory was no longer dubious.

* See Ferrières.

The object of the new convocation was the reform of the state, that is to say, the establishment of a constitution, of which France was utterly devoid, in spite of all that may be said to the contrary. If that name be applied to every species of relation between the governed and the governors, France unquestionably possessed a constitution; it had a king who commanded, and subjects who obeyed; ministers who imprisoned at pleasure; farmers of the revenue who wrung the last farthing from the people; and parliaments which condemned unfortunates to the wheel. The most barbarous nations have such orders of constitutions. There was in France an institution called States-General, but without precise functions, without fixed periods for assembling, and when convoked, invariably without result. There was a royal authority which had been alternately powerless and absolute. There were tribunals or supreme courts, which had often joined legislative to judicial power; but there was no law which secured the responsibility of the agents of power, the liberty of the press, the freedom of person, or any of those guarantees, in fine, which, in the social state, make amends for the fiction of natural liberty.*

The necessity for a constitution was confessed and generally felt; all the instructions had energetically asserted it, and had even formally laid down the fundamental principles upon which that constitution should be based. They had unanimously prescribed a monarchical government, hereditary descent from male to male, the exclusive attribution of executive power to the king, the responsibility of all his agents, the concurrence of the nation and the king in the enactment of laws, the voting of taxes, and individual liberty. But they were divided as to the creation of one or of two legislative chambers; as to the duration, the prorogations, and the dissolution of the legislative body; as to the political existence of the clergy and the parliaments; and as to the extent of the liberty of the press. So many questions, either solved or started by the instructions, show sufficiently how the public mind was then awakened in all quarters of the kingdom, and how general and emphatic was the determination of France for liberty.* But to frame

* I support by quotations and notes only what is susceptible of contradiction. This question, as to whether France had a constitution, seems to me one of the most important in the revolution, for it is the absence of a fundamental law that justifies the nation for desiring to obtain one. I imagine that it would be scarcely possible to cite an authority more respectable and less open to suspicion than the testimony of M. Lally-Tolendal. That excellent citizen delivered a speech on the 15th June 1789, in the chamber of nobles, of which the following is the greater portion:—

"Many reproaches, gentlemen, mingled with some bitterness, have been directed against those members of this assembly, who, with equal pain and reserve, have evinced certain doubts upon what is called our constitution. This subject had not perhaps a very direct connexion with that which is before us; but since it has been the ground of an accusation, it has become likewise one of defence, and I am justified in addressing a few words to the authors of those reproaches.

You have certainly no law which establishes the states-general as an integral portion of the sovereignty, for you are now demanding one; and hitherto, sometimes the decree of the council prohibited them from deliberating, and sometimes the decree of a parliament annulled their resolutions.

You have no law which compels the periodical convocation of your states-general, for you demand one; and 175 years have elapsed since they were assembled.

You have no law which places your individual safety and liberty under shelter from arbitrary attacks, for you demand one; and under the reign of a king whose justice is known to all Europe, and whose probity is universally reverenced, ministers have caused your magistrates to be driven from the sanctuary of the laws by armed myrmidons. Under the preceding reign, all the magistrates of the kingdom were also torn from their seats and their hearths, and dispersed in exile, some to the peaks of mountains, others to the mire of marshes, all into places more frightful than the most horrible of prisons. By ascending higher, you will discover lettres de cachet by the thousands, on account of wretched theological quarrels. By going still farther back, you perceive sanguinary commissions and arbitrary imprisonments in equal profusion, and you find no speck for repose but in the reign of your good Henry.

You have no law which establishes the liberty of the press, for you demand one; and hitherto your thoughts have been enslaved, your ideas chained, and the cry of your hearts in oppression has been stifled, now by the despotism of individuals, anon by the more terrible despotism of public bodies.

You have no law, or have none any longer, which renders your consent necessary for taxation, for you demand one; and for two centuries you have been charged with upwards of three or four hundred millions of taxes, without your having sanctioned a single unit.

You have no law which imposes responsibility upon all the ministers of executive power, for you demand one; and the originators of those sanguinary commissions, the issuers of those arbitrary orders of arrest, the spoilers of the public treasury, the violators of the sanctuary of justice—those who have deceived the virtues of one king, those who flattered the passions of another, those who have caused the disasters of the nation, have rendered no account, have undergone no punishment.

In fine, you have no general, positive, written law, at once a national and royal compact—no great charter, on which a fixed and invariable order may rest, in which each may learn what it behoves him to sacrifice of his liberty and his property to preserve the rest—which assures all rights, and defines all powers. On the contrary, the system of your government has varied from reign to reign, often from ministry to ministry; it has depended on the age and the character of a single mortal. During minorities, under a weak prince, the royal authority, which contributes to the happiness and dignity of the nation, has been indecently degraded, either by magnates, who with one hand shook the throne and with the other ground the people to the dust, or by bodies which at one time attacked with temerity what at another they had defended with courage. Under haughty princes who were basely flattered, under virtuous princes who were misled, this same authority has been pushed beyond all bounds. Your secondary or intermediate powers, as you call them, have been neither better defined nor more fixed. At times the parliaments have maintained the principle that they could not interfere in affairs of state, at others they have alleged that their discussion belonged to them as representatives of the nation. On one hand we have seen proclamations announcing the pleasure of the king, on the other, decrees in which the officers of the king prohibited, in the name of the king, the execution of the orders of the king. The courts have not agreed better amongst themselves; they have disputed each other's origin and functions, have mutually fulminated recriminatory decrees.

I limit these details, which I might extend to infinity; but if all these facts are certain—if you have none of those laws which you demand, and which I have now mentioned—or if, having them (and I beg your attention to this)—or if, having them, you have not that which compels their execution, that which guarantees their observance, and which maintains their stability, pray define to us, then, what you understand by the word constitution, and allow at least that some indulgence is due to those who cannot refrain from entertaining certain doubts upon the existence of ours. We are perpetually told to rally round this constitution; ah! rather let us lose sight of that phantom in order to substitute a reality. And as to that term of innovations, as to that epithet of innovators, with which we are unceasingly attacked, let us also grant that the first innovators are in our instructions; let us respect and bless that fortunate innovation which essays to put every thing in its place, to render all rights inviolable, all authorities beneficent, and all people happy.

It is for such a constitution, gentlemen, that I offer my prayers; it is such a constitution that is the object of all our mandates, and which ought to be the goal of all our labours; and such a constitution is repugnant to the very idea of the address which is proposed to us—an address which would compromise the king as much as the nation—an address, indeed, which appears to me so dangerous, that not only shall I oppose it to the utmost, but if it were possible it could be adopted, I should feel myself under the painful necessity of solemnly protesting against it."

* I think it useful to give the summary of the instructions presented to the National Assembly by M. de Clermont-Tonnerre.

a perfect constitution amidst the mouldering ruins of an antiquated legislation, in spite of all resistance, and with the unruly theories abroad, was a laborious and difficult task. Besides the dissensions inevitably

It is an admirable statistical record of the opinions entertained at that epoch in the whole extent of France. In this respect the summary is extremely important; and although Paris might have influenced the compilation of these instructions, it is not the less true that the provinces had the greatest share in them.

Report of the Constitution Committee, containing the Summary of the Instructions relative to that object, read to the National Assembly by the Count de Clermont-Tonnerre, in the sitting of the 27th July 1789.

"Gentlemen—You are called upon to regenerate the French empire; you carry to that great work both your own wisdom and the wisdom of your constituents.

We have thought it our duty, in the first place, to collect and present to you the opinions scattered in the major part of your instructions; we will afterwards present to you both the particular views of your committee, and those which it has been, or may hereafter be, enabled to gather from the various plans and observations which have been, or may be, communicated or remitted by the members of this august assembly.

It is the first portion of this task we are about to present to you.

Our constituents, gentlemen, are all agreed upon one point; they desire the regeneration of the state; but some have understood it as a simple reform of abuses, and the re-establishment of a constitution existing for fourteen centuries, which has seemed to them capable of revival, if the injuries are repaired which have been inflicted by time, and the numerous outrages of personal interest upon the public interest.

Others have considered the existing social system as so vicious, that they have demanded a new constitution; and with the exception of monarchical government and forms, which are cherished and reverenced in the heart of every Frenchman, and which they have ordered you to maintain, they have given you all the powers necessary to frame a constitution, and settle the prosperity of the French empire upon ascertained principles, and upon the regular distinction and constitution of all the powers. These are of opinion that the first chapter of the constitution ought to contain the declaration of the rights of man, of those imprescriptible rights, for the safeguard of which society was instituted.

The demand of this declaration of the rights of man, so incessantly contemned, is substantially the only difference which exists between the instructions which require a new constitution and those which seek merely for the re-establishment of what they deem the existing constitution.

Both have equally founded their ideas upon the principles of monarchical government, upon the stability of the power and upon the organisation of the legislative body, upon the necessity of the national consent to taxation, upon the organisation of the administrative bodies, and upon the rights of all citizens.

We shall go over these different objects, and present to you upon each of them, as decisive, the results, when uniform, and, as questions, the different or contradictory results which those of your instructions, an epitome of which it has been possible for us to make or to procure, have brought before us.

1. The monarchical government, the inviolability of the sacred person of the king, and the hereditary transmission of the crown from male to male, are equally acknowledged and consecrated by the greatest number of the instructions, and are not questioned in any.

2. The king is equally recognised as depositary of the full plenitude of executive power.

3. The responsibility of all the agents of authority is generally demanded.

4. Some instructions acknowledge in the king the legislative power, limited by the constitutional and fundamental laws of the kingdom; others acknowledge that the king, in the interval between one assembly of the states-general and another, may of himself make laws on matters of police and administration, which shall be only provisional, and for the validity of which they require the free registration in the supreme courts; one bailiwick has even required that the registration may not take place unless with the consent of two-thirds of the intermediate commissions of the district assem   The major part of the instructions recognises the necessity for the royal sanction in the promulgation of the laws.

As to the legislative power, the plurality of the instructions recognises it as residing in the national representation, under limitation of the royal sanction; and it appears that this ancient maxim of the capitularies, Lex fit consensu populi et constitutione regis (The law is made by the consent of the people and the fiat of the monarch), is almost universally consecrated by your constituents.

As to the organisation of the national representation, the questions upon which you have to pronounce have reference to the convocation, to the duration, and to the composition of the national representation, and to the mode of deliberation which your constituents propose for it.

As to the convocation, some have declared that the states-general ought to be dissolved only by themselves; others, that the right of convoking, proroguing, and dissolving, appertains to the king, under the sole condition, in case of a dissolution, of making immediately a new convocation.

As to the duration, some have demanded the periodical assembling of the states-general; and they have desired that the periodical returns should not depend on the will or the interest of the depositaries of power; others, but in smaller number, have demanded the permanency of the states-general, so that the separation of the members may not lead to the dissolution of the states.

The periodical system has given rise to a second question: shall there be, or not, an intermediate commission during the interval of the sessions? The majority of your constituents has regarded the establishment of an intermediate commission as dangerous.

As to the composition, some have adhered to the separation of the three orders; but on this point the extension of powers, which several representatives have already obtained, leaves doubtless a greater latitude in the solution of this question.

Some bailiwicks have demanded the junction of the two first orders in one chamber; others the suppression of the clergy, and the division of its members into the two other orders; others that the representation of the nobility should be double that of the clergy, and that both united should be equal to that of the commons.

One bailiwick, whilst demanding the union of the two first orders, has demanded the establishment of a third, under the title of the rural order. It has been also required that every person holding office, employment, or place at court, may not be eligible as a deputy to the states-general. Finally, the inviolability of the deputies is recognised by the greatest number of the bailiwicks, and contested by none. As to the mode of deliberation, the question of voting individually or by orders is already settled. Some bailiwicks demand two-thirds of the votes to render a resolution valid.

The necessity for the national consent to taxation is universally pronounced by your constituents, asserted in all the instructions; all limit the duration of taxes to the term you may fix—a term, however, never to be extended beyond the interval from one convocation to another; and this obligatory clause has appeared to your constituents as the surest guarantee of the perpetuity of your national assemblies.

Loans, being in fact but indirect taxation, seem to them undoubtedly subject to the same principles.

Some bailiwicks have excepted from the term taxes those which may be set aside for the liquidation of the national debt, and have held that they ought to be exigible until its complete extinction.

As to administrative bodies or provincial states, all the instructions demand their establishment, and the majority rely upon your wisdom for their organisation.

Finally, the rights of all citizens, liberty and property, are energetically asserted by the whole French nation. It claims for each of its members the inviolability of individual property, as it claims for itself the inviolability of public property; it demands individual liberty in all its extent, as it has established for ever national liberty; it calls for the liberty of the press, or the free communication of thought; it inveighs in terms of indignation against lettres de cachet, which disposed arbitrarily of persons, and against the violation of the secrecy of the post-office, as one of the most preposterous and infamous inventions of despotism.

Amidst this concourse of demands, we have remarked some peculiar modifications relative to lettres de cachet and the liberty of the press. You will weigh them in your wisdom; you will doubtless satisfy that sentiment of French honour, which, from horror of infamy, has sometimes overstepped justice, and which will doubtless be as eager to submit to the law when it affects the powerful, as it was to counteract it when it weighed only upon the weak. You will calm the apprehensions for religion, so frequently outraged by libels in the time of the prohibitive system; and the clergy, remembering that licentiousness was for ages the handmaid of slavery, will themselves acknowledge that the first and arising from the diversity of interests, the natural divergences of opinion were likewise to be apprehended. An entire legislation to frame for a great people so powerfully excites all minds, inspires them with projects so vast, hopes so chimerical, that measures either vague or exaggerated, and often antagonistic, were to be anticipated. To infuse order into the labours, a committee was named, with instructions to investigate their extent, and to apportion their distribution. This committee was composed of the most moderate members of the assembly. Mounier, a sagacious though obstinate man, was its most indefatigable and influential member; he it was who arranged the order of proceeding.

The difficulty of framing a constitution was not the only one this assembly had to encounter. Between a government hostilely disposed and a people famishing, who required prompt relief, it was almost impossible to avoid interfering with administration. Distrustful of authority, and pressed to succour the people, it was impelled, without any impulse of ambition, gradually to encroach upon the executive power. The clergy had already given an example of this tendency, by its insidious proposition to the third-estate to enter forthwith upon the affair of provisions. The assembly was scarcely formed ere it named a committee on the necessaries of life, demanded from the minister information upon that subject, proposed to facilitate the circulation of produce from province to province, to transport it at the public charge to places where want prevailed, to make grants, and to provide for them by loans. The minister communicated the efficacious measures he had adopted, and which the king, as a solicitous administrator, had promoted with all his power. Lally-Tolendal proposed to pass decrees as to the free circulation, to which Mounier objected that such decrees would require the royal sanction; and that this sanction, not being yet regulated, would lead to serious difficulties. Thus all obstacles conspired to impede progress. An imperious necessity existed for laws before the legislative forms were settled, for controlling the administration without infringing upon the executive authority, and for grappling with an entire host of embarrassments, whilst fettered by the repugnance of power, by the opposition of particular interests, by the incongruity of opinions, and by the exigencies of a people recently aroused, and in agitation a few leagues from the assembly, in the heart of an immense capital.

A very short space separates Paris from Versailles, and it may be traversed several times in a day. All the movements in Paris were consequently immediately felt at Versailles, at court, and in the assembly. Paris at that time presented a new and extraordinary spectacle. The electors, collected into sixty districts, had refused to separate after the elections, and had remained assembled, either for the purpose of giving instructions to their deputies, or from that craving for union and agitation which is inherent in men, and which breaks out with a violence proportioned to the length of its suppression. They had experienced the same fate as the national assembly; the place of their sittings had been closed, and they were driven to seek another. They had ultimately obtained access to the town-hall (hotel-de-ville), and there they continued to meet, and to correspond with their deputies. No public journals yet existed which reported the debates of the national assembly, and it was necessary to collect together in order to discuss and be apprised of events. The garden of the Palais-Royal was the scene of the most crowded congregations. That magnificent garden, surrounded by the most gorgeous shops in Europe, and forming an appurtenance to the palace of the Duke of Orleans, was the general resort for strangers, for the idle, and the dissipated, but, above all, for the most furious demagogues. The most daring speeches were delivered in the coffee-houses, or in the garden itself. An orator was ever and anon seen to mount on a table, and, gathering a crowd around him, to inflame with words of the greatest violence—words always uttered with impunity, for the mob reigned there with sovereign sway. Men who were supposed devoted to the Duke of Orleans showed themselves the most ardent. The wealth of that prince, his known profuseness, his enormous loans, his vicinage, his ambition, though vague, all conspired to ensure his accusation. History, without designatnatural effect of liberty is the restoration of order, decency, and respect for the objects of public veneration.

Such, gentlemen, is the account your committee has judged itself bound to render to you of that portion of your instructions which treats of the constitution. You will doubtless find therein all the foundation-stones of the edifice which you are instructed to raise to its height; but you will perhaps have to desire that order, that concentration of political combinations, without which the social system will always present numerous defects: the powers are indicated, but not distinguished with the necessary precision; the organisation of the national representation is not sufficiently laid down; the principles of eligibility are not adduced; it is from your labours that these results must spring. The nation has determined to be free, and it is you whom it intrusts with its enfranchisement; the genius of France has precipitated, so to speak, the march of the public mind. It has accumulated for you in a few hours the experience which could have been scarcely anticipated from many ages. You have it in your power, gentlemen, to give a constitution to France; the king and the people loudly demand it; both the one and the other have well deserved it.

RESULT OF THE ANALYSATION OF THE INSTRUCTIONS.

Principles Decided.

Art. 1. The French government is a monarchical government.
2. The person of the king is sacred and inviolable.
3. His crown is hereditary from male to male.
4. The king is the depositary of executive power.
5. The agents of authority are responsible.
6. The royal sanction is necessary for the promulgation of laws.
7. The nation makes the law with the royal sanction.
8. The national consent is necessary for loans and taxes.
9. The taxes can be granted only from one holding of the states-general to another.
10. Property is sacred.
11. Individual liberty is sacred

Questions upon which the whole of the Instructions have not given explanations in an uniform manner.

Art. 1. Has the king the legislative power, limited by the constitutional laws of the realm?
2. Can the king alone make provisional laws on matters of police and administration in the interval between the assemblies of the states-general?
3. Shall these laws be subjected to the free registration of the supreme courts?
4. Can the states general be dissolved except by themselves?
5. Can the king alone convoke, prorogue, and dissolve the states-general?
6. In case of a dissolution, is not the king obliged to make immediately a new convocation?
7. Shall the states-general be permanent or periodical?
8. If they are periodical, shall there be or not an intermediate commission?
9. Shall the two higher orders be united in a single chamber?
10. Shall the two chambers be formed without distinction of orders?
11. Shall the members of the ecclesiastical order be distributed into the two other orders?
12. Shall the representation of the clergy, the nobility, and the commons, be in the proportion of one, two, and three?
13. Shall a third order be established, under the title of the rural order?
14. Can persons holding offices, employments, or places at court, be deputies to the states-general?
15. Shall two-thirds of the votes be necessary to pass a resolution?
16. Shall the taxes appropriated to the liquidation of the national debt be exigible until its entire extinction?
17. Shall lettres de cachet be abolished or modified?
18. Shall the liberty of the press be unrestricted or modified?"

ing individuals, can assert that gold was certainly distributed. If the sound part of the nation ardently desired liberty, if the uneasy and suffering populace were disposed to agitation, and anxious to better its condition, there were also instigators who sometimes excited that populace, and possibly directed some of its enterprises. But such an influence is not to be reckoned amongst the causes of the revolution, for it is not with a handful of gold and secret manœuvres that a nation of twenty-five millions of men is stimulated to action.

An occasion for troubles soon presented itself. The French guards, chosen troops destined to form the king's guard, were at Paris. Four companies were alternately detached, and proceeded to do duty at Versailles. In addition to the extreme severity of the new discipline, these troops had also reason to complain of that of their colonel. During the pillage of Reveillon's house, they had indeed exhibited some ferocity against the people, but had afterwards been touched with remorse on that account, and, mingling every day with the citizens, they had yielded to their blandishments. Furthermore, soldiers and sub-officers felt that every chance of promotion was closed against them; they were irritated at seeing their young officers perform scarcely any duty, appear only on days of parade, and after the reviews not even accompany them to barracks. There was in the army, as well as in civil life, a third-estate, which bore all burdens and participated in no benefit. A spirit of disobedience was not long in being manifested, and some of the guards were imprisoned in the Abbaye.

A general rush ensued to the Palais-Royal: "To the Abbaye!" was the universal shout; and the multitude hastened thither. Its gates were forced, and the soldiers being released, were borne away in triumph. (30th June.) Whilst the people were guarding them at the Palais-Royal, a letter was written to the assembly, demanding their liberty. Placed between the people on the one hand and the government on the other, which was suspected, since it evinced a resolution to act in its own cause, the assembly could not avoid interfering, and committing an encroachment by taking part in a matter of public police. Adopting a course at once adroit and prudent, it expressed to the Parisians its wishes for the maintenance of good order, recommending them not to disturb it; and at the same time sent a deputation to the king, to implore his clemency, as the infallible means of restoring concord and tranquillity. The king, moved by the moderation of the assembly, promised clemency when order should be re-established. The French guards were immediately conducted back to prison, and a royal pardon set them forthwith at liberty.

All was going well up to this time; but the nobility, when coalescing with the two orders, had succumbed with reluctance, and on the promise that the junction should be of short duration. The order still met every day, and entered into protests against the operations of the national assembly: its numbers, however, progressively dwindled: on the 3d July it counted 138 members present, on the 10th only 93, and on the 11th 80. Nevertheless, the most obstinate had persisted, and on the 11th had resolved on a protest, which ulterior events prevented them from drawing up. The court, on its part, had not yielded without regret, nor without designs in view. Emerging from its consternation after the sitting of the 23d June, it had urged the general junction with the idea of shackling the progress of the assembly by means of the nobles, and with the hope of soon dissolving the union by main force. Necker had been retained merely to cover by his presence the secret plots that were hatching. From a certain appearance of agitation, and from the reserve evinced towards him, he suspected some grand machination. The king himself was not informed of all that was projected; and it was doubtless intended to go farther than he was thought likely to sanction. Necker, who imagined that the entire action of a statesman should be limited to reasoning, and whose vigour was precisely of that order which expends itself in representations, proffered them to the smallest possible purpose. In conjunction with Mounier, Lally-Tolendal, and Clermont-Tonnerre, he meditated the establishment of the English constitution. Meanwhile, the court pursued its secret preparations; and the noble deputies having expressed a determination to withdraw, they were detained by cheering intimations of an approaching event.

Troops were drawing near; the old Marshal de Broglie had been named to the command in chief, and the Baron de Besenval had received the particular command of those which surrounded Paris. Fifteen regiments, for the most part foreign, were in the vicinity of the capital. The boasting of the courtiers revealed the danger, and those conspirators, somewhat too prompt in their menaces, compromised their own schemes. The popular deputies, acquainted, not with all the details of a plan which was not yet fully unmasked, and which the king himself knew but partially, still with enough to excite apprehensions of intended violence, were highly exasperated, and looked around for means of resistance. It is unknown, and will probably for ever remain unknown, what share secret arrangements had in the insurrection of the 14th July; but the matter is of trifling moment. The aristocracy were plotting, and the popular party might very naturally plot also. The means employed being the same, the only question is as to the justice of the cause; and justice was assuredly not with those who desired to subvert the union of the orders, to dissolve the national representation, and wreak vengeance on its most courageous deputies.

Mirabeau conceived that the surest means of intimidating the court was to compel it to a public discussion of the measures which it was palpably projecting. For this purpose it was necessary to make a public denunciation. If it hesitated to answer, if it evaded the subject, it was convicted, and the nation was apprised and roused.

Mirabeau caused the labours upon the constitution to be suspended, and moved that the king be requested to withdraw the troops. He mingled in his speech sentiments of respect for the monarch, with the most severe invectives against the government. He said that every day fresh troops were advancing; that all the communications were intercepted, the bridges and walks changed into military posts; that both notorious and secret facts, hurried orders and counter-orders, struck all eyes, and announced war. Adding bitter reproaches to these details, he exclaimed, "They bring more soldiers to intimidate the nation than an enemy would probably encounter upon an invasion, and a thousand times more, at least, than they were able to collect in aid of friends, martyrs to their fidelity, and especially to maintain that alliance with the Dutch, so valuable, so dearly acquired, and so shamefully lost."

His discourse was greeted with enthusiastic applause, and the address he proposed instantly adopted, modified only in one particular. When soliciting the removal of the troops, Mirabeau had proposed that they should be replaced by burgher guards, which paragraph was struck out. The address was then voted, only four voices dissenting. In this still celebrated document, which it is said he did not himself compose, but had furnished all its ideas to one of his friends, Mirabeau predicted almost all that was about to happen; the insurrection of the multitude, and the defection of the troops from their friendly intercourse with the citizens. As bold as he was sagacious, he dared to assure the king that his promises should not be vain. "You have called us," said he, "to regenerate the kingdom; your intentions shall be fulfilled in spite of snares, difficulties, perils," &c.

The address was presented by a deputation of twenty-four members. The king, declining to explain himself, replied that this assembling of troops had no other object than the maintenance of public tranquillity, and the protection due to the assembly; and that, moreover, if that body had still any apprehensions, he would transfer it to Soissons or Noyon, and go himself to Compiègne.

The assembly could scarcely feel satisfaction at such a reply, especially at the offer to remove it to a distance from the capital, and plant it between two camps. The Count de Crillon argued that implicit faith should be placed on the word of a king and an honest man. "The word of an honest king," retorted Mirabeau, "is but a sad guarantee for the conduct of his ministry; our blind confidence in our kings has been our ruin: we asked the retreat of the troops, and not our flight before them. We must still insist on that measure without a moment's relaxation."

This opinion was not supported. Mirabeau sufficiently urged open operations to induce his secret machinations to be pardoned, if it be true that any such were employed.

Necker had repeatedly told the king that if his services were disagreeable to him, he would cheerfully resign. "I rely upon your word," the king had upon such occasions replied. On the afternoon of the 11th July, Necker received a note, in which the king called upon him to keep his word; urged him to depart; and added, that he had sufficient confidence in him to hope that he would conceal his departure from all the world. Necker, justifying the honourable confidence of the monarch, set off without saying a word to his friends, or even to his daughter, and in a few hours was several leagues from Versailles. The next day, 12th July, was a Sunday. A rumour was spread at Paris that Necker had been dismissed, as also Montmorin, La Luzerne, Puységur, and St Priest. As their successors, were announced De Breteuil, La Vauguyon, De Broglie, Foulon, and Damécort, almost all notorious for their opposition to the popular cause. Alarm became predominant in Paris. The Palais-Royal was thronged. A young man, afterwards known for his republican enthusiasm, naturally of a tender but excitable temperament, Camille-Desmoulins, sprang upon a table, drew forth pistols, with an exhortation to arm, tore a leaf from a tree, which he converted into a cockade, and induced every one to follow his example. The trees were instantaneously stripped, and the crowd repaired to a museum containing busts in wax. They seized upon those of Necker and the Duke of Orleans, who was said to be menaced with exile, and then spread themselves over the quarters of Paris. This mob was passing along the street St Honoré, when it met near the square Vendôme a detachment of the royal German regiment, which fell upon it, wounded several persons, and amongst others a soldier of the French guards. The latter, already disposed in favour of the people and against the royal Germans, with which regiment they had had a contest some days before, were quartered near the square Louis XV., and now fired upon their opponents. The Prince de Lambesc, who commanded the royal German regiment, immediately moved back upon the garden of the Tuileries, charged the peaceable crowd walking there, killed an old man in the tumult, and cleared the garden.

In the mean time, the troops which surrounded Paris concentrated on the field of Mars and the square of Louis XV. The alarm then became unbounded, and changed to fury. The people rushed through the town with cries of "To arms!" The town-hall was beset with applications for weapons. The electors composing the general assembly were collected there. They yielded the arms they had no power to refuse, and which were already seized, indeed, when they decided upon delivering them. These electors formed at that moment the only constituted authority. Deprived of all active power, they assumed such functions as circumstances required, and now summoned a convocation of the districts. All the citizens repaired thither to deliberate upon the means of preserving themselves—on the one hand, from the fury of the multitude, and on the other, from the attack of the royal troops. During the night, the populace, always attracted to what chiefly interests it, forced and burned the barriers,* put the keepers to flight, and threw all the avenues open and free. The shops of the gunsmiths were also broken into and rifled. Those brigands, already signalised by their activity at Reveillon's, and who were seen on all occasions starting forth as if from the bowels of the earth, now made their appearance, armed with pikes and clubs, and carried terror into all quarters. These events occurred in the course of Sunday the 12th July, and during the night following. On Monday morning, the electors, still sitting at the town-hall, deemed it expedient to give a more legal aspect to their authority, and consequently dispatched an invitation to the provost of the trades,† the ordinary administrator of the city. This functionary would not consent to join them, except upon a formal requisition. This was complied with, and a certain number of electors was united with him, thus composing a municipality invested with all necessary powers. This municipality summoned the lieutenant of police before it, and in a few hours digested a plan of enrolment for a burgher militia.

This militia was to be composed of 48,000 men, furnished by the districts. The distinguishing symbol selected was the Parisian cockade, red and blue, instead of the green one of Desmoulins. Every person found in arms and wearing this cockade, without having been enrolled by his district in the burgher guard, was ordered to be arrested, disarmed, and punished. Such was the origin of the national guards. This plan was adopted by all the districts, and they hastened to put it in execution. In the course of the same morning, the populace had plundered the convent of Saint Lazarus in search of corn, and had likewise broken into the garde-meuble, or armoury, in pursuit of arms, the antique and curious weapons with which it was stored being torn down and carried off. A motley crew, bearing helmets and pikes of by-gone times, issued forth and overspread the town. The populace showed itself upon this occasion opposed to robbery; with its usual fickleness, it affected disinterestedness, leaving money untouched, taking nothing but arms, and even assisting to apprehend the brigands. The French guards and soldiers of the watch had offered their services, and they were accordingly enrolled in the burgher guard.

More arms were still demanded with loud shouts. The provost, Flesselles, who had at first refused to co-operate with his fellow-citizens, now evinced great zeal, and promised 12,000 muskets that very day, and an additional number for the succeeding days. He asserted that he had made a contract with an unnamed gun-manufacturer. The thing appeared improbable, considering the shortness of the time that had elapsed. However, towards evening, the chests of arms announced by Flesselles were conveyed to the town-hall; they were eagerly opened, and found to be full of old linen. At this unexpected disappointment, the multitude growled indignantly at the provost, who stated, in exculpation, that he had been deceived. To appease them further, he directed them to the Carthusian monastery, with the assurance that they would find arms there. The astounded monks received the infuriated rabble, led them through their quiet domicile, and convinced them that they possessed no such articles as had been mentioned by the provost.

* At these barriers duties were collected on articles entering Paris.

† "The prévôts des marchands, or provosts of the trades, were officers of the highest antiquity. In 1357, they purchased, in conjunction with the echevins, or municipal magistrates, the house where, in ancient times, the dauphins resided, called Maison de Grève, which gave the name of Place de Grève to the area on which it stood; and on the site of that and some others round it they afterwards built the hotel-de-ville, or town-house. The provost was appointed by the king, sometimes for two years, or renewed every year at his pleasure."—Bertrand de Moleville's Annals of the Revolution, vol. i. p. 127.

The people, more exasperated than ever, returned with cries of treachery. To satisfy them, the fabrication of 50,000 pikes was forthwith ordered. Some barrels of powder destined for Versailles were descending the Seine in boats; these were seized, and an elector distributed the contents amidst the greatest danger.

Horrible confusion prevailed at this same town-hall, the seat of the authorities, the head-quarters of the militia, and the centre of all operations. Simultaneous demands were made on all in authority to provide for external security menaced by the court, for internal security menaced by the brigands, for calming the suspicions of the people, who thought themselves every instant betrayed, and for saving from their fury those who were the objects of their distrust. Around the hall were accumulated arrested carriages, intercepted convoys of waggons, and travellers waiting for permission to resume their journey. During the night, it was again threatened by the brigands; an elector, the valorous Moreau de St Mery, intrusted with its defence, caused barrels of powder to be brought, and threatened to blow it up. The brigands were awed and withdrew. At the same time, the citizens, retired to their homes, held themselves in readiness for all attacks; they had unpaved the streets, dug trenches, and taken all possible measures for resisting a siege.

During these troubles in the capital, the assembly was a prey to the most serious alarms. On the morning of the 13th, the members repaired to the hall, full of apprehensions for impending events, and as yet ignorant of what had occurred at Paris. The deputy Mounier was the first to rise and exclaim against the dismissal of the ministers. Lally-Tolendal succeeded him in the tribune, pronounced a splendid eulogium upon Necker, and seconded Mounier's motion for an address in which the king should be solicited to recall the disgraced ministers. A deputy of the nobility, M. de Virieu, proposed to confirm the resolutions of the 17th June by a fresh oath. Clermont-Tonnerre opposed this proposition as unnecessary; and, recapitulating the engagements already taken by the assembly, exclaimed: "The constitution shall be, or we shall be no more!" The discussion was proceeding when information was brought of the disturbances at Paris on the morning of the 13th, and the evils with which the capital was threatened, between undisciplined Frenchmen, who, according to the expression of the Duke de Larochefoucauld, were in the hands of no one, and disciplined foreigners who were in the hands of despotism. It was instantly resolved to send a deputation to the king, for the purpose of laying before him the desolation of his capital, and entreating him to order the withdrawal of the troops and the enrolment of burgher guards. The king returned a cold and tranquil answer, little in accordance with his real feelings, and repeated that it was not possible for Paris to guard itself. Thereupon the assembly, exalted by the noblest heroism, passed a memorable resolution, in which it insisted upon the removal of the troops and the establishment of burgher guards, declared the ministers and all the agents of power personally responsible, put upon the counsellors of the king, of whatever rank they might be, the responsibility of the misfortunes which impended; consolidated the public debt, denounced the utterance of the execrable word bankruptcy, re-asserted its preceding resolutions, and ordained the president to convey its regret to M. Necker, as also to the other ministers displaced. After these measures, so indicative of prudence and energy, the assembly, in order to preserve its members from all personal violence, declared itself permanent, and named M. de Lafayette vice-president, for the purpose of relieving the estimable Archbishop of Vienne, whom his age did not allow to sit both day and night.

The night between the 13th and 14th was thus passed amidst excitement and alarm. Every instant some dismal intelligence was announced and contradicted. Though all the projects of the court were not fathomed, it was nevertheless sufficiently notorious that several deputies were threatened; that violence was about to be employed against Paris and the most distinguished members of the assembly. Suspended for a fleeting interval, the sitting was resumed at five in the morning of the 14th. With an imposing and truly dignified composure, the assembly returned to its labours on the constitution, and discussed with infinite judgment the means of accelerating its execution, and preparing for it with prudence. A committee was named to frame the resolutions, composed of the Bishop of Autun, the Archbishop of Bordeaux, Lally, Clermont-Tonnerre, Mounier, Sieyes, Chapelier, and Bergasse. The morning thus elapsed. Rumours more and more sinister were brought to the assembly; the king, it was said, would leave that night, and the assembly remain at the mercy of foreign regiments. The queen, the princes, and the Duchess of Polignac, had just been seen walking in the Orangery, cajoling the officers and soldiers, and ordering them refreshments. It appears that a grand scheme was prepared for the night of the 14th and 15th; that Paris was to be attacked at seven points, the Palais-Royal surrounded, the assembly dissolved, and the declaration of the 23d June carried to the parliament. The exigencies of the treasury were to be surmounted by bankruptcy and state-notes. It is certain that the commanders of the troops had received orders to advance on the 14th; that the state-notes had been fabricated; that the barracks of the Swiss were filled with munitions of war; and that the governor of the Bastille had removed a variety of articles, leaving in the place only some indispensable pieces of furniture. In the afternoon the terrors of the assembly were redoubled; the Prince de Lambese had been seen passing at full gallop; the distant noise of a cannonade was heard, and the members laid their ears to the ground to catch the faintest sounds. Mirabeau moved that all further debate be suspended, and a second deputation be sent to the king. The deputation immediately set out to make fresh representations. At this moment, two members of the assembly, just arrived in all haste from Paris, brought intelligence that slaughter was at work in that city; one of them asseverated that he had seen a corpse with its head off, and wrapped in black. The night was beginning to fall, when the arrival of two electors was announced. The deepest stillness reigned in the hall; the noise of their steps was heard amid the darkness; and from their mouths was learnt that the Bastille had been attacked, cannon fired, and blood shed, and that the most frightful calamities threatened to ensue. A new deputation was immediately named before the preceding one had returned. Whilst preparing to depart, the first arrived and brought back an answer from the king. He had ordered, he said, the removal of the troops encamped in the field of Mars to a greater distance, and having been informed of the formation of burgher guards, he had nominated officers to command them.

Upon the arrival of the second deputation, the king, in great agitation, had addressed it in these words: "Gentlemen, you tear my heart more and more by the account you give me of the calamities of Paris. It is not possible that the orders given to the troops can have caused them." Only the removal of the army to a greater distance had been as yet obtained. It was two hours after midnight. The answer given to the city of Paris imported "that two deputations had been sent, and that the remonstrances would be renewed the next day until they met with that success which was to be justly anticipated from the heart of the king, when its impulses should be no longer controlled by fatal counsels." The sitting was suspended for a short period, and in the interim the events of the 14th July were made fully known.

The people, so early as the night of the 13th, had congregated about the Bastille; some shots had been fired, and it seems that instigators had repeatedly shouted out, "To the Bastille!" But the wish for its destruction was expressed in several of the deputies' instructions, so that the public mind had evidently taken that direction at first, without any prompting. There was still a continual demand for arms. A report was spread that the Hotel des Invalides contained a considerable depôt. The people immediately flocked to that building. The governor, M. de Sombreuil, defended its entrance, saying that he must send for orders to Versailles. The crowd would listen to no such proposition, but at once rushed pell-mell into the hospital, and bore away the cannons and a great number of muskets. A considerable concourse was already in array against the Bastille. The insurgents alleged that the guns of the castle were pointed upon the town, and that they must be prevented from firing upon it. The deputy of a district stepped forward, and asked permission to inspect the fortress, which the commandant accorded. When admitted inside, he found thirty-two Swiss and eighty-two invalids, and took the word of the garrison not to fire unless attacked. During this parley, the people began to be uneasy and vociferous at not seeing their deputy return, and he was obliged to show himself from the ramparts to appease them. About eleven in the morning he withdrew. Half an hour had scarcely elapsed before a fresh crowd arrived in arms, rending the air with shouts of "We'll have the Bastille!" The garrison summoned the assailants to retire, but they paid no heed to the warning. Two men mounted with great intrepidity to the roof of the guard-house, and severed with their axes the chains of the drawbridge, which accordingly fell. The crowd rushed precipitately along it, and onwards to a second bridge. At this moment a discharge of musketry arrested their course; in a few seconds they recoiled, but returning the fire. The contest was thus maintained for a short interval. The electors, sitting at the town-hall, were greatly alarmed when they heard the report of the musketry, and sent forth two deputations, one after the other, to induce the governor to allow a detachment of the Parisian militia to be introduced into the fortress, on the ground that all the military force in Paris should be under the control of the city. These two deputations successively made their appearance on the scene of action. But it was extremely difficult to obtain a hearing amidst a siege conducted by popular undisciplined bands. The beating of a drum and the hoisting of a flag succeeded in suspending the fire for a time. The deputies advanced; the garrison listened to them; but it was impossible to make mutual explanations amidst the din. Shots were fired, from what quarter is unknown. The people, convinced that treachery was intended, ran forward to set the castle on fire: the garrison thereupon fired with grape-shot. The French guards came up with cannon, and commenced an attack in form.

Whilst these events were passing, a letter addressed by the Baron de Besenval to Delaunay, the governor of the Bastille, was intercepted and read at the town-hall. In this epistle Besenval urged Delaunay to hold out, assuring him that succours would be speedily sent to him. It was on the evening of that day, in fact, that the plans of the court were appointed for execution. In the mean time, Delaunay, perceiving no prospect of assistance, and observing the reckless daring of the people, seized a lighted match, with the intention of blowing up the fortress. The garrison opposed the desperate resolution, and compelled him to surrender. The signals were given, and a bridge lowered. The besiegers approached, promising to commit no mischief; but the crowd rushed tumultuously forward, and filled the courts. The Swiss succeeded in saving themselves. The invalids were assailed, and only wrested from the fury of the mob by the exertions of the French guards. At this moment a young and beautiful girl, trembling with terror, presented herself; she was imagined to be the daughter of Delaunay; the ruffians seized upon her, and she was about to be burnt, when a heroic soldier precipitated himself amongst the crew of wretches, tore her from their grasp, bore her to a place of safety, and then returned to the scene of commotion.

It was now half-past five. The electors were in a state of distressing anxiety, when they heard a dull and prolonged murmur. An excited multitude approached with cries of victory. The hall in which they were sitting was speedily thronged, and a French guardsman, covered with wounds and crowned with laurel, was carried in triumph on the shoulders of the crowd. The rules and keys of the Bastille were borne on the point of a bayonet; a bloody hand raised above the heads of the populace exhibited to view the tail of a peruke; it was that of Delaunay's, whose head had been just struck off. Two of the guards, Elie and Hullin, had defended him to the last extremity. Other victims had fallen, though heroically protected against the ferocity of the populace. A sort of maddened fury began to explode against Flesselles, the provost of the trades, who was accused of treachery. It was alleged that he had deceived the people, by repeatedly promising them arms, which he nevertheless withheld. The hall was full of men exasperated with a long contest, and pressed by thousands of others who, clustered around the building, strove to enter in their turn. The electors made an effort to justify Flesselles in the eyes of the multitude. He began to lose his presence of mind, and, his countenance pale with terror, exclaimed, "Since I am suspected, I will withdraw." "No," was shouted in reply; "come to the Palais-Royal to be tried." He then descended to repair thither. The crowd gave way, surrounded and closed upon him. When he had reached the Pelletier quay, an unknown hand laid him prostrate with a pistol-bullet. It was asserted that a letter had been found on Delaunay, in which Flesselles wrote to him, "Hold out, whilst I amuse the Parisians with cockades."

Such were the dismal occurrences of that day. An emotion of terror soon succeeded the intoxication of success. The conquerors of the Bastille, petrified at their own audacity, and anticipating the speedy vengeance of outraged authority, were afraid to confess their participation in the exploit. Every instant rumours were rife that troops were advancing to sack Paris. Moreau de St Mery, the same who the day before had threatened the brigands to blow up the town-hall, remained unshaken amidst the panic, and issued upwards of three thousand orders in a few hours. As soon as the conquest of the Bastille was known at the town-hall, the electors had sent to inform the assembly of the fact, and the intelligence reached Versailles in the middle of the night. The assembly was not sitting at the moment, but the news was quickly spread abroad. Hitherto the court, disbelieving in the energy of the people, and contemning the efforts of an ignorant multitude directed against a fortress vainly besieged by the great Condé in former times, had sat perfectly tranquil, indulging in lightsome raillery. The king, however, had begun to feel some uneasiness; his last answers had revealed his anguish. He had retired to bed when the final catastrophe was proclaimed in Versailles. The Duke de Liancourt, so distinguished for his noble sentiments, was the intimate friend of Louis XVI., and from his office of grand-master of the wardrobe, had always access to his person. When apprised of the events at Paris, he repaired in all haste to the monarch, awakened him in spite of his ministers, and informed him of what had passed. "What, a revolt!" exclaimed the king. "Sire," replied the Duke de Liancourt, "rather say revolution." The king, moved by his representations, consented to go in the morning to the assembly. The court also surrendered; and this act of confidence was resolved upon. In the interval, the assembly had resumed its sitting. The new dispositions wherewith the king had been inspired were unknown, and it was determined to send a last deputation to him, with the view of appealing to his feelings, and obtaining from him all that still remained to be granted. This was the fifth deputation since the commencement of these disastrous events. It was composed of twenty-four members, and was about to leave the hall, when Mirabeau, rising with greater vehemence than ever, stopped it. "Tell the king," he exclaimed, "tell him without quailing, that the foreign hordes with which we are encompassed were yesterday visited by the princes and the princesses, and their parasites of both sexes, who lavished upon them caresses, exhortations, and bribes. Tell him, furthermore, that all night these foreign myrmidons, gorged with gold and wine, have foretold in their impious carols the subjection of France, and that their brutal prayers were raised for the destruction of the national assembly. And tell him that in his own palace his courtiers danced to the sounds of that ferocious music, and that such was the prelude to the St Bartholomew! Tell him, in fine, that the Henry whose memory the universe reveres, he of all his forefathers whose model he would take, allowed provisions to pass into Paris in rebellion, when besieged by himself; and that his ferocious counsellors drive back the supplies that commerce bears to Paris when faithful and famished."

The deputation was then proceeding to the palace, when intelligence arrived that the king was on the way, of his own will, without guards and without escort. Shouts of applause rang through the hall. "Wait," resumed Mirabeau, with gravity, "until the king has communicated to us his gracious intentions. Let solemn reverence be the only welcome accorded to the monarch in this moment of affliction. The silence of nations is awful to kings."

Louis XVI. then presented himself, accompanied by his two brothers. His benignant and affecting discourse roused the greatest enthusiasm. He calmed the apprehensions of the assembly, which he called for the first time the national assembly, and complained with mildness of the suspicions that had been entertained. "You have been alarmed," he said; "and now it is I who put my trust in you." These words were received with the most animated plaudits. The deputies immediately arose, surrounded the monarch, and re-conducted him on foot to the palace. The crowd pressed around him, tears stood in all eyes, and he could scarcely thread his way through his numerous escort. The queen, seated on a balcony with the court, contemplated at a distance this touching scene. Her son was in her arms, and her daughter, standing at her side, was carelessly playing with the locks of her brother. The queen, greatly moved, beheld with visible complacency these proofs of Frenchmen's affection. Alas! how often a reciprocal emotion reconciled hearts during those frightful discords! For an instant all seemed forgotten; but on the morrow, on that very day, the court was restored to its pride, the people to their distrust, and implacable hatred resumed its sway.

Peace was thus concluded with the assembly, but it remained to be made with Paris. The assembly forthwith sent a deputation to the town-hall, to bear the news of the happy reconciliation effected with the king. Bailly, Lafayette, and Lally-Tolendal, were in the number of the envoys. Their presence caused the liveliest demonstrations of joy. The speech of Lally-Tolendal aroused transports so ardent, that he was carried in triumph to a window of the town-hall to be shown to the people. A garland of flowers was placed upon his head, and he received this homage in front of the very square in which his father had died with a gag upon his lips. The death of the unfortunate Flesselles, head of the municipality, and the refusal of the Duke d'Aumont to accept the command of the burgher militia, left a provost and a commander-in-chief for nomination. Bailly was proposed, and, amidst the loudest and heartiest acclamations, was named successor of Flesselles, under the title of "Mayor of Paris." The garland which had been on the head of Lally was placed on that of the new mayor; he attempted to remove it, but the Archbishop of Paris kept it on in spite of him. The eyes of the virtuous old man filled with tears, and he resigned himself to his novel functions. The dignified representative of a great assembly, in presence of all the majesty of the throne, he was less capable of ruling amid the storms of a large city, where the multitude was incessantly rising with tumultuary violence against the magistrates. Setting aside, however, all personal thoughts, he proceeded to devote himself to the difficult labours of providing food, and subsisting a people destined to repay him with so much ingratitude. A commander of the militia remained to be named. In the hall stood a bust which had been presented by emancipated America to the city of Paris. Moreau de Saint Mery stretched out his arm towards it, and all eyes followed in the direction: it was the bust of the Marquis de Lafayette. An universal shout proclaimed him commander. A Te Deum was immediately voted; and all passed in a crowd from the town-hall to the cathedral of Notre-Dame. The new magistrates, the Archbishop of Paris, the electors, mingled with the French guards and the soldiers of the militia, marching arm in arm, proceeded to the venerable edifice in a sort of intoxicated rapture. On the road, some foundling children fell at the feet of Bailly, who had signalised himself by exertions for the hospitals; they saluted him as their father, and Bailly pressed them in his arms, calling them his children. They reached the church; the ceremony was celebrated, and the congregation afterwards overspread the city, in which a delirium of gladness had succeeded the gloomy terrors of the eve. At that moment, the people went to visit the cavern, so feared for ages, the entrance to which was now thrown open. The Bastille was traversed with eager curiosity and a feeling of awe. Instruments of torture and deep dungeons were gazed upon with shudders. The chief object of attraction was an enormous stone placed in the middle of a dark and swampy cell, to the centre of which was fixed a ponderous chain.

The court, as blind in its fears as it had been in its presumption, was so dreadfully alarmed at the idea of the people, that it imagined every moment a Parisian army was marching on Versailles. The Count d'Artois and the family of Polignac, so dear to the queen, now quitted France, and were the first emigrants. Bailly waited on the king, to re-animate his drooping courage, and prevail on him to visit Paris, which journey was resolved on in spite of the opposition of the queen and the court.

The king prepared to depart. Two hundred deputies were nominated to accompany him. The queen bade him farewell in a strain of profound affliction. The body-guards escorted him as far as Sevres, where they awaited his return. Bailly, at the head of the municipality, received him at the gates of Paris, and presented to him the keys formerly brought to Henry IV. "That good king," said Bailly to Louis XVI., "had gained his people; to-day it is the people who have regained their king." The nation, simply legislative at Versailles, was armed at Paris. Upon his entrance, Louis saw himself encompassed by a multitude, preserving a solemn silence, and drawn up in regimental order. He reached the town-hall, passing under an archway of swords crossed above his head, as a mark of honour. The speech he delivered was simple and affecting. The people, unable longer to restrain themselves, broke out at last, and lavished upon the king their usual acclamations. These in some degree relieved the prince's anxiety, though he could not conceal an emotion of joy when he again beheld the body-guards stationed on the heights of Sevres. On his return to Versailles, the queen, throwing herself into his arms, embraced him as if she had feared she should never see him more.

In order fully to satisfy the public wish, the king ordered the recall of Necker, and the dismissal of the new ministers. M. de Liancourt, the king's friend and trusty counsellor, was elected president of the assembly. The noble deputies, who, although appearing at the debates, had hitherto refused to take part in them, gave way at this juncture, and commenced voting. Thus was the fusion of the orders accomplished. From that moment the revolution might be considered as achieved. The nation, master of the legislative power through the assembly, of the public force through itself, was thenceforth able to realise all that was beneficial to its interests. The refusal to render taxation equal had made the states-general necessary; the refusal to yield an equitable partition of authority in these states had annihilated courtly and aristocratic influence; and finally, the attempt to restore that influence had convulsed Paris, and provoked the whole nation to seize upon the public force.

CHAPTER III.

TROUBLES IN PARIS—LAFAYETTE—MIRABEAU—PROCEEDINGS OF THE ASSEMBLY IN FRAMING THE CONSTITUTION.

All things were in commotion in the heart of the capital, where a new order of authority had so lately been established. The same spirit that had impelled the electors into action was equally urgent with all classes of men. The assembly had been followed by the town-hall, the town-hall by the districts, and the districts by all the incorporations; tailors, shoemakers, bakers, servants, assembling together at the Louvre, at the place Louis XV., or the Champs Elysées, pursued their deliberations in form, in spite of the repeated prohibitions of the municipality. Amid these contrary movements, the town-hall, opposed by the districts, pestered by the Palais-Royal, was beset with obstacles, and could with difficulty meet the labours of its multitudinous functions. It joined within itself alone the civil, judicial, and military administration. The head-quarters of the militia were there fixed. The judges, uncertain amidst the general confusion as to their jurisdiction, handed over the accused to it. It possessed even the legislative power, for it was intrusted with the framing of its own constitution. Bailly had summoned two commissioners from each district to effect that object, who, under the title of representatives of the commune (or common-council), might regulate the institution. To fulfil so many duties, the electors had divided themselves into several committees; one, called the committee of inquiry, took the department of the police; another, called the committee of subsistence, took that of provisioning Paris—a task the most difficult and dangerous of all. Bailly was obliged to devote both day and night to this latter subject. It was necessary to effect continual purchases of wheat; to have it ground, and then to transport it to Paris through the famished rural districts. The convoys were frequently stopped; and numerous detachments were requisite to prevent robberies on the road and in the markets. Although the state sold the corn at a loss, in order that the bakers might keep down the price of bread, the multitude was not satisfied; it was found necessary to lower this price every day, and the scarcity at Paris increased by means of this very diminution, for the country people flocked thither to buy food. Apprehensions for the morrow induced every one to furnish himself abundantly; and the accumulations in the hands of some caused others to be absolutely devoid. Confidence is the main impetus to commerce, brings forward produce, and renders its distribution equal and easy; but when confidence is at an end, commercial activity ceases; the markets being no longer supplied in anticipation of wants, those wants stimulate to exasperation, add confusion to scarcity, and prevent the beneficial distribution of the little that is exposed. Thus the care of providing subsistence was the most arduous of all. The bitterest anxieties preyed upon Bailly and the committee. A whole day of unremitting labour scarcely sufficed for the day's necessities, and the morrow brought with it the same distressing solicitude.

Lafayette, commander of the burgher militia,* had almost as many difficulties to encounter. In this militia he had incorporated the French guards devoted to the revolution, a certain number of Swiss, and a great many soldiers, who deserted from the army in the hope of better pay. The king had himself authorised such desertions. These united troops composed what was called the companies of the centre. The militia took the name of "the national guard," assumed an uniform, and added to the red and blue colours of the Parisian cockade, white, which was the king's colour. Thus was formed that tri-coloured cockade, of which Lafayette foretold the destinies, when he proclaimed that it would make the tour of the world.

It was at the head of this body that Lafayette strove for two consecutive years to maintain public tranquillity, and to secure the execution of those laws passed daily by the assembly. Lafayette, the descendant of an ancient family, which had preserved its purity of manners amidst the corruption of the nobles, gifted with an upright and firm heart, and a passion for true glory, had been disgusted with the frivolities of the court, and the pedantic discipline of the French armies. His own country offering nothing to stimulate an ambition such as his, he turned to the most noble enterprise of the age, and departed for America the day after that on which it was reported in Europe that she had succumbed. He there fought by the side of Washington, and decided the enfranchisement of the New World by the alliance of France. Returning to his native land with an European renown, and welcomed at court as a novelty, he there displayed the independence and simplicity of an American. When philosophy, which had been but a play of wit for the careless idle nobles, at length demanded sacrifices from them, Lafayette almost alone persisted in the opinions he had always professed, called for the states-general, powerfully contributed to the junction of the orders, and was nominated, as a recompense, to the command in chief of the national guard. Lafayette had neither the passions nor the genius which frequently lead to the abuse of power; with an even temper, a winning address, and unswerving disinterestedness, he was especially suited for the part which circumstances assigned him, namely, that of ensuring the execution of the laws. Adored by his troops without having captivated them by victories, calm and full of resources amid the ragings of the multitude, he maintained order with indefatigable vigilance. The parties which had found him incorruptible, assailed his talents, since his character was beyond attack. And yet his foresight was accurate with regard both to events and to men; he appreciated, at their just value, the court and the party-leaders; protected them, at the peril of his life, without esteeming them; and often struggled against factions almost without hope, but with the constancy of a man determined never to abandon the commonwealth, even when he has lost all hope for it.

* He had been named to this post on the 15th July, at the town-hall.

In spite of all his vigilance, Lafayette was not always successful in allaying popular storms. For however active force may be, it cannot be every where at once against a people every where in insurrection, who look upon every man in authority as an enemy. The most absurd reports were spread and believed each passing moment. Now it was alleged that the soldiers of the French guards had been poisoned; anon, that the flour had been designedly damaged, or intercepted on the road; and the persons who gave themselves the greatest trouble to bring supplies to the capital were obliged to appear before an insensate mob, which overwhelmed them with execrations or applauses, according to the caprice of the moment. At the same time, there is no doubt that the fury of the populace, who, generally speaking, are unable, for any length of time, to select and pursue victims, often seemed directed either by wretches paid, as was said, to render the troubles more serious by imbruing them with blood, or simply by men of deep remorseless malignity. Foulon and Berthier were pursued and arrested far from Paris, under circumstances which left no doubt as to the intention with which they were seized. There was nothing spontaneous in the proceedings against them; the rage of the multitude which killed them alone possessed that character. Foulon, a retired intendant, and a stern, avaricious man, had been guilty of horrible exactions, and was also one of the ministers appointed to succeed Necker and his colleagues. He was taken at Viry, though he had spread a report of his death. His captors conducted him to Paris, reproaching him with having said that the people ought to be made to eat hay. A wisp of nettles was twisted round his neck, a bunch of thistles put in his hand, and a truss of hay strapped to his back, in which state he was conveyed to the town-hall. At the same instant, his son-in-law, Berthier de Sauvigny, was arrested at Compiègne, upon pretended orders from the commune (common-council) of Paris, which had never been issued. The commune immediately wrote, commanding his release, which injunction was disregarded. He was dragged towards Paris at the time Foulon was at the town-hall, exposed to all the fury of the frenzied mob. They called loudly for his death; the representations of Lafayette calmed them a little, and they consented that Foulon should be tried, but demanded that the trial should take place that very instant, in order to enjoy the spectacle of an immediate execution. Some electors had been named to serve as judges, but, under various pretexts, had declined the terrible office. At length Bailly and Lafayette were designated, who found themselves reduced to the distressing alternative either of losing their own lives from the rage of the populace, or of sacrificing a victim to appease it. However, Lafayette still endeavoured, with infinite address and courage, to temporise, and spoke to the multitude several times with great effect. The wretched Foulon, placed on a seat by his side, had the imprudence to applaud his concluding words, whereupon a bystander exclaimed, "Look there, they understand each other!" At this phrase the crowd was exasperated, and rushed upon Foulon. Lafayette made heroic exertions to rescue him from the assassins, but he was finally torn from his protection, and hanged to a lamp-post. His head was cut off, stuck on the end of a pike, and paraded through the streets of Paris. At this moment Berthier arrived, under the conduct of guards, and surrounded by an enraged multitude. He was shown the bleeding head, which he could not doubt was that of his father-in-law. He was conducted to the town-hall, where he pronounced a few words expressive of courage and indignation. Seized again by the crowd, he escaped for a moment from their grasp, got possession of a weapon, defended himself with desperation, but soon fell like the unfortunate Foulon. These murders, which were perpetrated on the 22d July, were instigated by the enemies of Foulon, or of the public welfare; for if the fury of the people were spontaneously aroused at their appearance, like most of their movements, their arrest had been the result of design. Lafayette, filled with grief and indignation, resolved to give in his resignation. Bailly and the municipality, alarmed at this design, hastened to dissuade him from its execution. It was arranged that he should tender his resignation as a proof of his discontent with the people, but that he should allow himself to be overcome by the entreaties they would not fail to make him. In fact, the people and the militia gathered around him, and promised him implicit obedience for the future. He resumed the command on those conditions; and, thenceforth, he had the satisfaction of preventing numerous disorders, by means of his own energy and the devoted zeal of his soldiers.

During these occurrences, Necker had received at Basle the orders of the king and the assurances of the assembly. The Polignacs, whom he had left triumphant at Versailles, and met as fugitives at Basle, were the first from whom he learnt the disasters of the throne, and the speedy return of favour which awaited him. He departed and traversed France, drawn in triumph by the people, to whom he recommended peace and good order, as was usual with him. The king received him with embarrassment, the assembly with enthusiasm; and he determined to proceed to Paris, in order that he might there also have his day of triumph. Necker was inflamed with a desire to gain from the electors the pardon and freedom of the Baron de Besenval, although his enemy. It was in vain that Bailly, to whom measures of severity were not less abhorrent than to himself, but who formed a more just appreciation of circumstances, represented to him the danger of the project, and assured him that such a favour, procured in a moment of delirium, would be annulled the following day as illegal, because an administrative body could neither condemn nor pardon; Necker was obstinately bent upon making a trial of his influence over the capital. He repaired to the town-hall on the 30th July. His hopes were more than accomplished, and he had some reason to believe himself all-powerful, when beholding the transports of the people. In great emotion, his eyes filled with tears, he asked for a general amnesty, which was instantly granted by acclamation. The two assemblies of electors and representatives exhibited equal zeal; the electors decreed the general amnesty, the representatives of the commune ordered the liberation of Besenval. Necker retired intoxicated with delight, assuming to himself an enthusiasm which was simply owing to his disgrace by the court. But from this day forth the pleasing dream gradually vanished; Mirabeau was preparing to awaken him with a cruel shake. In the assembly and in the districts, the cry was general against the sensibility of the minister, excusable, it was allowed, but sadly misplaced. The district of L'Oratoire, instigated, as is confidently asserted, by Mirabeau, was the first to raise its voice. It was maintained on all sides, that an administrative body could neither condemn nor absolve. The illegal measure of the town-hall was revoked, and the detention of the Baron de Besenval sustained. Thus the prudent foresight of Bailly was proved, which Necker had been indiscreet enough to spurn.

Parties began, at this period, to be more distinctly marked. The parliaments, nobles, clergy, and court, all menaced with the same overthrow, had joined their interests and acted in concert. Neither the Count d'Artois nor the Polignacs were any longer at court. Amongst the whole body of the aristocracy, a species of consternation mingled with despair reigned paramount. Having vainly attempted to arrest what it stigmatised as "the evil," it now desired that the people might commit the greatest possible extent of mischief, so that its very excess might result in good. This system, composed in about equal proportions of sullen malice and base perfidy, and known by the appellation of political pessimism, takes its rise amongst parties when they have suffered so many losses as to induce them to renounce what they still retain, in the hope of retrieving all. From this time, therefore, the aristocracy began to employ it, and was frequently seen voting with the most violent section of the popular party.

Events force men to the front ranks. The dangers that beset the nobility raised up a defender for it. The young Cazalès, captain in the queen's regiment of dragoons, had to his own surprise discovered within himself great strength of mind and facility of speech. Precise and simple, he delivered with promptitude and judgment what it behoved him to say; and it is certainly to be deplored, that so excellent an understanding as his should have been consecrated to a cause which had no reasons to allege in its behalf until it was exposed to persecution. The clergy had found an advocate in the Abbé Maury. This ecclesiastic, an expert and inexhaustible sophist, possessed infinite coolness and ready wit; none better than he could resist tumult with courage, evidence with audacity. Such were the organs and tendencies of the aristocratic classes.*

The ministry was without views and without projects. Necker, detested by the court, which endured him from compulsion, was the only minister who had, not indeed a plan, but a wish. He had always desired the English constitution, doubtless the best that could have been adopted when viewed as an accommodation between the throne, the aristocracy, and the people; but having been proposed by the Bishop of Langres previous to the establishment of a single assembly, and rejected by the first orders, it was become impracticable. The high nobility was opposed to two chambers, because that arrangement implied a concession; the petty nobles or gentry, because they would not be members of the upper house; the popular party, because, still suspicious of the aristocracy, it was indisposed to confer upon it any influence. Thus, only a few deputies, some from a spirit of moderation, others from having started the idea, advocated the English institutions, and composed the entire party of the minister; a party necessarily weak, since it presented conciliatory views only to heated passions, and had reasons alone, without means of action, to oppose to its adversaries.

The popular party began to be divided, because it began to conquer. Lally-Tolendal, Mounier, Malouet, and the other partisans of Necker, approved of all that had been hitherto accomplished, inasmuch as the government had been thereby brought in harmony with their ideas, that is to say, to an approximation with the English constitution. At present they judged the progress sufficient; reconciled with the executive, they desired to stop. The popular party, on the contrary, was of opinion that the goal was far from being gained. The Breton Club* was the arena where this party agitated with the greatest vehemence. A sincere conviction was the moving impulse of the great majority of its members; but personal designs began, nevertheless, to be there deployed; and even thus early the pure and first emotions of patriotism were giving way to the baser motives of individual interest. Barnave, a young advocate of Grenoble, clear and ready in comprehension, and possessing in a supreme degree the talent of happily expressing his thoughts, in conjunction with the two Lameths, formed a triumvirate, which attracted interest from the youth of its members, and soon exercised influence by their activity and talents. Duport, that young parliamentary councillor whom we have already seen distinguishing himself, was likewise comprised in their association. It was a saying of the time, that Duport reflected upon what should be done, that Barnave promulgated it, and the Lameths executed it. These young deputies were in the mean time mutual friends, without being declared enemies of any one.

The boldest of the popular leaders, he who, ever in the van, led the way to the most daring discussions, was Mirabeau. The absurd institutions of the old monarchy had outraged men of sense, and irritated all possessed of correct feeling; and it was scarcely possible but that some ardent mind should have felt peculiarly aggrieved by them, and have had fierce passions stimulated. Such a mind was that of Mirabeau, who, encountering from his birth all orders of despotism, parental, kingly, and judicial, consumed his youth in combating and execrating them. He was born beneath the sun of Provence, and sprung from a noble family. At an early age, he became notorious for his disorders, his quarrels, and his impassioned eloquence. His travels, his spirit of observation, and his vast reading, had taught him much; and his memory was one of the most retentive. But reckless, eccentric, even sophistical when not roused by passion, he became quite a different being when under its influence. Prompt to excitement in the tribune, and in the presence of his opponents, his mind was speedily fired: at first his ideas were confused, his words broken, his frame tremulous; but the light soon broke, and then his intellect achieved in an instant the labour of years; all was discovered to him at the very moment he spoke, and its expression flowed from him with warmth and rapidity. Stimulated by fresh contradiction, he became still more energetic and lucid, and depicted the truth in startling and terrible colours. In difficult emergencies, when all were fatigued by a long debate, or intimidated by danger, an exclamation, an emphatic phrase, fell from his lips; his features grew terrific in hideousness and the glare of genius, and the assembly, enlightened or re-assured, enacted laws or passed resolutions worthy of its dignity and greatness.

Proud of his great powers, humorous upon his own vices, by turns haughty and ingratiating, he gained some by flattery, silenced others by sarcasms, and led all in his train by an extraordinary faculty of exciting enthusiasm. His party was every where—amongst the people, in the assembly, in the court itself—with all in fact to whom he addressed himself for the moment, and he mingled familiarly with all classes. Generous when necessary, he had applauded the rising talent of Barnave, though his young friends were distasteful to him; he appreciated the profound understanding of Sieyes, and soothed his truculent temper; he disliked in Lafayette too irreproachable a life; and in Necker he detested an excessive stiffness, a pride

* "Maury and Cazalès in a certain degree represented, the first the clergy, and the second the nobility. The first preserved at the tribune the habits he had contracted as a preacher and academician; he discoursed upon matters of legislation without understanding them, never seizing the real point of a question, nor even the most advantageous one for his party; exhibiting great boldness, erudition, tact, and a brilliant and unfailing readiness in debate, but never a profound conviction, strong judgment, or veritable eloquence. He spoke pretty nearly as soldiers fight. None could return more frequently or strenuously to the charge than he, or better supply the want of substantial arguments by quotations or sophisms, and of the emotions of the soul by oratorical formulas. Therefore, although possessed of considerable talent, he was deficient in that which imparts to it vitality—the earnestness of truth. Cazalès was the moral antipodes of Maury. His intellect was rapid and sound, his elocution equally easy but more animated; sincerity marked all his motives, and the reasons which he alleged were constantly the best that could be adduced. No rhetorician, the straightforward line was his in all questions of interest to his party, the declamatory line that of Maury. From the clearness of his views, the ardour of his character, and the skilful adaptation of his talents, his only failing arose from the falseness of his position, whereas Maury added his individual faults to those which were inseparable from the cause he espoused."—Mignet, vol. i. p. 89 90.

* This club had been formed in the last days of June. It was afterwards called "The Society of the Friends of the Constitution." of reason, and a pretension of governing a revolution which he knew to be his own work. He had little regard for the Duke of Orleans and his wavering ambition; and, as will be shortly demonstrated, he never had with him any common views. Thus, supported by his own genius alone, he attacked the despotism he had sworn to destroy. However, if he rejected the vanities of a monarchy, he was still more indisposed to the ostracism of a republic; but not being yet sufficiently avenged upon the great and upon royalty, he continued his course of annihilation. In fine, tormented by factitious wants, discontented with the present, he advanced towards a future, to himself dim and obscure, raising vague, uncertain suppositions from his various talents, his ambition, his vices, and his shattered fortunes; and accrediting by his contempt for opinion numberless suspicions and calumnies.

Thus were France and parties divided. The first dissensions amongst the popular deputies occurred on the subject of the excesses committed by the multitude. Mounier and Lally-Tolendal proposed a solemn proclamation to the people in reprobation of such outrages. The assembly, sensible of the inutility of the measure, and of the necessity of not indisposing the populace who had supported it, at first refused its concurrence; but afterwards yielding to the exhortations of some of its members, it ultimately issued a proclamation, which, as it had foreseen, was utterly disregarded, for words have but little effect in calming an excited people.

Universal agitation prevailed. A panic suddenly pervaded every quarter of the kingdom. The cry of those brigands who had been seen to start forth in the various disturbances, was in every mouth, and their aspect in every imagination. The court upbraided the popular party with their ravages, and the popular party retorted the reproach on the court. All at once, couriers were disseminated, who, traversing France in all directions, announced that the brigands were coming and cutting down the harvest before the crops were ripe. Meetings were held in every district, and in a few days the whole of France was under arms, in expectation of the brigands who never appeared. This stratagem, which rendered the revolution of the 14th July universal, by stimulating the nation to arms, was attributed at the time to all parties, and since chiefly to the popular party, which reaped its benefits. It is surprising that all should have been so eager to throw off the responsibility of a stratagem certainly more ingenious than criminal. It has been laid to the charge of Mirabeau, who was a person to have plumed himself upon being its author, but nevertheless always disavowed his participation therein. Such a proceeding was sufficiently congenial to the character of Sieyes's mind, and many have believed that he suggested it to the Duke of Orleans. Others, again, have imputed the manœuvre to the court, alleging that those couriers would have been stopped at every stage without the connivance of the government, and that the court, disbelieving the prevalence of the revolutionary spirit, and imagining it a mere explosion of the Parisians, had determined to arm the provinces in opposition to the capital. However the case might be, the fact itself conduced to the advantage of the nation, which it roused to arms, and to a state of watchfulness over its safety and rights.

The inhabitants of the towns had shaken off their fetters, and the rural population were likewise eager to be rid of theirs. They refused to pay the feudal dues, attacked those lords who had been guilty of oppression, set fire to their mansions, burned their title-deeds, and in some districts committed atrocious acts of vengeance. A melancholy accident had mainly contributed to incite this general exasperation. A certain Sieur de Mesmay, Lord of Quincey, gave an entertainment at his seat. All the people of the surrounding country had assembled, and were in the full enjoyment of careless gaiety, when a barrel of gunpowder, suddenly igniting, exploded with murderous consequences. This accident, afterwards ascertained to have been the consequence of imprudence, and not of treacherous design, was then charged upon the Sieur de Mesmay as a heinous crime. The rumour was soon spread abroad, and provoked peasants to the commission of cruelties, who were already hardened by a wretched existence, and rendered ferocious by long-continued sufferings. The ministers proceeded in a body to lay before the assembly a picture of the deplorable state of France, and to ask from it powers for re-establishing order. Ever since the 14th July, these disorders had manifested themselves in every shape. The month of August was now commencing, and it became indispensable to restore action to the government and the laws. But to attempt this task with any chance of success, it was necessary to begin the regeneration of the state by the reform of such institutions as were more particularly abhorrent to the people, and chiefly impelled them to disturbances. One part of the nation, in subjection to another part, was oppressed by a multitude of rights called feudal. Some of these, characterised as productive, imposed upon the peasants ruinous dues, whilst others, qualified as honorary, compelled them to humiliating obeisances and services towards their lords. They were the remnants of the feudal barbarism, the abolition whereof was due to humanity. These privileges, considered in the light of property, and indeed so styled by the king in his declaration of the 23d June, would perhaps never have been abolished by a regular discussion. It was necessary to excite their possessors, by a sudden and spontaneous movement, to propose their own despoilment.

The assembly was at the moment discussing the celebrated declaration of the rights of man. It had been originally debated whether any should be made, and it was not till the morning of the 4th August that it had been finally decided such a declaration should be framed and placed at the head of the constitution. In the evening sitting of the same day, the committee upon disturbances and the means of suppressing them, presented its report. The Viscount de Noailles and the Duke d'Aiguillon, both members of the nobility, immediately mounted the tribune, and represented that it was needless to employ force to bring the people back to order; that the causes of their misery should be removed, and then the agitation resulting therefrom would forthwith subside. Proceeding to further and more explicit explanations, they proposed to abolish all the vexatious rights, which, under the title of feudal rights, crushed the agriculturists. M. Leguen de Kerengal, a proprietor from Brittany, appeared in the tribune, habited in the garb of a farmer, and presented a frightful picture of the feudal system. Whereupon, generosity being stimulated in some, pride piqued in others, a certain paroxysm of disinterestedness was suddenly provoked; every one rushed to the tribune in order to lay down his privileges. The nobility gave the first example; and the clergy, not less fervid, hastened to follow it. A species of intoxication seized upon the assembly; dispensing with a superfluous discussion (which, indeed, under any circumstances, had been unnecessary to demonstrate the propriety of such sacrifices), all the orders, all the classes, all the possessors of any peculiar rights, flew to pronounce their respective renunciations. After the deputies of the first orders, those of the commons went in their turn to present their oblations. Having no personal privileges to sacrifice, they offered up those of provinces and towns. Equality of rights, instituted as respected individuals, was likewise established over all the districts of the country. Some members surrendered their pensions, and one, who was a member of the parliament, having nothing to give, proffered his devotion to the public welfare. The steps of the desk were thronged with deputies pressing to deposit their renunciations; all that could be done at the moment was to enumerate the various sacrifices, and the framing of the articles was adjourned to the following day. The fervour was general; but in the midst of this enthusiasm it was easy to observe that certain of the privileged classes were far from sincere, and were bent on pushing matters to an unreasonable extremity. Serious apprehensions might be justly entertained from the lateness of the hour, and the delirium pervading the assembly; and Lally-Tolendal, perceiving the danger, handed a note to the president, containing the words, "Every thing may be feared from the rapture of the assembly; break up the sitting." At the same instant a deputy rushed up to him, and pressing his hand with emotion, said, "Grant us the royal sanction, and we are friends." Lally-Tolendal, aware of the vast importance of linking the revolution to the king, moved that he should be proclaimed Restorer of French liberty. The proposition was hailed with rapture; a Te Deum was then decreed, and the members finally separated at an early hour in the morning.

During this memorable night there had been decreed—

The abolition of the title of serf;

The power of redeeming seignorial rights;

The abolition of seignorial jurisdictions;

The suppression of exclusive rights of chase, warren, dovecots, &c.;

The commutation of tithes;

The equality of taxation;

The admission of all citizens to civil and military employments;

The abolition of the sale of offices;

The destruction of all the privileges of towns and provinces;

The remodelling of guilds;

And the suppression of pensions granted without services.

These resolutions had been passed in a general form, but it remained to reduce them into decrees; and it was then that, the first ardour of generous impulse having subsided and each resumed his previous prepossessions, some strove to extend, others to restrict, the concessions pronounced. Stormy debates ensued, and a studied, ill-advised resistance chased away every sentiment of gratitude.*

The abolition of feudal rights had been agreed upon, but the mode still remained a question—whether by immediate suppression or redemption; and important distinctions were necessary to be drawn among the rights themselves. On first overrunning the country, the conquerors, progenitors of the nobility, had imposed services upon men and tributes upon lands. They had themselves occupied certain portions of the soil, which they had only restored by degrees to the cultivators, under covenants of perpetual rents. A lengthened holding, accompanied by numerous transmissions, constituting the essentials of property, all the burdens imposed on both men and lands had acquired that character. The Constituent Assembly was therefore in the predicament of being compelled to make an attack on subjects of property. In this position, it had to weigh their validity, not on the ground of their just or unjust acquisition, but as they were more or less onerous to society. It abolished personal services accordingly, and since many of those services had been commuted into acquittances, it abolished the acquittances. Amongst the payments charged upon the land, it suppressed those which were palpable relics of servitude, as the fine imposed on transmissions; and it declared all those perpetual rents redeemable, which had been the consideration on which the nobles had formerly granted to the cultivators portions of the soil. It was thus absurd to accuse the Constituent Assembly of having violated the rights of property, when every imaginable matter had been rendered so; but it was assuredly strange that the nobles, long inured to such violations, both by exacting tributes and refusing to pay taxes, should exhibit so sudden and rigorous a respect for principles, when their own prerogatives were the points at issue. The seignorial jurisdictions were likewise styled "property," since for many ages they had been handed down as inheritances; but the assembly was not weak enough to be awed by the phrase, and decreed their abolition, providing, nevertheless, that they should be retained until proper substitutions were found.

The exclusive right of chase was also a subject of warm disputes. Disregarding the idle objection that the whole population would be instantly in arms if the license to kill game were extended, the right was conferred on every cultivator within the limits of his own estate. A struggle was likewise made in behalf of the privileged dovecots. The assembly declared that any person might maintain them, but that at harvest-time the pigeons might be killed like ordinary game upon the lands they should scour. All the rangerships were abolished, under the condition, nevertheless, that the personal pleasures of the monarch should be secured by means compatible with liberty and property.

One article, above all, occasioned violent discussions, on account of the yet more important questions of which it was the prelude, and of the powerful interests it attacked—it was that referring to tithes. On the night of the 4th August, the assembly had proclaimed tithes redeemable. When the decree was about to be drawn up, it desired to abolish them without consideration, subjoining a stipulation that the support of the clergy should be adequately provided for by the state. Such a course was unquestionably contrary to form, because it was altering a resolution already passed. But Garat replied to this objection, that the modification was, in truth, an actual purchase, since it was the state instead of the individual payer who redeemed the tithe, by taking upon itself the burden of sustaining the clergy. The Abbé Sieyes, who astonished the community by appearing as an advocate of tithes, and was generally considered by no means a disinterested defender of such an impost, granted in reply that the state actually and truly

* "I was not present at this sitting, but one of my friends who attended, related to me the next morning what had passed. As he spoke in a tone too serious for me to suppose he was in jest, I began to think he had lost his senses; but I soon found in the public papers a confirmation of the particulars he had mentioned. I could not help thinking I was reading an account of one of those frolics sometimes entered into by wild young fellows, who, after pushing the bottle freely, begin to break their glasses, decanters, and plates, then to contend who shall throw the most valuable furniture out of the window, and, before they have done, leave the room empty; but who next day, at sight of their bill, deplore their folly while they pay for the things destroyed. Unfortunately, the patriotic frolic of the 4th August did not end so; it ruined multitudes of individuals who had no share in it, and enriched nobody. The reducing all the articles then decreed, gave room for long debates in the following sittings. Our sobered legislators thought they had only dreamt what they had too surely decreed, and several of them laboured to interpret and give a turn to the decrees, so as to reduce the effect of them considerably; but the terms of them were too positive to be open to any restriction which the people would admit. The only article they found it possible to modify was that which condemned the pigeons to death or emigration. It was insisted the next day by the members of the right side, and particularly by D'Espremenil, that all the decrees had been previously drawn up, and the sitting purposely opened so late to convert it into a nocturnal and scandalous huddle, the more easily to alter the proceedings in accordance with the plan of the authors of the manœuvre, as amidst the tumult that prevailed it was equally impossible for the assembly to have passed as the secretaries to have written them. But the president (Chapelier) and the secretaries boldly asserted that all those decrees had been passed; and the majority of the assembly, thinking themselves bound by their attestation, confirmed this work of darkness and delirium."—Bertrand's Memoirs, vol. i. pp. 399, 400, 401.

redeemed the tithe, but perpetrated a robbery on the mass of the nation, by burdening it with a debt which ought to weigh only upon the landed proprietors. This objection, presented in striking colours, was illustrated by that severe and oft-repeated phrase: "You desire to be free, and know not how to be just!" Although Sieyes imagined that it was not possible to repel his objection, nothing was more easy. The expense of public worship is chargeable upon all; whether it was expedient to make the landed proprietors alone, rather than the universal body of contributors, bear the charge, was purely a question for the state to determine. It robbed no person by making such a distribution of the impost as it judged proper. Tithes, by impoverishing the small proprietors, destroyed agriculture; the state was therefore bound to remove the burden, which position Mirabeau demonstrated by conclusive analogy. The clergy, who had a decided preference for tithes, because they had a clear presentiment that the stipends allowed by the state would be proportioned to their legitimate occasions, claimed to be proprietors of the tithes, by immemorial grants, and reproduced that stale argument of long possession, which proves nothing; for were it valid, every abomination, despotism itself, would be rendered legitimate by possession. They were answered, that tithes were but an usufruct, which was not transferable, and possessed none of the main features of property; that they evidently constituted an impost established in their favour, which impost the state now took upon itself to convert into another. The pride of the clergy took alarm at the idea of receiving salaries, and loud and vehement were their complaints at the indignity. Mirabeau, who was preeminent in hurling barbed shafts of reason and sarcasm, replied to the lamenters that he was acquainted with but three modes of deriving existence in a state of society, to wit—robbing, begging, or possessing a salary. The clergy were convinced that it behoved them to abandon with a good grace what it was impossible for them to defend. The parish priests especially, aware that they had every thing to gain from the equitable spirit that actuated the assembly, and that it was the overgrown wealth of the prelates against which the attacks were really levelled, were the first to recede from the conflict. The complete abolition of tithes was thereupon decreed, under condition that the state should impose upon itself the expenses of public worship, and that in the mean time the tithes should continue to be gathered. This last clause, which bespoke the considerate spirit of the assembly, became however of no avail. The people would pay no longer, but before the decree the same determination had been doggedly evinced; and when the assembly abolished the feudal system, it was already overturned in fact. On the 13th August, all the articles were presented to the king, who accepted the title of Restorer of French liberty, and gave his presence at the solemnization of the Te Deum, having the president on his right hand and all the deputies in his train.

Thus the most important reform during the revolution was consummated. The assembly had evinced equal resolution and prudence. Unfortunately, a people can never resume with moderation the exercise of its rights. Deplorable outrages were committed throughout the whole kingdom. The country-seats continued to be burnt, and the fields were inundated with sportsmen, eager to put in force their newly-acquired rights. They spread themselves over the lands hitherto exclusively reserved for the enjoyment of their oppressors, and committed frightful devastations. Every usurpation meets with a severe return, and he who exercises it would do well to reflect on the truth, if not for himself at least for his children, who almost always endure the punishment due to him. Numerous accidents occurred, as might be anticipated. On the 7th August, the ministers had again appeared before the assembly, to present a report upon the state of the country. The keeper of the seals had exposed the alarming disorders which had broken out, and Necker had displayed the wretched state of the finances. The assembly heard this double communication with sadness, but without discouragement. On the 10th, it passed a decree touching public tranquillity, in which the municipalities were enjoined to ensure the maintenance of order by dispersing all seditious assemblies. They were instructed to deliver simple rioters to the ordinary tribunals, but to imprison those who had disseminated alarming reports, produced forged orders, or excited disturbances, and to send the examinations to the National Assembly, to enable it to trace the troubles to their origin. The national guards and the regular troops were placed at the disposal of the municipalities, and they were ordered to take an oath of fidelity to the nation, the king, and the law. This was the oath which was afterwards called the civic oath.

Necker's report upon the finances was alarming to the last degree. The want of subsidies was the circumstance which had caused an appeal to a national assembly, which assembly, from its first meeting, had entered into a contest with power, and, providing merely for the pressing necessity of establishing guarantees and reviving confidence, it had neglected that of placing the revenues of the state upon a sure basis. Necker alone had all the disquietudes attending the financial department. Whilst Bailly, labouring to draw provisions to the capital, was a prey to the bitterest anxieties, Necker, harassed by wants less urgent indeed, but far more extended, immersed in most painful calculations, and devoured by a thousand agonies, attempted to find palliatives for the national distress; and whilst his mind was solely occupied with fiscal questions, he was incapable of reflecting that the assembly was solely engaged with political questions. Necker and the assembly, each preoccupied by a peculiar object, had optics for none besides. However, if the alarms of Necker were justified by the actual distress, the confidence of the assembly was equally so by the elevation to which its views soared. That assembly, holding France and its destiny in embrace, refused to believe that so fair a realm, although indebted for the instant, could be for ever paralysed with indigence.

Necker, on assuming the ministry in August 1788, found only 400,000 francs (£16,700) in the treasury. By great exertions, he had provided for the most pressing calls, but since that time, circumstances had augmented the demands and diminished the resources. It had been found necessary to purchase corn, to re-sell it below the current value, to distribute considerable sums in charity, and to prosecute public works as a means of giving employment to operatives. For this last object alone 12,000 francs (£500) had been drawn from the exchequer daily. At the same time that the expenses were thus increased, the receipts fell off. The reduction in the price of salt, the delay in payments, and often the positive refusal to discharge the taxes, smuggling by armed bands, the demolition of the barriers, the destruction of the registers and the assassination of the clerks, had annihilated a portion of the revenue. In consequence, Necker demanded a loan of 30,000,000 (£1,250,000). The first impulse was so favourable, that a cry arose to vote the loan by acclamation, but this warmth of feeling quickly subsided. The members testified a repugnance for fresh loans, and fell into some degree of inconsistency by appealing to the instructions they had already discarded, but which prohibited them from sanctioning taxation previous to the completion of the constitution; they even proceeded to calculate the sums received since the preceding year, as if they doubted the honesty of the minister. However, the necessity of providing for the exigencies of the state ensured the adoption of the loan; but the plan of the minister was altered, and the interest reduced to 4½ per cent., in groundless reliance upon a patriotism which certainly pervaded the nation, but was not to be expected amongst money-lenders by profession, the only persons who in ordinary cases embark in that description of financial speculations. This preliminary error was one of those which assemblies generally commit, when they substitute for the precise views of the practical minister the vague ideas of twelve hundred speculative minds. At the same time, it was easy to discern that public opinion already began to grow discontented with the timidity of the minister.

After these indispensable attentions bestowed on the public tranquillity and the finances, the assembly entered upon the declaration of rights. The first idea thereof had been suggested by Lafayette, who had himself borrowed it from the Americans. The discussion upon that subject, which had been interrupted by the revolution of the 14th July, resumed on the 1st August, again interrupted by the abolition of the feudal system, was once more taken up and definitively closed on the 12th August. The idea of such a declaration had something imposing in it, which enraptured the assembly. The prevailing bias of the era led men to embrace every thing that savoured of grandeur; this enthusiastic spirit drew forth their sincerity, their courage, their virtuous and their evil tendencies. They seized, therefore, upon this idea, and resolved to carry it into immediate execution. If the task had been simply to promulgate certain principles held in especial abhorrence by the power whose yoke had been so recently shaken off, such as the voting of taxes, religious freedom, the liberty of the press, or ministerial responsibility, nothing had been more easy. America and England had already performed it. France might have couched in certain clear and positive axioms the new principles which she imposed upon her government; but France, breaking with all the past, and reverting to the state of nature, must necessarily aspire to frame a complete declaration of all the rights of man and the citizen. Much was said in the first debates upon the necessity and the danger of such a declaration. Long and useless discussions ensued upon these points; useless, because there was neither advantage nor hazard in publishing a declaration composed of propositions far above the comprehension of the bulk of the people; a thing fitted only for a certain number of philosophic minds, about the last to take an important share in popular seditions. It was at length decided, however, that it should be framed, and placed at the head of the constitutional act. But it was still to draw up, and therein lay the great difficulty. What was a right?—that which was due to mankind. Now, all the good that could be done to men was due to them; therefore, that every measure of government should be wise was a right. Thus all the propounded forms contained a definition of the law, the mode in which it ought to be declared, the principle of sovereignty, &c. It was objected, that these were not rights but general maxims. Still it was essential to embody these maxims. Mirabeau, losing all patience, at last cried out, "Dispense with the word right, and say, 'In the interest of all it has been declared'——." Nevertheless, the more imposing title of a declaration of rights was preferred, and thereunder were confounded maxims, principles, and definitions. Out of the whole was composed the celebrated declaration standing at the head of the constitution of 1791. In truth, there was but one misfortune attending it, to wit, the loss of several sittings for a philosophical commonplace. But who may throw obloquy on those minds for too much fervour on a favourite object? Who has a right to despise a prepossession which was inevitable during the first moments of excitement?

It was felt that the labours of the constitution could be no longer postponed. The tediousness of the preliminary discussions caused a general sentiment of fatigue, and without the walls of the assembly the fundamental questions were first agitated. The English constitution was the model which naturally presented itself to numerous minds, since it was an arrangement concluded between the king, the aristocracy, and the people, at the close of a struggle similar in its characteristics. The essential features of that constitution consisted in the establishment of two legislative chambers, and the royal prerogative of assent. The minds of men, in their first impulse, cling to the most simple theories; a nation pronouncing its will and a king executing it, appeared to them the only legitimate form of government. Conferring on the aristocracy a power equal to that of the whole nation, by means of an upper chamber, and investing the king with the right to annul the national determination, by means of a royal assent, seemed to them the height of absurdity. "The nation wills, the king executes:" men refused to leave these simple elements, and they firmly believed they would have a monarchy, when they left a king as executor of the national resolves. A real monarchy, such as exists even in states accounted free, consists in the dominion of a single individual, on which curbs are laid by means of the national participation. The will of the prince, in such cases, really effects almost every thing, and that of the nation is limited to prevent evil, either by refusing taxes, or by its concurrent legislative functions as a third body. But so soon as the nation can ordain all it chooses, without the king being able to interpose a veto, the monarch dwindles into a mere magistrate. Such a form of government is a republic, with a single consul instead of several. The government of Poland, although it boasted a king, was never called a monarchy, but a republic; and there were kings likewise at Sparta.

A well-established monarchy, therefore, requires great concessions on the part of individuals. But it is not after a long political annihilation, and during their first enthusiasm, that they are disposed to make them. Consequently, a republic lurked in the opinions of most men without being pronounced, and they were republicans without being aware of the fact.

In debate the speakers did not explain themselves with distinctness; therefore, in spite of the genius and learning redolent in the assembly, the question was lamely discussed, and greatly misapprehended. The partisans of the English constitution, Necker, Mounier, Lally, could not perceive in what a monarchy must necessarily consist; and even had they had a distinct perception of it, they would not have ventured to state explicitly to the assembly, that the national will ought not to be all-powerful, and that it ought to be restrictive rather than active. Their arguments exhausted themselves in the summary, that it was necessary the king should have the power to check the usurpations of one assembly; that in order to assure his proper and cheerful execution of the law, he must concur in it; and that relations must of necessity exist between the executive and legislative powers. These reasons were illogical, or at all events weak. It was ridiculous, in fact, when recognising the national sovereignty, to desire to control it by the sole will of a king.*

* In the seventh chapter of this work, and at the opening of the history of the Legislative Assembly, the reader will find an opinion upon the faults attributed to the constitution of 1791, which seems to me a very just one. I have only one word to say here upon the project of establishing in France at that epoch the English form of government. That system is a compromise amongst the three interests which divide modern states, royalty, aristocracy, and democracy. Now, such an arrangement is feasible only after the exhaustion of their respective strength; that is to say, after combat; or, in other words, after revolution. In England, in fact, it was not effected until after a long struggle—after the triumph of democracy and usurpation. To attempt to compromise before the struggle, is to attempt to make peace before war. It is a mournful but nevertheless an incontestible truth, that men negotiate only when they have exhausted their strength.

They supported the two chambers with more effect, because there are, even in a republic, higher classes interested to oppose the too rapid progress of the surging classes, and which defend the old against the new institutions. But this upper chamber, though yet more indispensable than the royal prerogative, since there is no example of a republic without a senate, was repelled with greater vehemence than the right of veto, as indignation was more fierce against aristocracy than against royalty itself. An upper chamber was therefore out of the question, for in truth it was repudiated by all: the petty nobles opposed it, because they would find no seat therein; the magnates of the privileged orders, because they were rendered desperate, and desired to drive all things to the worst; and the popular party, because it was unwilling to place the aristocracy in a position whence it could control the national will. Mounier, Lally, and Necker, were almost the only advocates of this upper chamber. Sieyes, with the rashness of a positive theorist, rejected both the two chambers and the royal assent. He held society to be indivisible; according to him, the mass, without distinction of class, ought to be intrusted with ordaining, and the king, as sole magistrate, with executing. Thus he was perfectly sincere when he said, that a monarchy and a republic were identical, since the difference in his eyes consisted merely in the number of magistrates endowed with the executive. The characteristic of Sieyes's mind was concatenation, that is to say, a rigorous connexion between his own ideas. He was in perfect harmony with himself, but far from being so either with the eternal nature of things or with minds differently constituted from his own. He subdued them by the sway of his indefeasible axioms, but rarely persuaded them; thus, being equally incapable of severing his theories and of obtaining their adoption in full, he was pretty sure to be finally disgusted. Mirabeau, with his accurate, swift, and pliant genius, was not more proficient in matters of political science than the assembly itself. He repudiated the two chambers, not from conviction, but from foresight of their actual impossibility, and from hatred of the aristocracy. He defended the kingly assent from a monarchical bias, and he had pledged himself to its support from the opening of the states, by his saying that without that safeguard he would rather live at Constantinople than at Paris. Barnave, Duport, and Lameth, were of course differently disposed to Mirabeau. They admitted neither the upper chamber nor the royal assent; but, without the obstinacy of Sieyes, they consented to modify their opinion by according to an upper chamber and the king a simple suspensive veto, that is to say, a power of temporarily opposing the national will as expressed in the lower chamber.

The first debates occurred on the 28th and 29th August. Barnave's party was desirous of negotiating with Mounier, whom his inflexibility rendered leader of the English constitution party. The most stubborn is always the most important to win over, and accordingly it was to him that overtures were made. Conferences were in consequence held. When Barnave's party saw that it was impossible to change an opinion become a settled predilection, it consented to adopt those English forms which he cherished so dearly, but on condition that, when raising an upper chamber and the royal prerogative in opposition to the popular chamber, to the two should be granted only a suspensive veto, and that, furthermore, the king should not be empowered to dissolve the assembly. Mounier returned the answer of a man immoveable in his conviction; he said, that truth did not belong to him, and that he could not sacrifice a portion of it to secure the rest. He thus lost the two institutions, by refusing to modify them. And if it were true, which, as will be seen, it was not, that the constitution of 1791, by suppressing the upper chamber, destroyed the throne, Mounier would have had severe reproaches to make himself. Mounier was no zealot, but very stubborn; he was as positive in his system as Sieyes in his, and preferred the loss of all to the concession of a part. The negotiations were broken off with mutual feelings of irritation. The opposite party had threatened Mounier with the public opinion in Paris, and it departed, as he said, to exercise the influence at which he had been warned to tremble.*

The English constitution was, therefore, impracticable in France until after the revolution. No harm was done, certainly, by advocating it, but an erroneous course of action was pursued in furtherance thereof, but had the most advisable course been adopted, the same ill success would have attended the endeavour. For I have no doubt that had the English constitution, in its full integrity, been engraven on the table of our law, such a treaty would have failed to calm passions, the battle would have raged all the same, and all the horrors of war ensued in spite of the preliminary treaty. Such a reflection is in some sort consolatory, as it lessens regrets that might be otherwise felt. I repeat, therefore, that war, that is to say, revolution, was necessary and inevitable. It is only after long experience of the wretchedness of strife that justice makes its voice be heard amongst the children of men.

* I am far from blaming the obstinacy of the deputy Mounier, for nothing is more worthy of respect than conscientious opinion; but it is a fact sufficiently curious to place beyond doubt. On this account, I subjoin a passage taken from his "Address to his Constituents."

"Several deputies," says he, "undertook to obtain from me the abandonment of that principle (the royal assent), or, by yielding it themselves, to bind me, from gratitude, to grant them some compensation. They conducted me to the residence of a zealous advocate of liberty, who was desirous of a coalition between them and me, in order that liberty might encounter fewer obstacles, and also of being present at our conferences without interfering in the decision. Anxious to convince them, or be enlightened myself, I accepted the offer of opening conferences. They declaimed vehemently against the alleged inconveniences of the unlimited right the king would have to prevent a new law, and they assured me that if such a right were recognised by the assembly, a civil war would be the consequence. These conferences, twice resumed, had no result. They were recommenced at the house of an American, well known for his intelligence and virtues, who had tested both the theory and practice of institutions proper to maintain liberty. His opinion was favourable to my principles. When they were sufficiently convinced that all their efforts to induce me to abandon my opinions were useless, they at length declared to me that they attached very little importance to the question of the royal assent, though they had represented it a few days before as a cause of civil war; they offered to vote for the unrestricted right of assent, as also for two chambers, but under a pledge that I should not support the royal prerogative of dissolving the assembly of representatives; that I should ask for the upper chamber only a suspensive veto; and that I should not oppose a fundamental law which should establish national conventions for fixed periods, or upon the requisition of the assembly of representatives, or on that of the provinces, to revise the constitution, and make in it all such alterations as might be judged necessary. They understood, by national conventions, assemblies in which all the rights of the nation should centre; which should comprise all powers, and consequently annihilate, by their mere convocation, the authority of the monarch and of the ordinary legislature; disposing arbitrarily of every description of constituted authority, upsetting the constitution at will, and establishing either despotism or anarchy. In a word, they would have in a certain sense abandoned to a single assembly, bearing the title of National Convention, the supreme dictatorship, and exposed the kingdom to a periodical return of factions and disorder.

I testified my surprise that they should wish to draw me into a treaty upon the interests of the kingdom, as if we were its absolute masters. I observed that, by leaving only a suspensive veto to the first chamber, although composed of eligible members, it would be difficult to form it of persons worthy of public confidence; in such case, all the citizens would prefer being named representatives; and that the chamber, which would be a tribunal for trying crimes against the state, ought to be invested with the highest dignity, and consequently that its authority ought not to be inferior to that of the other chamber. In conclusion, I added, that when I believed a principle true, I felt obliged to maintain it, and that I could not sell it, since truth was the inheritance of all the citizens."

These questions divided the people as well as the representatives, and, although incapable of comprehending them, they were not less strenuous in their opinions. They had included them all under the short and comprehensive term of veto. They were partisans or opponents of the veto, and that meant that they were supporters or denouncers of tyranny. The populace, not even understanding it in that sense, took the veto for an impost it was necessary to abolish, or for an enemy it behoved them to hang; and they were fierce in their determination to put the foe to the lantern.*

The Palais-Royal, especially, was in the greatest fermentation. There congregated men of heated tempers, who, unable to comply even with the forms imposed in the district-meetings, held forth from a chair at their own good pleasure, and were hooted or borne in triumph by vast mobs, which went forth to execute what they had suggested. Camille-Desmoulins, already mentioned in this work, was distinguished amongst these orators by the energy, the originality, and the cynicism of his mind; without being cruel, this man loudly demanded acts of cruelty. There likewise was beheld Saint-Hurugue, an old marquis, who had been long imprisoned in the Bastille on account of family feuds, and was exasperated to madness against all authority. All these declaimers repeated day by day that it behoved the people to go to Versailles, and make inquiry of the king and the assembly why they delayed to effect the public good. Lafayette had the greatest difficulty in restraining them by continual patrolling bands. The national guard was already accused of aristocracy. "There was no patrole at the Ceramicus," cried Camille-Desmoulins. The name of Cromwell, even, had been pronounced in conjunction with Lafayette's. One day (Sunday the 30th August), a motion was made at the Palais-Royal; Mounier was denounced, Mirabeau was represented as in danger, and it was proposed to march to Versailles for the purpose of guarding the precious life of the latter. And yet Mirabeau advocated the royal sanction, but without intermitting his part of a popular tribune, or without appearing less so in the eyes of the multitude. Saint-Hurugue, at the head of a few fanatics, proceeded towards the road to Versailles. They desired, as they alleged, to induce the assembly to cashier its faithless representatives, in order that others might be named, and to solicit the king and the dauphin to visit Paris and place themselves in safety amidst the people. Lafayette hastened to the spot, stopped them in their course, and compelled them to retrace their steps. The next day, Monday the 31st, they again gathered together. They presented an address to the commune, in which they demanded the convocation of the districts to denounce the veto and the deputies who supported it, to revoke their appointment, and nominate others in their place. The commune repelled them twice with exemplary firmness.

During this interval, the assembly was the scene of great agitation. The rioters had written letters to the principal deputies, filled with threats and invectives, one of which was signed with the name of Saint-Hurugue. As soon as the assembly met on Monday the 31st, Lally denounced a deputation he had received from the Palais-Royal. This deputation had urged him to separate from the wicked citizens who supported the veto, and had added that an army of 20,000 men was ready to march. Mounier likewise read letters he had received on his part, and concluded by proposing to prosecute the secret authors of these machinations, and pressing the assembly to offer a reward of 500,000 francs to any who should give evidence to lead to their discovery. A tumultuous debate ensued. Duport maintained that it was beneath the dignity of the assembly to occupy its time with such absurdities. Mirabeau read letters addressed to him also, in which the enemies of the popular cause treated him with as much rancour as Mounier had been in those he produced. The assembly passed to the order of the day, and Saint-Hurugue, the signer of one of the denounced letters, was imprisoned by order of the commune.*

The three questions, embracing the permanence of the representative assemblies, the two chambers, and the veto, were discussed at the same time. The permanence was voted almost unanimously. The long interruption to national assemblies had been too fatal not to ensure their being rendered permanent. Then came on the great question of the unity of the legislative body. The galleries were occupied by a numerous and noisy audience. A great many of the deputies withdrew. The president, on that occasion the Bishop of Langres, strove in vain to detain them: they left in crowds. From all sides vehement shouts arose for a division. Lally once more attempted to speak; he was refused to be heard, the president being taunted with having sent him to the tribune: one member even went so far as to ask the president if he were not weary of annoying the assembly. Offended at these words, the president quitted the chair, and the discussion was again adjourned. The following day, an address from the town of Rennes was read, in which the veto was declared inadmissible, and all those traitors to the country who should vote for it. Mounier and his friends evinced great indignation, and proposed that the municipality should be severely reprimanded. Mirabeau retorted that the assembly had other duties to perform than giving lectures to municipal functionaries, and moved the order of the day. The question upon the two chambers was at length put to the vote, and, amidst a roar of applause, the unity of the assembly was decreed: 499 votes were given for a single chamber, 99 for two chambers, and 122 were lost, from the apprehensions wherewith many of the deputies were inspired.

Finally occurred the question of the veto. A middle term had been invented, that of the suspensive veto, which put the law in abeyance during one or more legislatures. This mode was considered as an appeal to the people, because the king, having recourse to fresh assemblies, and yielding to them if they persisted, seemed to appeal in reality to the national authority. Mounier and his party opposed it. They were right according to the system of the English monarchy, where the king consults the national representation, and never obeys it; but they were wrong according to the position they had themselves assumed. They were desirous, as they were wont to allege, merely to prevent precipitate resolutions. Now, the suspensive veto was equally effectual in that respect as the absolute veto. If the representative body persisted, the

* Two inhabitants of the country were speaking of the veto. "Dost thou know what this veto is?" asked one. "Not I." "Then I'll tell thee. Thou hast thy porringer full of soup, the king tells thee to spill it, and spill it thou must—that's all."

["Putting to the lantern," it may be observed, was a revolutionary phrase, meaning "hanging at a lamp-post," a very usual mode of disposing of victims in Paris at that time. M. Bertrand remarks (vol. ii. p. 14), that having asked a peasant what he understood by the suspensive veto, against which he was pouring forth the most violent imprecations, he answered, that "if the sipensive (mispronouncing the word) should pass, the king and his ministers might hang whom they pleased." It was with difficulty that Bertrand removed the man's impression.]

* [One of the letters read on this occasion by the president of the assembly, which had been addressed to him personally, is, from its curious strain, worthy of being transcribed. It will also serve as a sample of the rest.

"The patriotic assembly of the Palais-Royal have the honour to make it known to you, that if the aristocratic faction, formed by some of the nobility, clergy, and 120 ignorant and corrupt members, continue to disturb the general harmony, and still insist upon the absolute assent, 15,000 men are ready to enlighten their country-seats and houses, and particularly your own."—Bert. vol. ii. p. 10.]

national will became manifest; and, since they admitted its sovereignty, it was absurd to resist it indefinitely.

The ministry, in fact, was sensible that the suspensive veto would in practice have the effect of the absolute veto, and Necker advised the king to take the credit of a voluntary sacrifice, by addressing a message to the assembly in favour of the suspensive veto. A rumour of this intention got abroad, and the design and spirit of the message were known beforehand. It was presented on the 11th September, every member being thoroughly acquainted with its purport. It might have been imagined that Mounier, advocating the cause of the throne, could not have views distinct from the occupier of that throne; but parties soon acquire interests apart from those they profess to serve. Mounier repudiated this communication, saying that if the king renounced a prerogative beneficial to the nation, it ought to be conferred upon him in spite of himself, and for the public weal. The usual parts were reversed, and the adversaries of royalty now supported the king's interference; but their exertions were fruitless, and the memorial was rudely rejected. Fresh explanations were entered into upon the meaning of the word "assent," and the question was raised whether such a right was essential to the constitution. After declaring that the constituent power was superior to the constituted powers, it was established that the assent was only to be exercised upon legislative acts, and to be entirely dispensed with upon constitutive acts, which latter were to be simply promulgated. 673 votes were given for the suspensive veto, and 325 for the absolute veto. Thus were the fundamental articles of the new constitution framed. Mounier and Lally-Tolendal immediately resigned their functions as members of the constitution-committee.

A multitude of decrees had by this time been passed, without any having been as yet presented for the royal acceptance. It was consequently resolved to lay the measures of the 4th August before the king. It was debated whether an assent or a simple promulgation should be asked, according as they might be deemed legislative or constitutive acts. Maury, and even Lally-Tolendal, had the folly to assert that they were legislative, and to demand the assent, as if they had anticipated some obstacle from the royal power. Mirabeau, with infinite tact, maintained that certain of them abolished the feudal system, and were eminently constitutive, whilst others were purely acts of munificence on the part of the nobility and clergy, and that it was an insult to imagine that those orders desired the king to recall their liberality. Chapelier added, that the formal consent of the king could be scarcely deemed necessary, since he had approved of them already by accepting the title of restorer of French liberty, and sanctioning the Te Deum by his presence. In consequence, the king was solicited to make a simple proclamation.*

A member suddenly moved resolutions that the crown was hereditary and the royal person inviolable. The assembly, sincerely desirous of recognising the king as the first hereditary magistrate, voted these two articles by acclamation. The inviolability of the heir-apparent was then proposed, but the Duke de Mortemart instantly objected that sons had sometimes attempted to dethrone their fathers, and that it was expedient to leave a power of punishing them. For this reason the proposition was rejected. With reference to the clause upon the hereditary transmission from male to male, and branch to branch, the deputy Arnoult moved that the renunciation of the Spanish branch, made in the treaty of Utrecht, should be confirmed. It was argued in reply, that there was no room for deliberation, since it was highly imprudent to alienate a faithful ally. Mirabeau declared himself of this opinion, and the assembly passed to the order of the day. In a few moments Mirabeau, desiring to make an experiment which has been improperly estimated, resolved upon re-opening the question which he had himself contributed to settle. The house of Orleans would be in competition with the house of Spain, in the event of the reigning branch becoming extinct. Mirabeau had perceived a malevolent eagerness to pass to the order of the day. Unconnected with the Duke of Orleans, though intimate with him, as he knew how to be with every body, he was anxious, nevertheless, to know the state of parties, and to ascertain who were the friends and who the enemies of the duke. The question of the regency presented itself; in a case of minority, the brothers of the king could not be guardians of their nephew, as they were the immediate heirs of the royal ward, and consequently but indifferently interested in his preservation. The regency, therefore, would fall to the nearest relation, who was the queen, the Duke of Orleans, or the Spanish branch. Mirabeau moved that the regency should be conferred only on a man born in France. "The acquaintance," said he, "that I have with the geography of this assembly, the regions from which the shouts for the order of the day have rolled, convince me that no less a question is at issue than one of foreign domination; and that the proposition not to deliberate, apparently Spanish, is possibly none other than Austrian!" At these words exclamations resounded through the hall; the debate was resumed with extraordinary vehemence; all the dissentients again lustily vociferated for the order of the day. Mirabeau fruitlessly repeated to them at every shout that they could be actuated by only one motive, a desire to introduce a foreign supremacy into France; they gave him no answer, for it was true enough that they preferred a foreigner to the Duke of Orleans. At last, after a debate of two days, it was again resolved that there was no room for deliberation. But Mirabeau had obtained his object, by forcing parties to develope themselves. His conduct on this occasion was certain to provoke accusations against him, and he was thenceforth stigmatised as an agent of the Orleans faction.*

* These decrees were presented to him on the 20th September.

* The particulars of Mirabeau's proceedings in regard to all parties are not yet sufficiently ascertained, but are intended to be illustrated ere long. I have obtained undoubted information from those charged with the publication; I have had in my possession several important documents, and especially the paper written in the form of a profession of faith, which constituted his secret treaty with the court. I am not permitted to give any of those documents to the public, nor even to specify their holders. I can only state what the future will sufficiently demonstrate, when all the proofs shall have been published. I am, however, enabled to affirm with distinctness, that Mirabeau never was concerned in the suspected plots of the Duke of Orleans. Mirabeau came from Provence actuated by a single design, namely, to battle with the arbitrary power from which he had suffered wrong, and which his reason as well as his feelings taught him to regard as detestable. When at Paris, he frequently visited a banker, then well known, and a man of considerable merit. In his house the usual topics of conversation were politics, finance, and political economy. Mirabeau there derived much information upon these matters, and formed a connexion with what was called the exiled Genevese colony, of which Clavière, afterwards minister of finance, was a member. However, Mirabeau contracted no strictly intimate ties. He had a great deal of familiarity in his manners, which he derived from a consciousness of power; a feeling he often carried to imprudent lengths. Owing to this familiar bearing, he was on easy terms with every body, and appeared closely united with all those whom he addressed. It was thus that he was repeatedly imagined the friend and accomplice of divers men with whom he had no interest in common. I have already said, and I now repeat, that he was of no party. The aristocracy could not endure his name; the party of Necker and Mounier was unable to come to an understanding with him. The Duke of Orleans alone was in a position to appear united with him. And they were believed to be so, in fact, because Mirabeau was on familiar terms with the duke, and because both being suspected of soaring ambition, the one as a prince, the other as a

Whilst still excited by this angry discussion, the assembly received the king's answer to the resolutions of the 4th August. The king signified his approval of their spirit, but gave to some only a conditional adherence, in the hope they would be modified when finally framed for execution, and to the majority of them he repeated the objections alleged in the debate, and disregarded by the assembly. Mirabeau mounted the tribune. "We have not thoroughly examined," said he, "the superiority of the constituent power over the executive power; we have in some sort cast a veil over such questions (the assembly in reality had explained in its own favour the manner in which they should be understood, without passing any regular decree on the subject); but if our constitutive authority be disputed, we shall be obliged to assert it. Let us act frankly and without prevarication. We confess there are difficulties in the execution, but we do not insist upon that execution. Thus we claim the abolition of offices, but at the same time assign reimbursement for the future, and the security for that reimbursement; we declare the impost, which serves to subsidise the clergy, destructive to agriculture, but until a substitute be found for it, we order the collection of tithes; we abolish seignorial jurisdictions, but leave them in existence until other tribunals are established. The same may be observed of the other articles; they all embody principles which it is essential to render irrevocable by giving them promulgation. But, indeed, were they false, the public mind is in possession of these resolutions, and it is no longer possible to refuse them. Let us repeat ingenuously to the king what Philip II.'s fool said to that despotic prince:—'What wouldst thou do, Philip, if all the world said yes, when thou saidst no?'"

The assembly directed its president to proceed again to the king, to solicit his promulgation. The king yielded to the demand. On its part, the assembly, deliberating on the duration of the suspensive veto, extended it to two legislatures; but it was wrong to let too strong an inference be drawn that it was in some degree a recompense granted to Louis XVI. for the concessions he had just made to public opinion.

Whilst the assembly pursued its way amidst the obstacles raised by the sullen animosity of the privileged classes and the popular outbreaks, other difficulties accumulated around it, and gave its enemies cause of exultation. These hoped it would be paralysed by the financial distress, as the court itself had been. The first loan of 30,000,000 had not succeeded; a second of 80,000,000, ordained on a fresh proposition from Necker,* had not been attended with a more fortunate result. "Go on and discuss," cried M. Degouy Darcy one day; "let time quietly slip away, and at the expiration of a certain period, we shall be in the final agony!—I am about to communicate to you some awful truths." "Order! order!" shouted happen?—we shall contribute a share of our fortunes, and all will be hushed." M. Degouy proceeded: "The loans that you have voted have yielded nothing; there are not 10,000,000† in the treasury." At these words he was again surrounded, remonstrated with, and silenced. The Duke d'Aiguillon, chairman of the finance committee, gave his statement a direct contradiction, by proving that there were 22,000,000 in the coffers of the state. However, it was resolved that Fridays and Saturdays should be especially devoted to financial matters.

Necker himself at length came forward. Oppressed with his continual struggles, he renewed his incessant complaint, reproaching the assembly with having done nothing to relieve the financial embarrassments, after sitting five months. The two loans had been unproductive, because the disorders had destroyed credit. Money was hidden, and foreigners had testified no disposition to invest their capitals in the proposed loans. Emigration and the departure of travellers had likewise lessened the circulating medium, and there scarcely remained sufficient currency for daily use. The king and queen had been obliged to send their plate to the mint. In consequence of this disastrous state of things, Necker asked for a contribution of a fourth of incomes, affirming that such a supply appeared to him sufficient for all purposes. A committee consumed three days in investigating this plan, of which it reported most favourably. Mirabeau, the known enemy of the minister, was the first to speak, pressing the assembly to sanction the plan without discussing it. "Not having time to weigh it," said he, "you ought not to take upon yourselves the responsibility of the event, by approving or condemning the proposed measure." On this ground he recommended the assembly to vote the project at once and in confidence. The assembly, moved by his reasons, adopted the proposition, and directed Mirabeau to retire and draw up the decree. During the interval, the sensation partially evaporated, and the opponents of the minister asserted resources to exist which had escaped the acumen of Necker. His friends, on the contrary, attacked Mirabeau, and complained that he designed to crush him by making him responsible for events. Mirabeau returned and read his decree. "You plant a dagger in the minister's plan," exclaimed M. de Virieu. Mirabeau, never recoiling without a vigorous rejoinder, frankly avowed his motives; he granted he laid himself open when he stated that it was his desire to throw upon M. Necker alone the responsibility of events; he said he had not the honour to rank as his friend, but were he his tenderest friend, being a citizen before all ties, he would not hesitate to compromise him rather than the assembly; that he was far from believing the kingdom would be in danger should M. Necker be deceived, but that, on the contrary, the public safety would be seriously compromised if the assembly staked its credit and failed in a decisive operation. He subsequently suggested an address to stimulate the national patriotism and support the ministerial project.

Cheers resounded from all sides, but still the debate was maintained. Multifarious amendments were proposed, and the time was consumed in frivolous subtleties. Irritated at such pertinacious opposition, and impressed with the urgent nature of the emergency, he scaled the tribune for the last time, worked himself tribune, they seemed marked out for allies. The penury of Mirabeau, and the affluence of Orleans, likewise appeared a probable bond of union. Nevertheless, Mirabeau remained poor until his connexion with the court. He then kept watch on all parties, took every opportunity to drive them into explanations, and felt his own importance too sensibly to bind himself without full consideration. Once only he engaged in some distant relations with one of the supposed agents of the Duke of Orleans. He was invited to dinner by this alleged agent, and he, to whom risk was never a subject of thought, accepted the invitation more from curiosity than any other motive. Before proceeding to the entertainment, he communicated the matter to his confidential friend, and testified much satisfaction at the coming conference, in which he expected to elicit important revelations. The dinner passed over, and Mirabeau came to report what had occurred: he had been merely treated to vague expressions concerning the Duke of Orleans, the estimation in which he held the talents of Mirabeau, and the fitness he conceived him to possess for governing a state. This conference was, therefore, a very insignificant affair, and could at the most but indicate that the party would willingly make a minister of Mirabeau. Thus he did not fail to remark to his friend, with his accustomed gaiety: "I can scarcely avoid be coming a minister, for the Duke of Orleans and the king are equally bent on nominating me." Such observations were mere ebullitions of pleasantry, for Mirabeau never believed in the imputed projects of the duke. I will give in a subsequent note some further particulars.

* Decree of the 27th August. † About £420,000.

into possession of it, exhibited the question in its proper aspect with admirable perspicuity, and demonstrated the impossibility of lightly shaking off the dire necessities of the moment. Then, his genius warming to inspiration, he depicted all the horrors of bankruptcy; he presented it under the guise of a pestilent impost, which, instead of pressing gently upon all, falls on a portion only, whom it grinds to the dust; he likened it to a yawning chasm, into which living victims are hurled, but which closes not even after it has engulfed them, for not the less is owing because a refusal is made to pay. Finally, wielding the effective engine of terror—"The other day," said he, "on occasion of a contemptible motion at the Palais-Royal, a voice exclaimed, 'Catiline is at the gates of Rome, and you deliberate!' and yet there was no Catiline, no peril, no Rome; but to-day hideous bankruptcy lowers on you, threatening to devour yourselves, your honour, your fortunes—and you deliberate!"

At these words the assembly, in a transport, rose, uttering shouts of enthusiasm. A deputy desired to reply; he advanced, but, terrified at his own temerity, he stood motionless and speechless. The assembly forthwith resolved that, having heard the report of its committee, it adopted the plan of the minister of finance in confidence. Such is the charm of eloquence; but only he could work similar marvels who possessed at once the intellect and the passions of Mirabeau.

CHAPTER IV.

INTRIGUES OF THE COURT—ATTACK ON THE PALACE OF VERSAILLES—THE KING AND THE ASSEMBLY REMOVE TO PARIS—FORMATION OF CLUBS.

WHILST the assembly was thus extending its care to all parts of the social edifice, great events were brooding. By the junction of the orders, the nation had regained legislative and constituent supremacy. As a consequence of the 14th July, it had taken arms to support its representatives. Thus the king and the aristocracy stood isolated and disarmed, having nothing more in their behalf than the feeling of their rights, which none partook, and brought in front of a nation prepared for combat and victory. Notwithstanding this position, the court, secluded in a small town almost solely peopled by its retainers, was in some sort beyond the popular influence, and might even attempt a sudden blow at the assembly. It was natural that Paris, situated at the distance of a few leagues from Versailles, the metropolis of the kingdom, and the abode of a prodigious multitude, should be wishful to draw the king within its walls, with a view to free him from all aristocratic influence, and secure the advantages which the residence of the court and government always confer on a town. After having reduced the authority of the king, it remained only to make sure of his person. Such was the inevitable tendency of events, and from all quarters the cry was heard: "The king to Paris!" The aristocracy no longer attempted to shield itself from additional losses. It was too disdainful of what still remained as its possession to take any pains to preserve it; hence it was quite as eager for a violent change as the popular party itself. A revolution is inevitable when two parties are coincident in promoting it. Both contribute to the catastrophe, and the strongest reaps the profit. Whilst the patriots were bent on conducting the king to Paris, the court meditated his transit to Metz. There, in an impregnable fastness, he might have ordered whatever his caprice prompted, or, to speak more correctly, whatever the caprice of those around him prompted. The courtiers were busy hatching schemes, devising plans, seeking to enlist partisans, and, beside themselves with empty hopes, betraying their own machinations by imprudent threats. D'Estaing, of recent renown, won in the van of French squadrons, commanded the national guard of Versailles. He wished to be faithful to the nation and the court—a difficult part, ever open to obloquy, and which almost unexampled firmness can alone render honourable. He became apprised of the intrigues of the courtiers. The highest personages were amongst the number of the plotters; witnesses the most worthy of credence had been cited to him, and he wrote that well-known letter to the queen, in which he spoke to her with respectful energy on the impropriety and danger of such manœuvres. He disguised nothing, and specified every name.* The letter was without

* The letter of the Count d'Estaing to the queen is a curious record, and ought always to be consulted with reference to the events of the 5th and 6th October. That honest sailor, full of loyalty and independence (two qualities seemingly contradictory, but which are often found in conjunction in the breasts of seamen), had preserved the habit of speaking his mind to princes whom he loved. His testimony is above all suspicion, when in a confidential letter he lays before the queen the intrigues he has discovered and been alarmed by. It will show whether the court was in reality without a scheme at that period.

"My duty and loyalty demand that I lay at the feet of the queen an account of the journey I have made to Paris. I have been praised for sleeping soundly on the eve of an assault or a naval combat. I may venture to assert that I am not prone to timidity in any affairs. Reared with the dauphin, who was partial to me, accustomed to speak the truth at Versailles from early boyhood, a soldier and a sailor, conversant with forms, I reverence them without allowing them to fetter my frankness or my firmness.

Thus am I bound to confess to your majesty that I have been unable to close my eyes all night. I have been told in high circles, in good society (what might be the consequence, gracious Heavens, should it spread amongst the people!)—ay, repeatedly told, that signatures are canvassed for amongst the clergy and the nobility. Some persons allege that it is in concert with the king; others maintain that it is without his knowledge. It is confidently asserted that there is a regular plan formed; that it is by Champagne or Verdun that the king will withdraw or be removed; that he will go to Metz. Bouillé is named, and by whom?—by M. de Lafayette, who mentioned it to me in a whisper at the table of M. Jauge. I shuddered lest a single domestic might overhear him; I remarked to him that one word from his lips might prove a signal of death. M. de Lafayette is a cold calculator; he answered me that at Metz, as elsewhere, the patriots were the strongest, and that it was better one man should die for the safety of all.

The Baron de Breteuil, who is so slow to depart, manages the plan. Money is taken up, and promises held out to furnish a million and a half per month. The Count de Mercy is unfortunately specified as acting in concert. Such are the reports; if they are disseminated amongst the people, the result is not to be calculated; as yet they are circulated in whispers. Good men have testified to me their terrors for the consequences; the mere suspicion of the fact may produce terrible ones. I visited the Spanish ambassador, and I shall assuredly not conceal from the queen that at his house my alarm was redoubled. M. Fernand Nunès talked with me concerning these false rumours, concerning the horror that was expressed at the bare idea of so inconceivable a plan, which would draw after it the most disastrous and humiliating of civil wars; which would occasion the partition or the total loss of the monarchy, given up as a prey to domestic rage and foreign ambition; and which would expose the personages the most dear to France to irreparable misfortunes. After speaking of a wandering, persecuted court, betrayed by those who have not supported it when they had it in their power, who wish simply to involve it in their own downfall—the nation struck by an universal bankruptcy, from that moment inevitable, and all things fearful to contemplate, I interrupted him by exclaiming, that at all events there could be no other mischief than that which this false intelligence might produce if it became prevalent, because it was an idea without any foundation. The Spanish ambassador cast his eyes to the ground at this last phrase. I then became urgent; he at length confessed that some one of rank and undoubted credibility had informed him he had been asked to sign an association. He persisted in refusing to name him; but either from inattention, or for the sake of good, he fortunately did not exact my word of honour, which it would have been imperative on me to keep. I made no promise not to mention the fact. It has impressed me with a greater degree of terror than I have ever experienced. It is not for myself that I feel this alarm effect. When entering on such enterprises, the queen possibly anticipated remonstrances, or, at all events, could scarcely feel surprised at them.

At this period a crowd of strangers appeared in Versailles, and even unknown uniforms were seen. The company of the body-guards, whose period of duty had expired, was detained; some dragoons and chasseurs of the regiment "Trois-Evêchés" were summoned. The French guards, who had quitted the king's personal service, were mortified that the duty was intrusted to others, and resolved to repair to Versailles, in order to resume it. They had certainly no reason to complain, since they had themselves abandoned that service; but they were, as it is said, excited by others to the project. It was charged upon the court at the time, upon the allegation that it designed to alarm the king by this expedient, and draw him to Metz. One fact sufficiently demonstrates this intention. Since the riots of the Palais-Royal, Lafayette, in order to intercept the communication between Paris and Versailles, had fixed a post at Sèvres. He was compelled to withdraw it, on the demand of the deputies of the right side in the assembly. Lafayette succeeded in stopping the French guards, and dissuading them from their design. He wrote a confidential letter to the minister, Saint-Priest, informing him of what had occurred, and removing all apprehensions of danger. Saint-Priest, making an improper use of the letter, showed it to D'Estaing, who in his turn communicated it to the officers of the Versailles national guard, and to the municipality, for the purpose of apprising them of the calamities which had threatened the town, and of those which might threaten it again. It was proposed to call in the regiment of Flanders; many battalions of the Versailles guard opposed the measure, but the municipality persisted in sending its requisition, and the regiment was summoned. One regiment was but a feeble force against the assembly, but it was sufficient to carry off the king, and cover his flight. D'Estaing informed the national assembly of the measures that had been taken, and obtained its approval. The regiment arrived; the military parade which accompanied it, though not very formidable, did not fail to excite murmurs. The body-guards and the courtiers crowded round the officers, overwhelmed them with congratulations, and, as before the 14th July, they appeared in close confederacy and mutual understanding, and buoyed up by sanguine and lofty hopes.

The confidence of the court aggravated the distrust of Paris, and banquets ere long insulted the misery of the people. On the 2d October the body-guards were moved to give a feast to the officers in garrison. This festival was held in the saloon of the theatre. The boxes were filled with spectators from the court. The officers of the national guard were amongst the guests. A sprightly gaiety reigned throughout the entertainment, which wine soon fanned into fervour. The soldiers of the regiments were then introduced. The company, with drawn swords, drank to the health of the royal family; the toast of the nation was spurned, or at all events omitted; the trumpets sounded the charge, the boxes were scaled with vociferous shouts; the significant and well-known song of "Oh Richard! oh my king! the universe abandons thee!" was chanted in chorus; pledges were given to die for the king, as if he had been in the greatest danger; in a word, the delirium passed all bounds. White or black cockades, but all of a single colour, were distributed in profusion. The young of both sexes, glowing with chivalric recollections, animated each other with fervent phrases. It was at this moment that the national cockade was, as is alleged, trampled under foot. The fact was afterwards denied; but did not the intoxication render every thing credible, and every thing excusable? And besides, why hold such meetings, which raised on one side only transitory emotions of loyalty, and on the other a settled and vindictive exasperation? When the scene had reached this height, the queen was disturbed in her apartments, and she consented to grace the festival with her presence. The king was surrounded as he returned from the chase, and he too was drawn to the scene. The company threw themselves at the feet of both, and escorted them, as if in triumph, to their apartments. It is unquestionably sweet, when a man believes himself despoiled and menaced, to find friends; yet that is but a poor reason for self-deception, as regards duty, power, and means.

The report of this banquet was soon disseminated, and doubtless the popular imagination, in circulating the particulars, superadded its own exaggerations to those the festivity itself had caused. The promises given to the king were held as threats dealt out to the nation; the prodigality so ostentatiously displayed was regarded as a deliberate mockery of the public wretchedness, and the vociferations "To Versailles!" recommenced with greater violence than ever. Thus smaller causes combined to aggravate the effect of general causes. Some young men who appeared in Paris with black cockades were assaulted; one of them was dragged along by the populace, and the commune found itself compelled to prohibit cockades of a single colour.

The day after the fatal festival, a fresh scene, almost similar in its features, occurred on the occasion of a breakfast given by the body-guards in the circus of the riding-school. The company, as before, were presented to the queen, who expressed to them her satisfaction at the demonstration of Thursday. She was listened to with eagerness, because, being less reserved than the king, from her lips the sentiments of the court were gathered, and all her words were stored up and repeated. Irritation pervaded the public mind to a fearful extent, and the most deplorable consequences might justly have been anticipated. A commotion, as it chanced, was agreeable both to the people and the court; to the people, as a means of securing the person of the king, and to the court, as a means of terrifying him into a retreat to Metz. Neither was it repugnant to the Duke of Orleans, inasmuch as he hoped to obtain the lieutenancy of the kingdom if the king should withdraw himself; it has been even stated that his expectations aspired to the crown itself, which is scarcely credible, for he lacked boldness of mind sufficient for such lofty views. The advantages which he had grounds for anticipating from this new insurrection, have caused him to be accused of having participated in it; but the charge is groundless. He could not have imparted the impulse, for it resulted from the force of circumstances; he appears at the most to have seconded it; and, even in this respect, a multifarious investigation, and time, which unlocks all secrets, have brought to light no trace of a concerted plan. There is little doubt that the Duke of Orleans was then, as during the whole revolution, merely in the train of the popular movement, distributing perhaps a little gold, furnishing occasion to certain mob phrases, and indulging himself in vague hopes.*

I entreat the queen to reflect, in her wisdom, upon all that may result from a false step; the first cost sufficiently dear. I have seen the excellent heart of the queen melt into tears at the fate of victims given up to execution; in this case there would be torrents of blood shed uselessly, for vain regret. Mere indecision may be without remedy. It is only by anticipating the design, by appearing even to foster it, that it may be partially controlled. Nothing is as yet lost. The queen may re-conquer his kingdom for the king. Nature has lavished upon her the means; they of themselves are sufficient. She may imitate her august mother; if not, I am silent. I beseech your majesty to grant me an audience some day in the course of this week."

* ["The insurrection of the 5th and 6th October was a true popular movement. It is useless to search for secret motives to account for it, or to attribute it to hidden intrigues of ambition; it was provoked by the imprudence of the court. The banquet of the life-guards, rumours of flight, apprehensions of civil war, and

The populace, already agitated by the discussions on the veto, exasperated by the black cockades, annoyed by the constant patrols, and tortured by the pangs of hunger, was in open revolt. Bailly and Necker had neglected no means to render food abundant; but from the difficulties of transport, the spoliations endured on the route, and, above all, from the utter impossibility of acting with the same efficiency as the spontaneous movements of commerce, the supplies of flour fell short. On the 4th October the agitation was greater than ever. The departure of the king for Metz was bruited abroad, and the necessity of going to Versailles in search of him was openly canvassed; the black cockades were execrated; bread was vociferously demanded. Numerous bodies of patrol succeeded in restraining the populace from outrage, and the night passed over in comparative tranquillity. But from dawn on the following day mobs began again to gather. The women flocked to the bakers' shops; bread was wanting, and they rushed to the town-hall to pour forth their complaints to the representatives of the commune. Those functionaries had not yet assembled, and a battalion of the national guard was drawn up in the square. Men now joined the women, but they refused to receive them, crying out that men were merely an incumbrance. They then fell precipitately on the battalion, and drove it back with showers of stones. At this instant, a door having been forced, the town-hall was invaded; brigands with pikes forced their way in with the women, and attempted to set the edifice on fire. Their atrocious design was prevented, but they got possession of the door leading to the great tower, and sounded the tocsin. The faubourgs forthwith put themselves in motion. A citizen named Maillard, one of those who had signalised themselves at the capture of the Bastille, consulted the officer in command of the battalion of the national guard as to the means by which the town-hall might be delivered from these furious women. The officer durst not sanction the expedient he proposed, which was to draw them together again under the pretext of going to Versailles, but without actually leading them thither. However, Maillard decided for himself, took a drum, and soon gathered them around him. They were grotesquely armed with clubs, broomsticks, muskets, and cutlasses. With this extraordinary armament, he passed down the quay, traversed the Louvre, was forced in spite of himself to lead it through the Tuileries, and at last debouched on the Champs-Elysées. There he exhorted them to lay down their weapons, on the ground that they ought to present themselves to the assembly as suppliants, and not as rioters in arms. The women consented to follow his advice, and Maillard was then compelled to lead them to Versailles, for it was utterly impossible to dissuade them from the enterprise. To this point an irresistible current of opinion had set in. Bands of men departed, dragging cannon; others surrounded the national guard, which, again, surrounded its general, to draw him to Versailles, the object of all hopes.

Whilst the capital was thus convulsed, the court was at perfect ease; but the assembly was roused to anger by a message it received from the king. It had presented for his acceptance the constitutional articles and the declaration of rights. His reply ought to have been a pure and unconditional acceptation, with a promise to promulgate them. For the second time, the king, without explaining himself too lucidly, addressed a series of observations to the assembly; he gave his accession to the constitutional articles, but without expressing approval of them; he allowed divers good maxims to exist in the declaration of rights, but they required explanations; the whole, in fine, could only be judged of, as he said, when the entire body of the constitution was framed. This was unquestionably a defensible opinion, and indeed many jurisconsults partook it; but the prudence of expressing it at this period was more than doubtful. Scarcely had the answer been read ere murmurs arose. Robespierre said that the king mistook his functions when he wrote critiques to the assembly, and Duport, that the message ought to have been countersigned by a responsible minister. Pétion took the opportunity to introduce the banquet of the body-guards, and he denounced, in energetic terms, the imprecations levelled at the assembly. Grégoire spoke of the famine, and asked the reason why a letter had been addressed to a miller, promising him 200 livres (£8) a-week if he would grind no corn. Such a letter proved nothing, for it might have emanated from any party; but it nevertheless excited considerable tumult, in the midst of which M. de Monspey called upon Pétion to sign his denunciation. Thereupon Mirabeau, who had disapproved, even in the tribune, the speeches of Pétion and Grégoire, rose to answer M. de Monspey. "I was the first to express disapprobation at those impolitic denunciations," said he; "but since you insist upon driving matters to extremity, I will be myself the denouncer, and I will affix my signature, when it shall have been proclaimed that there is no inviolability in France but for the king alone." At this terrible menace immediate silence ensued, and the king's answer was again taken up. It was eleven o'clock in the morning, and intelligence of the commotions at Paris was at that moment brought. Mirabeau went up to the president, Mounier, who, having been recently elected to the chair in spite of the clamours of the Palais-Royal, and menaced with a glorious fall, displayed an indomitable firmness during that mournful day. Mirabeau drew near him, and said in a low tone—"Paris is marching on us: feign illness, hasten to the palace, and tell the king to accept purely and unconditionally." "Paris marches!" replied Mounier; "so much the better: let them kill us all—all, however—and the state will be vastly benefited!" "Your remark is truly profound!" retorted Mirabeau, and returned to his place. The debate continued until three o'clock, when it was decided that the president should wait upon the king, to solicit from him a pure and unconditional acceptation. As Mounier was preparing to leave the hall, in order to proceed to the palace, a deputation was announced. It was Maillard, and the women who had followed him. Maillard demanded permission to enter and address the assembly; he was accordingly introduced, the women rushing tumultuously at his heels and penetrating into the body of the house. He commenced an exposition of what had occurred at Paris, enlarging upon the want of bread and the desperate condition of the people; he spoke of the letter addressed to the miller, and pretended that some one whom he had met on the road had stated that a priest was prepared to denounce it. This priest was Grégoire, and, as has been already related, he had made his denunciation. A voice hereupon accused Juigné, Bishop of Paris, of being the author of the letter. Indignant cries arose, repelling the imputation upon so virtuous a prelate. Maillard and his deputation were called to order. They were told that measures had been taken to provision Paris, that the king had omitted no precaution, that the assembly was about to entreat him to order additional exertions, that they must now withdraw, and that disorders were not the means for removing famine. Mounier then departed to visit the palace; the women crowded around him, and insisted upon accompanying him: he at first refused to listen to the proposal, but was ultimately obliged to admit six as his companions to the royal audience. He had to make his way through famine, alone propelled Paris on Versailles. If particular instigators contributed to produce the movement, which the most indefatigable of prejudiced inquisitors have left in doubt, they changed neither its direction nor its object. The consequence of the event was the destruction of the ancient system of the court; it took away its guard, transported it from the royal residence of Versailles to the capital of the revolution, and seated it under the eye of the people."—Mignet, vol. i. p. 113.]

the hordes arrived from Paris, who were armed with pikes, hatchets, and iron-bound clubs. The rain poured in torrents. A detachment of the body-guards charged the mob surrounding the president, and drove it back; but the women soon rejoined Mounier, and he at length reached the palace, where he found the regiment of Flanders, the dragoons, the Swiss, and the national guard of Versailles, drawn up in battle array. Instead of six women, he was compelled to take twelve with him: the king received them with kindness, and commiserated their distress, which gracious deportment sensibly affected them. One of them, a young and pretty girl, was so overpowered at sight of the monarch, that she could scarcely ejaculate the word "bread." The king, touched at her emotion, embraced her, and the women retired from the presence deeply moved by the interview.* Their companions awaited them at the gate of the palace: they refused to believe their report, saying, they had allowed themselves to be seduced, and prepared to tear them in pieces. The body-guards, commanded by the Count de Guiche, ran forward to disengage them; musket-shots rattled from various quarters, two guardsmen fell, and several women were wounded. Not far from this tumult, one of the mob, at the head of some women, pierced the ranks of the battalions and advanced to the railing of the palace. M. de Savonnières pursued this daring man, but he received a shot which broke his arm. These skirmishes engendered the worst feeling on both sides. The king, informed of the dangerous position of affairs, sent an order to his guards not to fire, and to retire to their barracks. Whilst they were withdrawing, some shots were exchanged between them and the national guard of Versailles, but from which side the first shots were fired has never been ascertained.†

During these deplorable conflicts, the king was holding a council, and Mounier was impatiently awaiting his determination. The latter sent repeated intimations to the king that his duties called him to the assembly, that the declaration of his acceptance would tranquillise the public mind, and that unless an answer were vouchsafed him, he must withdraw, as he could not longer absent himself from his post. It was debated in the council whether the king should leave Versailles; it continued in consultation from six till ten in the evening, and the king, as is said, was principally moved to remain, lest he should leave the place vacant for the Duke of Orleans. It was resolved that the queen and the children should be removed, but the crowd stopped the carriages the instant they appeared; and, furthermore, the queen had courageously determined not to separate from her husband. At length, about ten o'clock, Mounier received the pure and unconditional acceptation, and returned to the assembly. The deputies had left, and the hall was occupied by women. He announced to them the king's concession, which information they received with great composure, asking him, at the same time, whether their condition would be amended thereby, and especially whether they should have sufficient bread. Mounier returned as cheering an answer as he could, and caused to be distributed amongst them all the bread that it was possible to procure. That night, in which it is so difficult to fix the wrongs that were committed, the municipality assuredly was guilty of one in not providing for the wants of that famished crowd, which insufficiency of food had driven forth from Paris, and which could not have obtained any on the road after its departure.

At this moment the arrival of Lafayette was announced. He had struggled for eight hours against the national guard of Paris, which insisted upon repairing to Versailles. One of his grenadiers had addressed him in these words:—"General, you do not indeed deceive us, but you are yourself deceived. Instead of turning our arms against women, let us go to Versailles in search of the king, and make sure of his inclinations by placing him in the midst of us." Lafayette had resisted the entreaties of his army and the boisterous clamours of the multitude. His soldiers were attached to him by no illusion of victories won at their head, but by opinion; and if that opinion were withdrawn from him, he could no longer control them. And yet, in spite of that difficulty, he had succeeded in staying them until the evening; but his voice could be heard only at a short distance, and beyond its compass the popular fury raged without a check. His life had been several times threatened, and still he continued to resist. However, he became aware that bands were continually issuing out of Paris, and as the insurrection was transporting itself to Versailles, his duty was to follow it thither. The commune also ordered him to proceed to Versailles, and he accordingly departed. On the route he halted his army, and administered to it an oath of fidelity to the king: he did not reach Versailles until near midnight. He informed Mounier, as president of the assembly, that the Paris army had vowed to perform its duty, and that nothing should be done contrary to the law. He then hastened to the palace, testified to its inmates every sentiment of respect and concern, communicated to the king the precautions that had been adopted, and gave him assurances of his own and his army's fidelity to his person. The king seemed relieved from his anxieties, and retired to rest. The guard of the palace had been refused to Lafayette; only the outer posts were intrusted to him. The other posts were destined for the Flanders regiment, whose stanchness was not too sure, the Swiss, and the body-guards. These latter had originally received orders to retire, but had been afterwards recalled, and not having been able to effect a general junction, they mustered but sparingly at their post. In the disorder that reigned, all the accessible points were not defended; one of the iron gates even remained open. Lafayette caused the outer posts confided to his care to be occupied, and not one of them was forced, or indeed attacked.

Notwithstanding the prevailing tumult, the assembly had resumed its sitting, and it pursued a discussion on the penal laws in an attitude of tranquil dignity. From time to time the people interrupted the debate with demands for bread. Mirabeau, irritated at such unseemly conduct, exclaimed, in his stentorian voice, that the assembly would receive the law from no one, and would, if provoked, order the galleries to be cleared. The people responded to his appeal with loud applause; but it was useless for the assembly to persist much longer. Lafayette, having sent a message to Mounier that all appeared to him in perfect tranquillity, and that he might safely dismiss the members, the assembly broke up at an early hour in the morning, adjourning until the following day at eleven.

* ["The women who had gone into the palace with the deputation from the assembly, were extremely affected at the sensibility shown by the king on hearing the account of the pretended want of the metropolis. One of them, whose name was Louisa Chabry, a young woman of seventeen years of age, who worked at a carver's, and who was commissioned to represent the grievances of the Parisians to his majesty, could not support the emotion of tenderness or timidity she felt, and fainted. Every thing was done to recover her: as she was going away, she wished to kiss the king's hand; but his majesty, saying kindly to her that she deserved better than that, did her the honour to kiss her lips. They all retired well satisfied, crying in the court, 'God bless the king and his family! To-morrow we shall have bread!'"—Bertrand, vol. ii. p. 85.]

† [M. Bertrand, of course, charges the offence on the national guards, in the following indignant passage: "It is almost necessary to have been an eye witness to these scenes of horror, to be able to believe that that base and unprovoked discharge was made by the national guard of Versailles only. Yes, by those very men on whom, three days before, the body-guards had lavished, and from whom they had received, the most affectionate marks of friendship and good-will.—Vol. ii. p. 91.]

The populace were scattered here and there throughout the town, and appeared sunk in slumber. Lafayette was justified in feeling confidence from the devotedness of his army, which in fact did not belie his expectations, and by the profound calm which seemed to pervade the whole town. He had made the barrack of the body-guards secure, and distributed numerous patrols. He was still on horseback at five in the morning. Convinced that all danger had subsided, he swallowed a draught, and threw himself on a bed, to enjoy a short repose, for he had not been refreshed by sleep for four and twenty hours.*

In this interval, the populace began to rouse themselves, and already groups were wandering in the vicinity of the palace. Some ribaldry was exchanged with a body-guardsman, who discharged his piece from a window: the brigands instantly sprang forward, passed the gate which had been left open, ascended a staircase which they found unguarded, and were at length stopped by two guardsmen, who heroically defended themselves, giving way only foot by foot as they retreated from door to door. One of these generous servants was called Miomandre. "Save the queen!" he shouted. The cry was heard, and the queen sought refuge, in terror, beside the king. Whilst she fled, the brigands rushed forward, found the royal couch abandoned, and attempted to proceed farther; but they were again stopped by the body-guards, intrenched in force upon that point. At this moment, the French guards belonging to Lafayette, and stationed near the palace, hearing the tumult, hastened to the spot, and dispersed the brigands. They presented themselves at the door behind which the body-guards were intrenched, and cried out, "Open: the French guards have not forgotten that at Fontenoi you saved their regiment!" The door was thrown apart, and the soldiers met in mutual embrace.

Without the precincts of the palace, violence and disorder raged uncontrolled. Lafayette, who had scarcely lain down for many minutes, and had not even sunk to sleep, heard the noise, sprang on the first horse he found, and galloped into the midst of the tumult, where he perceived several guardsmen on the point of being murdered. With the quickness of thought he rescued them from their peril, ordered his own soldiers to hasten to the palace, and remained almost alone in the midst of the brigands. One of them levelled his musket at him: Lafayette, without displaying any emotion, commanded the people to bring the man to him. The populace instantly seized the wretch, and dashed out his brains against the pavement, before the eyes of the general. Lafayette, after having thus saved the body-guards, proceeded at a rapid pace with them to the palace, and there met his grenadiers, who had already mustered on the scene of action. They all surrounded him, and volunteered their pledges to die for the king. At this moment, the body-guards, who had been rescued from the very jaws of death, rent the air with cries of "Long live Lafayette!" The whole court of the monarch, seeing itself saved by him and his troops, acknowledged that to him its preservation was owing; the evidences of gratitude were spontaneous and universal. Madame Adelaide, the king's aunt, ran forward, pressed him in her arms, and said to him, "General, you have saved us!"

The populace, at this instant, demanded with loud shouts that the king should proceed to Paris. A consultation was held. Lafayette, when invited to take part in the council, declined, from a feeling that his presence might be a check to free discussion. It was ultimately decided that the court should accede to the unequivocal wishes of the people. Pieces of paper, imparting this information, were thrown from the windows. Louis XVI. then presented himself on the balcony, accompanied by Lafayette, and was hailed with shouts of "Long live the king!" But a different feeling was manifested with regard to the queen; fierce anathemas were coupled with her name. Lafayette accosted her: "Madame," said he, "what are your intentions?" "To accompany the king," answered the queen, with courage. "Come with me, then," returned the general; and he thereupon led her, in amazement, to the balcony. Some menaces again assailed her from the more furious of the mob. The moment was critical: a sudden and fatal act might be perpetrated; it was impossible for words to be heard; through the eyes only could the populace be moved. Therefore, bowing lowly, and taking the hand of the queen, the general respectfully kissed it. That populace, so truly French, was transported at the sight, and confirmed the reconciliation by shouts of "Long live the queen! Long live Lafayette!" Peace remained to be sealed with the body-guards. "Will you do nothing for my guards?" said the king to

* History can never be unduly amplified when justifying even individuals, especially in a revolution where the parts, even the most important, are extremely numerous. M. de Lafayette has been so calumniated, and his character is so unsullied and consistent, that it is but sheer duty to consecrate a note to his vindication. His conduct during the 5th and 6th October was one unbroken act of self-devotion, and yet it has been represented as a criminal dereliction by those who owed their lives to his exertions. In the first place, he has been upbraided with the violence of the national guard, which drew him in spite of himself to Versailles. Nothing can be more unjust; for if a leader, by undaunted firmness, can awe troops at whose head he has often conquered, citizens recently and voluntarily enrolled, and whom a certain enthusiasm of opinion alone binds to their general, are not to be controlled when that very opinion stimulates them to resistance. M. de Lafayette struggled against them an entire day, and certainly more could not be desired. Besides, his ultimate departure was of essential benefit, for without the national guard the palace had been taken by assault, and none can predicate what might have been the fate of the royal family when exposed to the unbridled license of the populace. As has been already stated, the body-guards were forced before the national grenadiers arrived. It is an inevitable deduction, that the presence of Lafayette and his troops at Versailles was indispensable.

After heaping reproaches on him for going there at all, he has been assiduously attacked for going to sleep; and this slumber has been the subject of the most malevolent and unremitting taunts. Lafayette remained up till five o'clock in the morning, having employed the whole night in distributing patrols and establishing order and tranquillity; and sufficient proof exists that his precautions were judiciously taken, in the conclusive fact, that not one of the posts intrusted to his guardianship was assailed. All appeared calm; and he did what no one would have failed to do in his place—he threw himself on a bed to recruit the strength that was exhausted in an incessant contact with a tumultuary mob for twenty-four hours. His repose did not continue above half an hour; he was at the palace upon the first alarm, and early enough to rescue the body-guards from the slaughter that threatened them. What, then, can be justly charged upon him?—that he was not present at the first moment? But that absence might have been equally caused by some other contingency: an order to give, or a post to visit, might have withdrawn him for half an hour from the point where the first attack was made; and his appearance simultaneously with the onslaught could by no possible chance be assured. But did he arrive in sufficient time to deliver almost all the victims—to save the palace and its august inmates? Did he generously encounter the greatest dangers? These things none have the hardihood to deny, and they procured him at the period itself universal benedictions. There was then only one sentiment amongst those he had saved. Madame de Staël, who cannot be suspected of partiality towards M. de Lafayette, relates that she heard the body-guards cry—"Long live Lafayette!" Mounier, whose testimony is likewise above suspicion, from his known tendencies, lauds his zeal; and Lally-Tolendal regrets that a species of dictatorship had not been conferred upon him at that epoch, (see his Address to his Constituents.) These two deputies have inveighed with sufficient vehemence against the 5th and 6th October, to ensure them the character of faithful witnesses on such a point. In a word, not a single individual at the time ventured to deny a zeal and alacrity universally recognised. At a later date, the spirit of party, unwilling to allow virtues in a constitutional, was unscrupulous enough to deny the services of Lafayette; and then that long course of calumny, of which he has never ceased to be the object, had its beginning.

Lafayette. The general took one of them by the hand, conducted him to the balcony, embraced him, and decorated him with his shoulder-belt. The crowd again proclaimed its approval, and ratified by its applauses this fresh reconciliation.

The assembly had conceived it inconsistent with its dignity to attend the monarch, though he had requested its presence. It had contented itself with dispatching to him a deputation of thirty-six members. As soon as it was informed of his intended departure, it passed a decree importing that the assembly was inseparable from the person of the monarch, and nominated one hundred deputies to accompany him to Paris. The king received the decree, and entered his carriage.

The main body of the multitude had already departed. Lafayette had sent after it a detachment of the army to prevent it returning. He had given orders to disarm the brigands who bore on the ends of their pikes the heads of two guardsmen. Those horrible trophies were wrested from them, and it is false that they were carried before the king's carriage.

Louis XVI. arrived, encompassed by a considerable concourse of people, and was received by Bailly at the town-hall. "I return with confidence amongst my people of Paris," said the king. Bailly repeated these words to those who were unable to hear them, but he forgot the phrase "with confidence." "Add with confidence," said the queen. "The words come more auspiciously from you, than if I had pronounced them," replied Bailly.

The royal family repaired to the palace of the Tuileries, which for a whole century had been uninhabited, and in which the necessary accommodations for the reception of the royal family were wholly incomplete. The guard of the palace was intrusted to the Parisian militia, and upon Lafayette was imposed the responsibility towards the nation of the king's personal safety, an object of dispute to all parties. The nobles would have conducted him to a strong fortress, in order to exercise despotism in his name; the popular party, to which the idea of dispensing with the royal station had not yet suggested itself, desired to keep him, in order to complete the constitution, and to take from civil war an important chief. Thus the malevolence of the privileged classes upbraided Lafayette with being a jailor, whereas his vigilance could bear only one interpretation, that he was sincerely anxious to maintain a king.

From this period, the course of parties took a new direction. The aristocracy, being repelled from the monarch, and unable to hatch schemes at his side, betook itself to the provinces and to foreigners. The emigration began thenceforth to be considerable. A great number of nobles fled to Turin, where the Count d'Artois had taken up his abode with his father-in-law. From that point, their policy consisted in exciting the departments of the south, and asserting that the king was not free. The queen, from her descent, and likewise from antipathy to the new court formed at Turin, turned her hopes towards Austria. The king, in the midst of these intrigues, beheld all that was going on, offered no interference, and awaited his deliverance from any quarter that might attempt it. At intervals, he made such disavowals as the assembly required, and in truth was not free, any more than he would have been at Turin or at Coblentz, any more than he had been under Maurepas, for it is the fate of weakness to be in all cases dependent.

The popular party, now in the ascendant, was itself divided: the Duke of Orleans, Lafayette, Mirabeau, Barnave, and the Lameths, represented different sections. The public voice accused the Duke of Orleans and Mirabeau of being the authors of the last insurrection. Witnesses, not altogether unworthy of credit, maintained that they had seen the duke and Mirabeau upon the deplorable battle-field of the 6th October. The facts alleged were subsequently disproved, but at the moment they were generally believed. The boldest of the calumniators asserted that the design of the conspirators was to carry off the king, and even to procure his death. The Duke of Orleans, they added, had indulged in hopes of his elevation to the lieutenancy of the kingdom, and Mirabeau of his to the ministry. As none of these projects had succeeded, and as Lafayette seemed to have counteracted them by his presence, he passed as the preserver of the king and the conqueror of Orleans and Mirabeau. The court, not having yet had time to become ungrateful, proclaimed Lafayette as its deliverer, and the power of that general appeared at the moment almost boundless. The enthusiastic patriots began to take alarm, and already the name of Cromwell was muttered in public places. Mirabeau, who, as we shall shortly see, had nothing in common with the Duke of Orleans, was envious of Lafayette, and called him Cromwell-Grandison. The aristocracy abetted him in his suspicions, and stimulated the odium by calumnies of its own fabrication. But Lafayette was determined, in opposition to all obstacles, to support the king and the constitution. With this view, he at once formed the resolution to remove the Duke of Orleans, whose presence gave rise to so many rumours, and might furnish, if not the means, at least the pretext, for disturbances. He sought an interview with the prince, intimidated him by his firmness, and wrung from him a pledge to withdraw himself. The king took part in this measure, but feigned, with his accustomed weakness, to be constrained to its adoption; and in a letter to the Duke of Orleans, he told him it was necessary that either he or Lafayette should retire; that in the state of public opinion the selection could not be doubtful, and that in consequence he gave him a mission to England. It has since become known that M. de Montmorin, the minister for foreign affairs, in his anxiety to get rid of the Duke of Orleans and his ambitious views, had urged him to repair to the Low Countries, then insurgent against the house of Austria, and given him grounds for anticipating the title of Duke of Brabant.* His friends, on learning the resolution of the duke, were indignant at his weakness. More ambitious than himself, they were averse to his yielding; they waited on Mirabeau, and pressed him to denounce in the tribune the violence used by Lafayette towards the prince. Mirabeau, sufficiently jealous of the general's popularity, communicated to the duke and to Lafayette that he would denounce them both in the tribune, if the departure to England were persisted in. The duke was staggered; a new appeal from Lafayette quickened his decision; and Mirabeau received in the assembly a note announcing the prince's retreat, whereupon he exclaimed with wrath—"He is unworthy the trouble people take on his account!"† This exclamation, and several others equally thoughtless, have often given rise to accusations that he was an agent of the Duke of Orleans; but it is certain he never was. His penury, the imprudence of his remarks, his familiarity with

* See the Memoirs of Dumouriez.

† I have previously explained how slender were the relations between Mirabeau and the Duke of Orleans. I will now give the true meaning of that celebrated phrase—"This —— is unworthy the trouble that people take on his account." The constraint imposed by Lafayette upon the Duke of Orleans was distasteful to the popular party in general, but especially annoying to the friends of the exiled prince. These thought of unchaining Mirabeau against Lafayette, by piquing the jealousy of the orator against the general. A friend of Orleans, Lauzun, visited Mirabeau one evening, and besought him to speak on the matter the next day. Mirabeau, who often gave way to entreaties, was about to yield, when his friends, more solicitous as to his conduct than himself, pressed him to refrain. He had accordingly resolved to preserve silence. The next day, as the sitting was opened, the departure of the duke was announced; and Mirabeau, who felt irritated at his submission to Lafayette, and reflected on the useless exertions of his friends, gave vent to the exclamation in question.

that prince, which was only such as he evinced towards all he came in contact with, his proposition regarding the Spanish succession, and, finally, his opposition to the duke's withdrawal, were unquestionably strong stimulants to such suspicions; but in despite thereof, it is not the less true that Mirabeau belonged to no party, and was indeed actuated by but one object, which was to uproot the aristocracy and destroy arbitrary power.

The propagators of these allegations against Mirabeau, must have known that he was at that time so straitened as to solicit loans of the most trifling sums, to which extremity he could not possibly have been reduced had he been the agent of a prince of such immense possessions—of one whom his partisans, as was said, had almost ruined. Mirabeau had always foreseen the impending dissolution of the state. A conversation with an intimate friend, held in the park of Versailles, and extending throughout the night, brought him to determine upon an entirely new plan, and he was convinced that for his own renown, the safety of the state, and even for his own fortune (for Mirabeau was a man to promote all these interests at once), his part was to remain in a firm position between the disorganisers and the throne, and to consolidate the monarchy whilst carving for himself a place under it. The court had attempted to gain him, but its emissaries had made their advances awkwardly, and without the delicacy suitable to a man of haughty temperament, who desired to preserve his popularity in default of a confidence not yet accorded him. Malouet, the friend of Necker, and connected with Mirabeau, was anxious to bring them into communication. Mirabeau had frequently declined the overture,* from a persuasion that he never could agree with the minister. At length, he consented. Malouet introduced him, and the incompatibility of the two characters was more fully demonstrated after the interview, in the course of which, by the admission of all who were present, Mirabeau displayed that superiority which he possessed in private life as well as in the tribune. It was rumoured that his design had been to sell himself, and that, Necker having made him no proposal, he had said on leaving, "The minister shall hear of me." This was the interpretation of party spirit, and decidedly erroneous. Malouet had proposed to Mirabeau, who was known to be satisfied with the freedom that had been gained, to come to an understanding with the minister, and nothing more. Besides, at this very period, a direct negotiation was pending with the court. A foreign prince, connected with men of all parties, made the first advances. A friend, who officiated in an intermediate capacity, inculcated upon the court that no sacrifice of his principles would be obtained from Mirabeau, but that, if an adherence to the constitution was unequivocally manifested, he might be relied upon as an unshaken ally; that with regard to conditions, they were dictated by his situation; that it was essential, for the advantage of those who would employ him, to render that situation honourable and independent—that is to say, to discharge his debts; and that, in a word, it was of the greatest moment to attach him to the new social order, and without actually bestowing on him the ministry, to lead him to expect it at a future time.† These negotiations were not entirely terminated until two or three months afterwards—not till the beginning of 1790. Historians, from not being perfectly acquainted with these details, and deceived by the persevering energy of Mirabeau in combating the executive, have assigned a later date to this treaty. But it was almost fully concluded at the commencement of 1790. The fact will be demonstrated in the proper place.

Barnave and the Lameths could only compete with Mirabeau by a show of more austere patriotism. Apprised of the negotiations on foot, they supported the rumour already prevalent, that the ministry was about to be conferred upon him, in order thereby to take from him the power of accepting it. An opportunity of effectually debarring him from office soon presented itself. The ministers had not the right of speaking in the assembly. Mirabeau was naturally averse to divest himself, by acceding to the ministry, of a faculty which was his grand means of influence, and he was furthermore desirous of drawing Necker to the tribune, in order to have him more at his mercy. He consequently moved that participation in debate should be granted to the ministers. The popular party took alarm, and opposed the motion without any plausible reason, other than a seeming apprehension of ministerial seductions. But such fears were quite chimerical, for it is not in their public communications with the chambers that ministers can corrupt the national representation. However, Mirabeau's motion was rejected, and Lanjuinais, pushing the rigorous principle yet farther, moved that the present members of the assembly be interdicted from accepting office. A violent debate ensued. Although the motive of this proposition was well understood, it was not avowed, and Mirabeau, to whom dissimulation was impossible, at length cried out, that it was needless to pass a measure disastrous to the state, on account of one single individual, and that he supported the decree, on condition that the ministry should be forbidden, not to all the present deputies, but simply to M. de Mirabeau, deputy for the seneschalsea of Aix. Such singular frankness and audacity produced no effect, and the decree was unanimously adopted.

Thus we have shown how the state was distracted with the emigrants, the queen, the king, and the different popular chiefs, such as Lafayette, Mirabeau, Barnave, and Lameth. No decisive event, like that of the 14th July or of the 5th October, was possible for some time to come. Fresh vexations were needed to exasperate the court and the people, and to provoke a portentous rupture.

The assembly had transferred itself to Paris,* after having received repeated assurances on the part of the commune as to the tranquillity of the capital, and the promise of an entire freedom of debate. Mounier and Lally-Tolendal, indignant at the events of the 5th and 6th October, had sent in their resignation as members, saying, that they would be neither spectators nor accomplices of factious crimes. They must have deeply regretted this desertion of public duty, especially when they saw Maury and Cazalès, who had

* Malouet and Bertrand de Molleville have not scrupled to assert the contrary, but the fact we advance is attested by witnesses worthy of implicit belief.

† In Mirabeau, as in all superior men, there were many weaknesses in conjunction with great elevation of mind. He possessed an ardent imagination, which required to be fed with lofty hopes. It was impossible to give him the ministry without destroying his influence, and consequently without annihilating himself and all the aid that could be derived from him. On the other hand, this allurement was indispensable to his imagination. Those, therefore, who had placed themselves between him and the court, advised that at least the hope of a portfolio should be held out to him. However, the personal interests of Mirabeau were never made the objects of particular stipulation in the various conferences that were held; nothing was mentioned, in fact, concerning either money or offices, and great difficulty was felt in making Mirabeau understand what was intended he should at least surmise. To obviate this difficulty, an adroit expedient was suggested to the king. Mirabeau enjoyed so indifferent a reputation, that few persons would have consented to serve as his colleagues. The king, therefore, applied to M. de Liancourt, for whom he entertained a high esteem, and asked him whether, for the advancement of his service, he would accept a portfolio in company with Mirabeau. M. de Liancourt, devoted to the monarch, replied that he was prepared to do all that the good of his service might require. This interrogation being reported to Mirabeau, filled him with satisfaction, and he no longer had any doubt that, as soon as circumstances permitted, he would be nominated to the ministry.

* Its first sitting in Paris was held at the archiepiscopal palace on the 19th October.

absented themselves from the assembly, soon after return to it and courageously advocate, even to the end, the cause they had espoused. Mounier, having retired into Dauphiny, assembled the states of that province, but a decree shortly caused them to dissolve without any show of resistance. Thus Mounier and Lally, who, at the era of the junction of the orders and of the tennis-court oath, were the heroes of the people, had now become of no consequence in their eyes. The parliaments had been the first to sink in the rear when the popular energy was aroused; after them Mounier, Lally, and Necker; and many others were speedily to share the same fate.

The scarcity, the exaggerated and still real cause of the agitation, gave rise to a fresh crime. On the 20th October, the baker François was massacred by some brigands. Lafayette succeeded in apprehending the criminals, and delivered them to the Châtelet, a tribunal invested with an extraordinary jurisdiction over all offences relative to the revolution. Besenval, and all those accused of having taken part in the aristocratic conspiracy, counteracted on the 14th July, had been remitted there for trial. It was found necessary to use new forms of process at the Châtelet. Until the intervention of the jury, which institution was not yet established, the assembly had ordered publicity, examinations in defence, and all other guarantees of innocence, to be observed. The assassins of François were condemned, and tranquillity re-established. Lafayette and Bailly proposed, on this occasion, that martial law should be proclaimed. The motion was vehemently opposed by Robespierre, who from this time forward manifested a warm sympathy for the people and the poor; but it was, nevertheless, passed by the majority [Decree of the 21st October]. By virtue of this enactment, the municipalities were made responsible for the public tranquillity; when troubles broke out, they were empowered to call in the troops or the militia-guards; and after three summonses to disperse, they were justified in ordering the employment of force against seditious meetings. A committee of inquiry was established in the commune of Paris, and also in the National Assembly, for the purpose of more vigilantly watching the numerous enemies, whose intrigues were outspread into such countless ramifications. Nor were all these means too many to counteract the projects of the various foes leagued against the new revolution.

The constituent labours went forward with activity. Feudalism had been abolished, but there still remained a final measure to adopt for the destruction of those great bodies, which had been enemies within the state against the state. The church held immense possessions. It had received them from princes as feudal grants, or from the pious as bequests. If the property of individuals, the fruit and object of labour, ought to be respected, that which had been given to corporations for a specific object, might receive from the law another destination. It was for the good of religion that these possessions had been given, or at least under that pretext; now, religion being a public service, the law was entitled to regulate the mode of providing for it in any other manner. The Abbé Maury displayed upon this subject his inexhaustible fluency; he sounded the tocsin of alarm for proprietors, threatened them with imminent spoliation, and asserted that the provinces were to be sacrificed to the stock-jobbers of the capital. The sophistry of his argument is sufficiently extraordinary to merit notice. It was to pay the national debt that the possessions of the clergy were to be sold; the holders of that debt were the great capitalists of Paris; the possessions apportioned to them were in the provinces: thence, the intrepid logician deduced that the provinces were sacrificed to the capital; as if the provinces were not gainers, on the contrary, by a new division of those vast estates, hitherto exclusively appropriated to the luxurious enjoyment of certain lazy ecclesiastics. All his efforts were of no avail. The Bishop of Autun, the author of the project, and the deputy Thouret, speedily annihilated such idle sophisms. The decree was about to pass that the possessions of the clergy belonged to the state, when its opponents once more raised the question of property. In reply it was maintained, that, even granting the clergy to be proprietors, their possessions might be otherwise applied, since those possessions had frequently been used in cases of emergency for the good of the state. This fact they did not attempt to deny. Availing himself of the admission, Mirabeau moved an amendment, that the word "belong" should be altered into "are at the disposition of the state." The debate was immediately closed, and the decree passed by a great majority [Law of the 2d November]. The assembly thus destroyed the formidable power of the clergy, suppressed the obnoxious luxury of the dignitaries of the order, and took into its own keeping those immense financial resources, which so long served to prop the revolution. At the same time it secured the subsistence of the parish priests, by enacting that their stipends should never be less than 1200 francs (£50 sterling), in addition to the enjoyment of a parsonage and garden. It declared that religious vows were no longer to be recognised, and restored liberty to all monastic personages, giving leave, however, to those who wished it, to continue the cloistered life; and as their possessions were appropriated, it assigned payments in lieu thereof. With an advisable discrimination, it observed a distinction between the wealthy and the mendicant orders, and proportioned the allowance to their respective members according to their pristine statutes. It adopted the same course with regard to pensions; and when the Jansenist, Camus, reverting to the bright example of evangelical simplicity, proposed to reduce all pensions to an identical and extremely meagre standard, the assembly, upon the motion of Mirabeau, reduced them in proportion to their actual amounts, and with a due regard to the former station of the pensioners. Considerate deference for usage and accustomed habits could not be more signally displayed, and in that consists the true respect for property. In the same manner, when the Protestants, exiled after the revocation of the edict of Nantes, reclaimed their estates, the assembly restored to them those only which had not been sold.

Cautious and full of consideration in its treatment of persons, it handled things with unscrupulous daring, and manifested a very different spirit in constitutive matters. The prerogatives of the different branches of power had been fixed; and now arose the question as to the division of the kingdom. It had always been divided into provinces, which had been successively united to the original France. These provinces, differing from each other in laws, privileges, and manners, formed a most heterogeneous compound. Sieyes conceived the idea of amalgamating them by a new subdivision, which should annihilate the ancient demarcations, and link all the parts of the kingdom under one system of laws and public feeling. This result was accomplished by the partition into departments. The departments, again, were divided into districts, and the districts into municipalities. In all these territorial gradations, the principle of representation in government was established. The administration of the department, the district, and the borough, was each intrusted to a deliberative and to an executive council, both equally elective. These separate authorities were in dependence upon each other, and had analogous functions, proportioned to the extent of their jurisdictions. The department settled the contribution to the taxes for the districts, the district for the boroughs, and the borough for individuals.*

* [" The provinces, which had viewed with regret the loss of their privileges, formed petty states, with too great an extent of

The assembly afterwards fixed the qualification of a citizen enjoying political rights. It settled the age at twenty-five, and the contribution at a marc of silver. Each individual combining these advantages had the title of active citizen, and those who had them not were named passive citizens. These denominations were turned into ridicule, for names are eagerly snatched at when a desire exists to depreciate things; but they were simple, natural, and admirably expressive. The active citizen took part in the elections for the formation of the administrations and of the assembly. The election of deputies had two processes. No condition of eligibility was required; for, as it had been inculcated in the assembly, a man was an elector by his existence in the society, and the only test of eligibility was naturally the confidence of the electors.

These labours, although interrupted by numerous occasional discussions, were prosecuted with exemplary zeal. The right side contributed only to impede them by studied obstinacy, whenever an opportunity occurred of contesting any portion of influence proposed for the nation. The popular deputies, on the contrary, though forming different parties, joined or separated without repugnance, according to their individual sentiments. It was clear that with them conviction overruled compact. Thouret, Mirabeau, Duport, Sieyes, Camus, Chapelier, were seen alternately uniting and dividing, as their opinions tended on each question. As to the members of the nobility and clergy, they rarely appeared except on party debates. When the parliaments had passed resolutions against the assembly, when deputies or writers had insulted it, they exhibited great alacrity in upholding them. They supported the military commanders in opposition to the people, the slave-dealers against the Negroes, and declared against the admission of Jews and Protestants to the enjoyment of civil rights. Finally, when Genoa arose against France, on account of the enfranchisement of Corsica and the union of that island to the kingdom, they were for Genoa in opposition to France. In a word, alien and indifferent to all useful discussions, heeding not, but talking amongst themselves, they were never roused but when rights or liberty might be crippled.*

It has been already stated, that an important conspiracy could no longer be hatched in the cabinet of the king, since the aristocracy was scattered in flight, and the court encompassed by the assembly, the people, and the national guard. Partial movements were therefore all that the malecontents could attempt. They fomented the dissatisfaction of the officers who were enamoured of the ancient order of things, whilst the soldiers, having every thing to gain, were eager for the new. Violent recriminations took place between the army and the populace; the soldiers often delivered their officers to the multitude, who massacred them; and at other times, distrust was happily subdued and tranquillity restored, when the commanders of towns knew how to employ a little address, and took the oath of fidelity to the new constitution. The clergy had inundated Brittany with protests against the alienation of their possessions. They strove to stimulate a remnant of religious fanaticism in the provinces, where blind superstition was still predominant. The parliaments likewise were used, and they essayed a last trial of their authority. Their sessions had been prorogued by the assembly, because, whilst in-territory, and too independent an administration. It was expedient to lessen their dimensions, change their names, and subject them to an identical government. On the 22d December, the assembly adopted the project on this head conceived by Sieyes, and presented by Thouret in the name of a committee, which had been unceasingly occupied on the subject for two months.

France was divided into eighty-three departments, nearly equal in extent and population; each department was subdivided into districts, and each district into cantons. Their administration was regulated after an uniform and graduated system. Each department had an administrative council composed of thirty-six members, and an executive directory composed of five; as the titles indicate, the functions of the first were to decide and those of the last to act. Each district was organised in the same manner, but upon a smaller basis; it had a council and a directory, which were less in number, and subordinate to the departmental council and directory. Each canton, comprising five or six parishes, was an electoral and not an administrative division; the active citizens (and to become one a contribution equivalent to three days' labour was requisite) assembled in the canton to nominate their deputies and magistrates. Every thing was subjected to the elective principle in this new plan, but upon a certain scale. It was judged imprudent to intrust the multitude with the choice of delegates, and unlawful to deprive it of all concurrence therein, so the difficulty was obviated by a system of double election. The active citizens of the canton chose electors empowered to nominate the members of the National Assembly, the administrators of the department, those of the district, and the judges of the tribunals. A criminal court was established for the whole department, a civil court for each district, and a local peace-court for each canton.

Such were the institutions of the department: the borough organisation also required to be settled. The civic administration was intrusted to a council-general and a municipal body, composed of a varying number of members according to the population of the respective towns. The municipal officers were named immediately by the people, and they alone were qualified to call into action the armed force. The commune or borough formed the first step in the grand association, the kingdom the final one; and the department served as an intermediate stage between the commune and the state, or, in other words, between purely local and general interests."—Mignet, vol. i. p. 117-118.]

* It is interesting to ascertain the opinion of Ferrières upon the manner in which the deputies of his own party conducted themselves in the assembly. He says:—

"In the National Assembly there were nearly three hundred members, truly upright men, free from party spirit, enrolled in neither club, solicitous of good, desiring it for itself independently of the interests of orders or bodies, and always ready to embrace the most equitable and useful proposition, indifferent from whom it emanated or by whom supported. These were men worthy of the honourable functions to which they had been called; to them were owing the few good laws proceeding from the Constituent Assembly, and the prevention of all the evil that was not perpetrated. Always adopting that which was beneficial, and repudiating that which was mischievous, they often turned the scale in favour of propositions which, without them, would have been rejected by factious spirit, and they often negatived motions which, without them, would have been passed from motives of interest.

When on this subject, I cannot avoid remarking on the impolitic conduct of the nobles and bishops. As they desired merely to provoke the dissolution of the assembly, and to throw discredit on its measures, far from opposing improper decrees they manifested an indifference concerning them quite inconceivable. They left the hall when the president put the question, inviting the deputies of their party to follow them; or, if they remained, they shouted to them not to vote. The clubbists, by this secession, became the majority of the assembly, and decreed whatever they pleased. The bishops and nobles, firmly believing that the new order of things would not be permanent, hastened, with a species of impatience, the downfall of the monarchy and their own ruin, in the insane hope of accelerating the desired overthrow. To this inconsiderate conduct they added a scornful indifference, both for the assembly and the people present at its sittings. They paid no attention to the proceedings, but laughed and talked loud, thus confirming the people in the unfavourable opinion they had conceived of them; and, instead of labouring to regain their confidence and esteem, they apparently laboured merely to secure their detestation and contempt. All these absurdities were owing to the nobles and bishops being unable to persuade themselves that the revolution had been long engendered in the opinions and the hearts of all Frenchmen. They flattered themselves that, by means of such defences, they could stem the torrent that was swelling with every sun. They did but accumulate its waters, and extend its ravages, by clinging with reckless tenacity to the antiquated system, the fundamental object of all their actions and all their opposition, but which no one would endure. By this stupid obstinacy they forced the revolutionists to extend their revolutionary views beyond the goal at which they had proposed to stop. Then the nobles and the bishops exclaimed against injustice and tyranny. They spoke of the antiquity and legitimacy of their rights to men who had sapped the foundation of all rights."—Ferrières, vol. ii. p. 122.

tending to dissolve them, it was unwilling to have discussions with them in the interim. The chambers of vacation administered justice during their recess. At Rouen, Nantes, and Rennes, these chambers passed resolutions, in which they deplored the ruin of the old monarchy, the violation of its laws, and, without naming the assembly, significantly alluded to it as the cause of all existing calamities. They were called to the bar, and reprimanded. That of Rennes, as most culpable, was declared incapable of performing its functions. That of Metz had insinuated that the king was not free, an allegation in conformity with the general policy of the malcontents, as has been previously observed. Unable to use the king for their own purposes, they sought to represent him as labouring under an oppressive thraldom, desiring by such means to nullify all the laws he apparently sanctioned. The king himself seemed to countenance this course of policy. He refrained from recalling his body-guards displaced on [illegible] October and had himself guarded by [illegible] national [illegible], in the midst of which he knew him[illegible]. His intention was to appear as if he [illegible]ity. The commune of Paris unmasked [illegible] device by a formal petition to recall his guards, which he declined under frivolous pretexts, by the mouth of the queen.*

The year 1790, which had just commenced, was ushered in with a general agitation. Three months of comparative tranquillity had elapsed since the 5th and 6th October, but disquiet was again returning. Periods of great agitation are followed by an interval of repose, and then begin again trifling demonstrations, which grow into mighty conflicts. The troubles which now disturbed the kingdom were charged upon the clergy, the nobility, the court, and even England, which instructed its ambassador to justify it from the accusation. The paid companies of the national guard were themselves affected by the prevailing spirit of disorder. Some soldiers collected in the Champs-Elysées, demanded an augmentation of their pay. Lafayette, ever on the alert, hastened to the mutineers, dispersed and punished them, and restored order amongst his troops, still faithful in spite of any slight interruptions of discipline.

Public attention was especially occupied with an alleged plot against the assembly and the municipality, the supposed leader of which was the Marquis de Favras. He was publicly apprehended, and lodged in the Chatelet. It was immediately rumoured abroad that Bailly and Lafayette were to have been assassinated; that 1200 horsemen were in readiness at Versailles to carry off the king; and that an army of Swiss and Piedmontese was organised to receive him and march on Paris. Terror pervaded the metropolis, it being universally reported that Favras was a secret emissary of certain elevated personages. Suspicion fell upon Monsieur, the king's eldest brother. Favras had been in his guards, and had furthermore negotiated a loan for his behoof. Monsieur, alarmed at the general agitation, appeared at the town-hall, repelled the insinuations directed against him, explained his relations with Favras, reminded his hearers of his popular tendencies, as formerly manifested in the assembly of notables, and claimed to be judged, not by idle rumours, but by his known and unbelied patriotism.* Loud and general cheers followed his speech, and he was escorted to his residence by the assembled crowd.

The trial of Favras was commenced. This person had travelled over all Europe, married a foreign princess, and been engaged in devising schemes for the purpose of re-establishing his fortune. He had been busied with machinations on the 14th July, the 5th and 6th October, and in the last months of 1789. The witnesses who appeared against him gave the details of his last plan. The assassination of Bailly and Lafayette, and the removal of the king, appeared to form part of this plan; but no proof was led that the 1200 horsemen were in readiness, nor that the Swiss and Piedmontese army was in motion. Circumstances were unpropitious for Favras. The Châtelet had just acquitted Besenval and other individuals implicated in the plot of the 14th July, whereat public opinion was sullen and discontented. Nevertheless, Lafayette encouraged the judges of the Châtelet, impressed upon them the duty of being just, and undertook that their judgment, whatever it might be, should be executed.

This trial caused fresh suspicions to be entertained of the court. These new projects made it seem incorrigible; for, in the very middle of Paris, it was seen still conspiring. The king, in consequence, was advised to adopt a striking expedient to remove the public impression.

On the 4th February 1790, the assembly was surprised to see some alterations in the arrangement of the hall. A carpet, embroidered with fleurs-de-lis, covered the steps of the platform. The seat of the secretaries was removed, and the president standing by the side of the chair in which he usually sat. "The king!" suddenly shouted the ushers, and Louis XVI. immediately entered the hall. The assembly arose on his appearance, and greeted him with loud applause. A crowd of spectators in eager haste filled the galleries, pressed into all parts of the hall, and awaited in breathless anticipation the royal words. Louis XVI. delivered his speech standing, whilst the assembly was seated. He first cast a glance at the troubles to which France was a prey, the exertions that he had made to subdue them and to facilitate the subsistence of the people; he recapitulated the labours of the representatives, declaring that he had attempted the same measures in the provincial assemblies; he maintained, in short, that he had always manifested the wishes

* This subject, of the body-guards being recalled, gave occasion to an anecdote which deserves to be recorded. The queen was complaining to M. de Lafayette that the king was not free, alleging as a proof of the fact that the duty at the palace was performed by the national guard, and not by the king's body-guards. Lafayette thereupon asked her if the reinstatement of the latter would afford her pleasure. The queen at first hesitated to reply, but could not with any grace refuse the offer made her by the general to procure the recall in question. He immediately repaired to the municipality, which, at his instigation, made an official request to the king for the recall of his body-guards, offering to share with them the service at the palace. The king and queen perceived nothing hurtful in this demand; but they were soon made sensible of its consequences; and those whose policy it was that they should not seem free, persuaded them to refuse it. However, it was a somewhat difficult task to assign reasons for this refusal, and the queen, to whom delicate commissions were often intrusted, was appointed to inform M. de Lafayette that the proposition of the municipality would not be accepted. The motive she alleged for this determination was, that they were unwilling to expose the guards to massacre. But Lafayette had a few moments before met one of those very guards promenading at the Palais-Royal in full uniform. He communicated this striking fact to the queen, who was thrown into considerable embarrassment, but nevertheless persisted in the resolution she was instructed to convey.

* The speech of Monsieur at the town-hall contains a passage too important to be omitted:—

"As to my personal opinions," said that august personage, "I will speak of them with confidence to my fellow-citizens. From the day on which I declared my sentiments, in the second assembly of the notables, upon the fundamental question which divided all minds, I have never ceased to believe that a great revolution was inevitable; that the king, from his intentions, his virtues, and his supreme rank, was its natural chief, since it could not be beneficial to the nation without being equally so to the monarch; in fact, that the royal authority must always be the safeguard of the national liberty, and national liberty the basis of royal authority. Let any one of my actions, or even of my phrases, be cited, which belies these principles, or which shows that, in whatever circumstances I may have been placed, the happiness of the king, and that of the nation, have ever ceased to be the sole objects of my solicitude; until then, I have a right to be believed on my word, that I have never changed my sentiments and principles, and that I never will change them."

that had been recently realised. He added, that he had thought himself specially called upon to coalesce in the most signal manner with the representatives of the nation, at a moment when decrees were submitted to him intended to establish an entirely new organisation in the kingdom. It was his determination, he said, to promote with all his power the success of that vast organisation; every contrary attempt would be criminal, and crushed by all means at his disposal. At these words, loud cheers resounded from all sides. The king proceeded; recalling to mind his own sacrifices, he urged all those who had suffered any loss to imitate his resignation, and solace themselves with the prospect of the benefits assured to France by the new constitution. And when, after having promised to defend that constitution, he added that he would do still more, and that, in concert with the queen, he would early train the heart and mind of his son to the new order of things, and accustom him to rest his happiness on that of all Frenchmen, cries of affection broke from all quarters of the hall, all hands were stretched towards the monarch, all eyes sought the mother and the son, all voices demanded them—the transports of the audience were tumultuous and unbounded. The king concluded his speech by recommending concord and peace to "that good people of whose love he is always reminded when consolation is proffered him for his anxieties."* At these last words, all present evinced the most lively sentiments of esteem and gratitude. The president made a short reply, in

* The speech delivered by the king upon this occasion is too remarkable not to be quoted, with a few observations. That excellent and too unfortunate prince was for ever in a state of vacillation; but at certain moments he discerned with great judgment his own duties and the errors of the court. The tone which pervades his discourse of the 4th February sufficiently proves that the words were not dictated, but that he expressed himself with a deep feeling of his actual position.

"Gentlemen—Impelled by a sense of the serious situation of France at this moment, I am come amongst you. The gradual relaxation of all the bonds of order and subordination; the suspension or inertness of the cour arising from private losses; the oppositions and unfortunate animosities, which are the unavoidable consequences of long dissensions; the critical situation of the finances, and the doubts respecting the national resources; the general agitation—all conspire to keep alive the anxiety of all real friends to the prosperity and happiness of the kingdom.

A grand object lies before you; but it must be attained without farther disturbances or new convulsions. I may be allowed to say, that it was my firm hope to have led you to that great end in a milder and more tranquil manner, when I formed the design of assembling you, and of collecting together for the public good the talents and opinions of the representatives of the nation; but my happiness and glory are not the less closely united with the success of your labours.

I have protected them, with unremitting vigilance, against the fatal influence which the unhappy circumstances of the times might have over them. The horrors of famine, which spread consternation over our country last year, have been mitigated by constant care and immense supplies. The disorder that might have naturally ensued from the former state of the finances, the absence of credit, the excessive scarcity of bullion, and the gradual decay of the revenue, has been, at least in all its nakedness and hideousness, as yet averted I have every where, and especially in the capital, guarded against the dangerous consequences of the want of work, and notwithstanding the relaxed state of all the springs of authority, I have maintained the kingdom, not indeed in the tranquillity I could have wished, but in a condition of repose sufficient to receive lasting benefits from a wise and well-ordered liberty; and, furthermore, notwithstanding our domestic situation, too generally known, and the political storms that agitate other nations, I have not only preserved peace abroad, but maintained, with all the powers of Europe, those bonds of respect and friendship, which are the best guarantees of its stability.

Having thus secured you from obstacles which might so easily have obstructed your cares and your labours, I think the moment is arrived when the interest of the state requires that I should join in a manner yet more decisive and manifest in the execution and issue of all that you have planned for the good of France. I cannot seize a more suitable occasion than when you present for my acceptance decrees designed to establish a new system of organisation in the kingdom, which must have so important and propitious an influence on the welfare of my subjects, and the prosperity of this great empire.

You are aware, gentlemen, that more than ten years ago, and at a time when the wishes of the nation were not made known respecting the provincial assemblies, I had begun to substitute this kind of administration for that which immemorial usage had consecrated. Experience having convinced me that I was not mistaken in the opinion I had formed of the utility of such establishments, I sought to extend the benefit of them through all the provinces of my kingdom; and in order to ensure general confidence in the new modes of administration, I intended that the members of whom they were to be composed should be freely nominated by all the citizens. You have improved upon these views in several particulars, and the most essential is unquestionably that equal and well-designed subdivision, which by weakening the effect of the ancient separations between province and province, and establishing a general and complete system of equipoise, more perfectly unites all the parts of the kingdom in an uniform spirit and interest. This grand idea, this salutary contrivance, is entirely due to you; but unanimity in the representatives of the nation, and their just ascendancy over public opinion, are not the less necessary in order to undertake with confidence an alteration of such vital importance, and to overcome, by the power of reason, the resistance of habit and particular interests."

All that the king says here is perfectly just and well-considered. It is true that he had attempted all these ameliorations of his own motion, and that he had given a rare example amongst princes—that of anticipating the wants of subjects. The eulogy he pronounces on the new territorial division also bears the character of entire good faith, for it was certainly advantageous to the government, inasmuch as it destroyed the obstacles which local interests had often opposed to it. Every thing, therefore, induces us to believe that the king speaks on these subjects with perfect sincerity. He continues:

"I will promote and accelerate, by all the means in my power, the success of this vast organisation, on which depends the safety of France; and I think it necessary to declare, I am too much occupied with the internal situation of the kingdom, I have my eyes too open to the dangers of every kind that surround us, not to be fully impressed with the conviction that, in the present disposition of the public mind, and on an attentive consideration of the state of public affairs, it is indispensable that a new order of things be established, calmly and deliberately, or the kingdom will be exposed to all the calamities of anarchy.

Let true patriots reflect upon this matter as I have done, directing their minds solely to the good of the state, and they will perceive that, notwithstanding the different opinions that may prevail, they are urged by a high and commanding interest to cordially unite at this moment. Time will correct what may be found defective in the collection of laws framed by this assembly" (this indirect and delicate censure proves that the king was not disposed to flatter, but, on the contrary, to speak his real sentiments, observing the necessary circumspection); "but every enterprise tending to shake the principles of the constitution itself, every design formed to overthrow them or to weaken their happy influence, could only serve to introduce amongst us the frightful evils of discord; and even supposing the success of such an attempt against my people and me, the result would deprive us, without equivalent, of the many advantages held out to us in perspective by the new order of things.

Let us, then, with all sincerity, freely give in to the hopes we are justified in conceiving, and think only of realising them by unanimity and concord. Let it be every where known that the monarch and the representatives of the nation are united in interest and in purpose, so that the conviction, the firm assurance, may disseminate in the provinces a spirit of peace and good will; and so that all citizens distinguished for reputation, all those who are able to do the state essential service by their zeal and abilities, may evince due alacrity in affording their assistance in the different subdivisions of the general administration, the various links and the entirety of which ought to act concurrently and energetically in the restoration of order and prosperity to the kingdom.

We must not conceal from ourselves that much is required before that object can be fully attained. An unflinching determination, a general and common effort, are absolutely necessary to obtain complete success. Continue, then, your labours, without other passions than ardour for good; keep your attention invariably fixed upon the condition of the people and upon public liberty; but exert yourselves also to allay, to remove all distrust, which he depicted the rapturous emotions that quickened all their hearts. The monarch was then escorted back to the Tuileries by the multitude. The assembly passed a vote of thanks both to him and the queen. At the same time, a new idea presented itself: Louis XVI. had just pledged himself to maintain the constitution, and it seemed fitting that the deputies should bind themselves in like manner. The civic oath was thereupon proposed, and each deputy ascended the tribune and swore to be faithful to "the nation, the law, and the king; and to maintain with all his power the constitution decreed by the National Assembly, and accepted by the king." The attendants, and the deputies of the and put an end, as soon as possible, to the different causes of anxiety which keep from France so many of its citizens, the effect whereof forms so sad a contrast to the laws of safety and liberty you design to establish: be assured, prosperity will only return when general contentment is produced. We every where perceive hopes; let us be impatient to see happiness every where also.

One day, it is my solace to believe, all Frenchmen, without distinction, will be convinced of the advantage sure to result from the entire suppression of all order and state privileges, when the only rivalry shall be in common exertions for the public good, and for that prosperity of the country which interests all citizens in an equal degree; and when every one shall perceive, without displeasure, that, for the future, a reputation for talents and virtues will be a sufficient qualification for appointment to the service of the state.

At the same time, however, whatever recalls to a nation the ancient and unbroken services of an honoured family, is a distinction which nothing can destroy, and as it is closely connected with the sacred duties of gratitude, those of every class in society who aspire to render their country essential service, and those who enjoy the felicity of having already done so, are interested in respecting that transmission of titles or memorials, the fairest inheritance that can be passed to descendants.

Neither can the respect due to the ministers of religion be obliterated; for as that reverence is principally connected with the holy truths which are the safeguards of order and morality, all good and enlightened citizens have an equal interest in maintaining and defending it.

Doubtless, they who have relinquished their pecuniary privileges, they who no longer form, as heretofore, a political order in the state, will find themselves subjected to sacrifices of which I know all the weight; but I am persuaded their generosity will lead them to find consolation in the public advantages to be anticipated from the establishment of national assemblies."

The king continues, as we see, to point out to all parties the benefits of the new laws, and, at the same time, the necessity of preserving something of the ancient system. The words he addresses to the privileged classes prove his real opinion upon the expediency and the justice of the sacrifices that had been imposed upon them, and their resistance will be eternally branded by the expressions contained in this discourse. It will be vainly said that the king was not free: the care which he takes throughout in balancing concessions, counsels, and even reproaches, proves that he spoke sincerely. He expressed himself very differently when he afterwards wished to display the state of constraint in which he believed himself to be. His letter to the diplomatic body, hereafter quoted, will sufficiently demonstrate the fact. The popular exaggerated style which reigns in it shows the intention to convey an idea that he was not free. But here the moderate tone leaves no doubt; and what follows is so touching, so exquisite, that it is impossible any man could consent to write and utter it without having felt it.

"I also should have many losses to enumerate, if, in the midst of the great interests of the state, I could linger on personal calculations; but I experience a consolation which rewards me; I find a full and complete compensation in the increased happiness of the nation; and this sentiment I here express from the bottom of my heart.

I will, then, defend and uphold the constitutional liberty, the principles of which have been consecrated by the national desire, manifesting itself in unison with mine. I will do more; and in concert with the queen, who partakes all my sentiments, I will early train the mind and heart of my son to that new order of things which circumstances have wrought. I will habituate him from his earliest years to place his happiness on that of the French, and ever to be aware that, in spite of the language of flattery, a wise constitution will preserve him from the dangers of inexperience, and that a rational liberty adds fresh value to those sentiments of love and fidelity, of which the nation, for so many ages, has given such affecting proofs to their kings.

I do not permit myself to doubt that, in completing your work, you will attend with wisdom and confidence to the strong support of the executive power, a condition indispensable to the maintenance of durable order at home, and respect abroad. You can have no reasonable distrust remaining; it is therefore your duty, as citizens and faithful representatives of the nation, to secure, for the advantage of the state and for public liberty, that stability, which can result only from an authority at once active and tutelary. You will assuredly keep present to your minds, that without such an authority the various parts of your constitutional system would be destitute at once of connexion and harmony; and while you are attending to the liberty you love, and which I love also, you will not forget that disorder in administration, by provoking confusion and contest amongst the different powers, often degenerates, through blind violence, into the most dangerous and most alarming of all tyrannies.

Thus, gentlemen, not for myself (for I throw aside personal considerations in speaking of laws and institutions that are to regulate the destiny of the empire), but for the happiness of our common country, for its prosperity and for its power, I call upon you to dismiss from your minds all those momentary impressions which might possibly divert you from a careful and comprehensive consideration of what a kingdom such as France requires, as well from its great extent and immense population, as from its indispensable relations beyond its limits.

Neither will you neglect to fix your attention upon what is also required of legislators, by the manners, character, and customs of a nation which has become too celebrated in Europe, from the peculiarity of its spirit and genius, to make it a matter of indifference whether the sentiments of mildness, loyalty, and honour, which have rendered it so renowned, should be upheld or weakened.

Give it, therefore, an example of that spirit of justice which is the safeguard of property, of that right respected by all nations, which is not the work of chance, nor indebted to opinion for privileges, but which is strictly connected with the essential relations of public order and the foundations of social harmony.

By what fatality is it that, when tranquillity was beginning to return, new troubles have arisen in the provinces? By what fatality does it come to pass that fresh excesses have been perpetrated? Unite with me to suppress them; let us use all our efforts to prevent criminal violences occurring to tarnish the era in which the happiness of the nation is zealously endeavoured. You, who can command by so many influences the public confidence, enlighten the people who are misled as to their true interests; those good people who are so dear to me, and of whose love I am reminded when consolation is tendered me to alleviate my anxieties. Ah! if they knew how unhappy it makes me to hear of attacks upon property, or acts of violence against persons, they would probably spare me such heavy afflictions.

I cannot speak to you of the great interests of the state, without pressing you to attend earnestly and decisively to all that concerns the re-establishment of order in the finances, and the comfort of the numerous body of citizens who are in various degrees connected with the public funds. It is time to relieve all uneasiness; it is time to restore this kingdom to the stability of credit it has a right to enjoy. You cannot undertake every thing at once; consequently, I invite you to reserve for another period some portion of those benefits, the idea of which the junction of your varied talents has suggested to you. But when you have added to what you have already accomplished, a wise and well-digested plan for the administration of justice; when you have placed on the basis of a perfect equilibrium the revenue and the expenditure of the state; in a word, when you have completed the work of the constitution, you will have acquired great and substantial claims to the national gratitude; and in the succession of national assemblies, a succession henceforth founded on the constitution itself, year after year will only need additional sources of prosperity to be developed. May this day, on which your monarch has united with you in the frankest and most cordial manner, be a memorable date in the history of this empire! It will be so, I hope, if my ardent wishes and my earnest exhortations suffice as a signal of peace and concord amongst you. Let those who are yet reluctant to join in that spirit of union, now become so necessary, make for me the sacrifice of all the recollections that torture them; I will repay them by my gratitude and affection.

From this day forth, let us all be actuated—and I give you the example—let us all be actuated by but one opinion, one sense of interest, one determination—attachment to the new constitution, and an ardent desire for the peace, the happiness, and the prosperity of France."

commune, asked permission to take the oath in their turn; the side and front galleries followed their example, and from all points nothing was heard but the words: "I swear!"

The oath was repeated at the town-hall, and from borough to borough throughout France. Public rejoicings were ordered; every thing gave token of a general and sincere joy. This unquestionably was the time to enter upon a new line of conduct, and to avoid rendering this reconciliation unavailing, like all the others; but that very evening, whilst Paris glittered with an illumination to celebrate the auspicious event, the court had already relapsed into its infatuation, and the popular deputies were received at it in a very different manner from the gracious reception accorded to the noble deputies. In vain did Lafayette, whose sensible and zealous counsels were disregarded, inculcate upon the court that the king could no longer waver; that he ought to connect himself unreservedly with the popular party, and attempt to gain its confidence; that to effect this important object, it was necessary that his intentions should not only be proclaimed in the assembly, but manifested in his most trifling actions; that he ought to repudiate the slightest equivocal expression used in his presence, and disavow the least doubt that might be expressed as to his real wishes; that he ought to exhibit neither constraint nor displeasure, nor leave any lurking hopes to the aristocrats; and finally, that his ministers ought to be united, not permitting themselves any unseemly rivalry with the assembly, and obliging it to make such incessant appeals to public opinion. Lafayette in vain reiterated these prudent counsels with respectful earnestness; the king perused his letters, and thought him a very honest man; the queen repelled him with ill humour, and even seemed indignant at the interest he evinced towards the royal family. She received Mirabeau with much more benignity—a man of greater capacity perhaps, but certainly of less irreproachable fame than Lafayette.

The communications between Mirabeau and the court had been continued. He had even entered into relations with Monsieur, whom his opinions rendered more accessible to the popular party, and to him Mirabeau had repeated what he had always impressed upon the queen and M. de Montmorin, namely, that the monarchy could be saved only by identifying itself with liberty. He at length made a compact with the court, through the channel of an intermediate agent. He digested his principles in a sort of profession of faith, from which he bound himself not to swerve, and to support the court so long as it adhered to the same line of policy. A considerable allowance was granted to him in return. Strict morality unquestionably condemns such treaties, and demands that duty be performed from a sense of duty alone. But did he in fact sell himself? An inferior man would, beyond doubt, have bargained away and sacrificed his principles, but the puissant Mirabeau, so far from abandoning his, brought power to embrace them, and received in reward the assistance which his great necessities and unbridled passions rendered so indispensable. Very different from those who prostitute for high gain feeble talents and a loose conscience, Mirabeau, unshaken in his principles, battled alternately with his own party and the court, as if he were independent of the former for his popularity, and of the latter for his means of expenditure; and this to such a point, that historians, unable to believe him in alliance with the court which he opposed, have not recorded the treaty as made until 1791, whereas in truth it was concluded in the early months of 1790. Mirabeau had an interview with the queen, charmed her by his superiority, and was greatly flattered by the reception vouchsafed him. This extraordinary man was prone to all seductions, to those of vanity as well as to those of passion. He was to be taken with his strength and his weaknesses, and, as he was, made serviceable to the cause held in common with him. Besides Lafayette and Mirabeau, the court had likewise Bouillé, whom it is time to introduce on the scene.

Bouillé, a man of courage, rectitude, and talent, had all the feelings of aristocracy, and was distinguished from its herd only by a less perfect blindness, and a greater aptitude for affairs. Stationed at Metz, where he commanded a vast extent of frontier, and a considerable body of troops, he laboured to promote discord between his soldiers and the national guards, in order to preserve the former in fidelity to the court.* Assigned to the post he occupied as a resource in need, he was the terror of the popular party, being esteemed the general of the monarchy, as Lafayette of the constitution. Nevertheless, the conduct of the aristocracy dissatisfied him, and the weakness of the king disgusted him, and he would have quitted the service if he had not been entreated by Louis himself to remain. The honour of Bouillé was bright and scrupulous. His word pledged, the oath taken, no thought entered his head save fidelity to the king and the constitution. The natural policy of the court, therefore, was to unite Lafayette, Mirabeau, and Bouillé; for through them it would have had the national guards, the assembly, and the army, that is to say, the three powers of the day. Prejudices certainly existed, tending to divide those three influential personages. Lafayette, strong in his good intentions, was ready to coalesce with all who would serve the king and the constitution; but Mirabeau was jealous of Lafayette's influence, scowled at his much-vaunted purity, and affected to regard it as dangerous. Bouillé detested in Lafayette the enthusiastic tone of his opinions, and, perhaps, an irreproachable antagonist; he preferred Mirabeau, whom he believed more easy of management, and less rigorous in political faith. The court should have removed these particular grounds of alienation, and drawn the three men into an understanding. But only one means existed of cementing such a coalition—a limited monarchy. It ought, therefore, to have frankly resigned itself to that consummation, and strained all its powers to promote it. But for ever vacillating, without utterly discarding Lafayette, the court eyed him with aversion; subsidised Mirabeau, who attacked it at intervals; fomented the hatred of Bouillé against the revolution, directed upon Austria eyes of hope, and left in full activity the emigrants of Turin. Thus acts weakness: it seeks to flatter itself with hopes rather than to ensure itself of success, and in this manner proceeds to its own destruction, by inspiring suspicions which irritate opponents as much as reality itself; for it is better, after all, to strike than to threaten.

It was in vain that Lafayette, who attempted what the court ought to have executed, wrote to Bouillé, who was his relative, inviting him to serve the throne in conjunction, and by the only possible appliances, frankness and liberty. Bouillé, evilly inspired by the court, replied coldly and evasively, and, without moving against the constitution, continued to maintain an imposing attitude by his reserve, and the strength of his army.

This reconciliation of the 4th February, then, which might have been attended with such beneficial results, was quite abortive. The trial of Favras was concluded, and either from intimidation or conviction, the Châtelet condemned him to be hanged. Favras displayed, in the last moments of his life, the firmness becoming a martyr rather than an intriguer. He protested his innocence, and requested leave to make a declaration before he suffered death. The scaffold was raised on the Place de Grève. He was conveyed to the town-hall, where he was kept until nightfall. The populace desired with exceeding ardour to see a marquis hanged, and waited in the square with boundless impatience for the moment when so striking a proof of equality in punishments was to be exhibited. Favras avowed that he had held communications with a magnate of the state, who had engaged him to move the minds of men in favour of the king. As a certain expenditure was requisite in such a mission, this high personage had given him one hundred louis-d'ors (£80), which he had accepted. He asseverated that such were the limits of his crime, but named no confederate. He asked, however, whether the exposure of names would save him, and when the answer returned seemed unsatisfactory to him, he exclaimed, "In that case, I will die with my secret!" He walked to the place of execution with admirable serenity and presence of mind. Darkness reigned over the dismal Place de Grève; lamps glimmered here and there, and lights were attached to the gibbet. The populace were overjoyed at a spectacle in which their favourite equality was vindicated even on the scaffold; and they enhanced their delight with atrocious and unrelenting railleries, and with divers fanciful parodies on the ignominious fate of their unfortunate victim. The body of Favras was surrendered to his family, and new events soon obliterated the remembrance of his death, as well from the minds of those who had tortured as of those who had used him.

* It is himself who states this in his Memoirs.

In the mean time the clergy, driven to desperation, continued to excite broils over the whole surface of France, which the nobility viewed with satisfaction, conceiving great hopes from clerical influence over the people. So long as the assembly had contented itself with placing by a decree the ecclesiastical possessions at the disposition of the nation, the clergy had indulged in hopes that the execution of the decree might be averted; and, to obviate its necessity, they suggested various modes of supplying the exigencies of the public treasury. The Abbé Maury had proposed a tax on luxury, and the Abbé de Salsède had retorted by proposing that no ecclesiastic should be allowed to possess above a thousand crowns of revenue. The wealthy abbé was silenced by this proposition. Upon another occasion, when debating upon the national debt, Cazalès had recommended that an examination should be instituted, not into the validity of the titles on which each loan rested, but into the loan itself, its origin and its necessity—a mode of colouring bankruptcy after the odious and repudiated fashion of the "chambres ardentes." The clergy, exasperated at the creditors of the state, to whom they imagined themselves sacrificed, had supported the motion, notwithstanding the rigour of their principles on the rights of property. Maury had worked himself into a fury, and thrown aside all respect for the assembly, by vociferating to a portion of its members that they possessed only "the courage to face opprobrium." The assembly had taken offence at the expression, and manifested a desire to expel him. But Mirabeau, who had reason to believe himself alluded to, represented to his colleagues that each deputy belonged to his constituents, and that they had not the right to exclude him. Such moderation befitted incontestible superiority: it prevailed, and Maury was more severely punished by a censure than he would have been by expulsion. All these expedients, propounded by the clergy for the purpose of transferring the public creditors into their own predicament, were utterly unavailing; and the assembly directed the sale of four hundred millions of lands belonging to the royal domain and the church. Then, urged to desperation, the priests circulated writings amongst the people, and spread far and wide that the design of the revolutionists was to overthrow the Catholic religion. The provinces of the south presented to them the fairest prospect of agitating with success. We have seen that the first emigration had fixed its quarters at Turin, and its principal communications were maintained with Languedoc and Provence. Calonne, so celebrated at the era of the notables, was the minister of this fugitive court. Two parties divided it; the high nobility desired to maintain their exclusive sway, and rejected the intervention of the provincial gentry, and especially of the burghers. Hence they advocated an appeal to foreign force alone as a means of re-establishing the throne. Besides, to use religion as an engine, as the emissaries of the provinces proposed, seemed too ridiculous to men who had laughed for years at the witticisms of Voltaire. The other party, composed of petty nobles and expatriated burghers, upheld the policy of combating the passion of liberty with one still stronger, that of fanaticism, and of conquering by their own strength alone, without placing themselves at the mercy of foreigners. The former alleged the personal feuds engendered by civil war in exculpation of foreign interference; the latter argued that, though civil war meant desolation and bloodshed, it was not necessary they should sully themselves by treason also. These last, more courageous, more patriotic, but more ferocious than the others, were not likely to prevail in a court where Calonne ruled. However, as every aid was welcome, the communications were kept up between Turin and the southern provinces. It was finally decided that the revolution should be attacked both by foreign and civil war, and as a first step, that zealous endeavours should be made to arouse the old fanaticism of those districts.*

* The Memoirs of M. Froment supply so just an idea of the emigrants, and of the opinions that divided them, that I cannot do better than quote them. In a volume entitled "A Collection of various Documents relative to the Revolution," M. Froment thus expresses himself in the 4th and following pages:—

"I repaired secretly to Turin in January 1790, to solicit the approbation and countenance of the French princes. In a council held after my arrival, I explained to them that if they would arm the partisans of the altar and the throne, and join the interests of religion with those of royalty, it would be easy to save both the one and the other. Although firmly attached to the faith of my fathers, it was not against non-Catholics that I wished to wage war, but against the declared enemies of Catholicism and royalty; against those who boldly asserted that the world had heard too much of Jesus Christ and the Bourbons; against those who longed to strangle the last of kings with the entrails of the last of priests. The non-Catholics who have remained faithful to the monarchy have always found in me a most affectionate fellow-citizen, but rebellious Catholics a most implacable foe.

My plan tended merely to form a party, and to give it, as far as in me lay, extension and consistence. The grand argument of revolutionists being force, I felt that the grand rejoinder was force: then, as at present, I was convinced of this great truth, that a strong passion cannot be stifled except by one still stronger, and that religious zeal alone could choke republican frenzy. The miracles which zeal for religion has worked since that period, in La Vendée and Spain, prove that the philosophers and revolutionists of all grades would never have succeeded in establishing their anti-religious and anti-social system for so many years over the greater part of Europe, if the ministers of Louis XVI. had conceived such a project as mine, or if the councillors of the emigrant princes had sincerely adopted and honestly supported it.

But unhappily, the majority of the personages who directed Louis XVI. and the princes of his family, reasoned and acted only upon philosophical principles, though the philosophers and their disciples were the stimulators of the revolutionary agents. They thought they would have covered themselves with ridicule and dishonour if they had pronounced the single word "religion," if they had employed the powerful means it presents, and which the most profound politicians have used with success in all ages. Whilst the National Assembly sought to mislead the people, and to conciliate them by the suppression of feudal rights, tithes, the salt tax, &c. &c., they thought to bring them back to submission and loyalty by an exposure of the deficiencies in the new laws; by a picture of the kingly griefs; by writings above their comprehension. By such means they imagined they would revive in the hearts of all Frenchmen a pure and disinterested love for their sovereign; they believed that the clamours of malecontents would impede the enterprises of the factious, and permit the king to march straight to the object he wished to attain. The value of my counsels was estimated apparently by the weight of my station, and the opinions of the court magnates judged according to their titles and possessions."

Monsieur Froment continues his relation, and subsequently characterises the parties which divided the fugitive court, after the following fashion (page 33):—

The clergy warmly approved this plan, and neglected no means of promoting it. The Protestants in those parts were viewed with repugnance by the Catholics. The clergy took advantage of these prejudices, and especially at the solemnisation of Easter. At Montpellier, Nimes, Montauban, the slumbering fanaticism was awakened by all possible provocations.

Charles Lameth complained in the tribune that the Easter festival had been perverted into an occasion for misleading the people and exciting them against the new laws. At these words, the ecclesiastical members arose, apparently with the intention of quitting the assembly. The Bishop of Clermont threatened it; and many of the clergy were on the point of leaving, when Lameth was called to order, and the tumult subsided. In the mean time the sale of the church possessions was carried into execution, whereat the clergy were extremely wroth, and omitted no opportunity of openly testifying their resentment. Dom Gerle, a Carthusian, and sincere in his religious and patriotic sentiments, claimed one day the ear of the assembly, and moved that the Catholic religion be declared the sole religion of the state.* Several deputies immediately rose from their seats, and prepared to vote the proposition by acclamation, exclaiming that now was the time for the assembly to justify itself from the reproach that had been made against it of attacking the Catholic religion. But what was the meaning of such a proposition? Either the decree was designed to confer a monopoly on the Catholic religion, which none in particular ought ever to possess; or it was the promulgation of a fact, namely, that the majority in France were Catholics; and this fact needed no express announcement. The motion, therefore, could not be entertained, and in spite of the exertions of the nobility and clergy, the debate was adjourned to the following day. An immense concourse flocked to the hall that morning, and Lafayette, apprised that the malignants were exerting themselves to provoke disturbance, doubled the guard. The debate commenced: one ecclesiastic threatened the assembly with a malediction; Maury vociferated his accustomed denunciations. Menou repelled with calmness all the reproaches levelled against the assembly, and demonstrated that it could not be reasonably charged with seeking to abolish the Catholic religion, at the very time it was engaged in assigning the expenses of its service as public burdens; he therefore moved that the order of the day be proceeded with. Dom Gerle, convinced by his reasons, withdrew his motion, and apologised for having originated such a contest. M. de Larochefoucauld brought forward a fresh motion, which was substituted for that of Menou. Suddenly a member on the right side complained they were not free, singled out Lafayette, and demanded of him wherefore he had doubled the guard. The motive of his precaution was above suspicion, for it was not the left side that had to fear the populace, nor was it his own friends that Lafayette was solicitous to protect. This episode augmented the confusion; however, the discussion was resumed. In its progress Louis XIV. was quoted as an authority, upon which Mirabeau

"Such honourable testimonies, and the attention which was generally shown me at Turin, would have made me forget the past, and indulge in the most flattering anticipations of the future, if I had discerned great resources in the counsellors of the princes, and perfect concord amongst the most influential men in our affairs; but I beheld with grief the emigration divided into two parties, of which one wished to attempt the counter-revolution by the aid of foreign powers alone, and the other by the royalists of the interior.

The first party argued that, by ceding certain provinces to the powers, they would furnish the French princes with armies sufficiently numerous to reduce the factious; that with time, it would be easy to re-conquer the dominions they should be forced to cede; and that the court, by not coming under any obligation to any of the bodies of the state, would be free to dictate laws to all Frenchmen indiscriminately. The courtiers trembled lest the nobility of the provinces and the royalists of the third-estate should have the honour of replacing on its pedestal the crumbling monarchy. They felt they would no longer be the dispensers of patronage and favour, and that their sway would be at an end, if the provincial nobility should re-establish, at the cost of their blood, the royal authority, and thereby merit the favour and the confidence of their sovereign. The apprehension of such a new order of things induced them to unite together, if not to divert the princes from employing in any way whatever the royalists of the interior, at all events to fix their attention principally on the cabinets of Europe, and lead them to place their greatest hopes on foreign aid. As a consequence of this presentiment, they secretly put in force the most efficacious means of ruining the internal resources, and of causing proposed plans to fail, several of which might have led to the re-establishment of order, if they had been prudently directed and honestly supported. Such are the facts of which I myself have been an eye-witness, the truth of which I shall demonstrate one day by authentic statements and vouchers; but the moment is not yet come. In a conference which was held at that period on the subject of the advantage to be drawn from the favourable dispositions of the inhabitants of Lyons and Franche-Comté, I stated explicitly the means that ought to be employed, at the same time, in order to assure the triumph of the royalists of Gevaudan, of the Cevennes, of Vivarais, of the Comtat-Venaissin, of Languedoc, and of Provence. During the heat of debate, Field-marshal the Marquis d'Autichamp, a great partisan of the powers, said to me: 'But will not the injured and the friends of victims seek to revenge themselves?' 'Well, what of it?' said I, 'provided we attain our object!' 'See!' he exclaimed, 'how I have wrung from him an avowal that particular vengeances would be wreaked!' More than astonished at such an observation, I remarked to the Marquis de La Rouzière, my neighbour—'I did not know that a civil war should be like a mission of monks!' It was thus by inspiring the princes with fear, lest they should render themselves odious to their most inveterate enemies, that the courtiers induced them to use only half measures—sufficient, doubtless, to stimulate the zeal of the royalists in the interior, but very insufficient, after having compromised them, to guarantee them from the wrath of the factious. Since that time it has happened that, during the stay of the army of the princes in Champagne, M. de la Porte, aid-de-camp to the Marquis d'Autichamp, having made a republican prisoner, imagined, according to his general's hypothesis, that he should win him back to his duty by a pathetic exhortation, and by restoring to him his arms and his liberty; but scarcely had the republican walked a few paces than he stretched his captor dead on the ground. The Marquis d'Autichamp, then forgetting the moderation he had manifested at Turin, set fire to several villages, by way of avenging the death of his imprudent missionary.

The second party argued that, inasmuch as the powers had several times taken up arms to humble the Bourbons, and especially to prevent Louis XIV. from securing the crown of Spain to his grandson, so far from calling them to our assistance, it behoved us, on the contrary, to reanimate the zeal of the clergy, the loyalty of the nobility, and the love of the people for the king, and to use all possible speed in stifling a family quarrel, by which foreigners might probably be tempted to profit.

It is to this fatal division amongst the leaders of the emigration, and to the ignorance or perfidy of the ministers of Louis XVI., that the revolutionists owed their first successes. I will go much farther, and I assert that it was not the National Assembly which made the revolution, but, in truth, those around the king and the princes; I assert that the ministers delivered up Louis XVI. to the enemies of royalty, as certain intriguers delivered up the princes and Louis XVIII. to the enemies of France; I assert that the majority of the courtiers who surrounded the kings, Louis XVI. and Louis XVIII., and the princes of their families, were and are charlatans, true political eunuchs; that it is to their imbecility, cowardice, or treachery, that must be attributed all the evils which have desolated France, and those which still threaten the civilised world. If I bore an illustrious name, and I had been of the council of the Bourbons, I should not survive the reflection that a horde of vile poltroons and brigands, not one of whom has shown either genius or superior talent of any kind, had succeeded in overthrowing the throne, in establishing a sway over the most powerful states of Europe, in making the whole universe tremble; and when this idea torments me, I bury myself in the obscurity of my existence, in order to place myself beyond the reach of censure, since it has rendered me powerless in arresting the progress of the revolution."

* Sitting of the 12th April.

expressed himself in energetic terms. "I am not surprised," said he, "that we are reminded of the reign in which the edict of Nantes was revoked; but know that, from this tribune in which I stand, I can perceive the fatal window whence a king, the assassin of his subjects, connecting the interests of this earth with those of religion, gave the signal of the St Bartholomew!" This terrible reminiscence failed to terminate the discussion, which accordingly proceeded. The motion of the Duke de Larochefoucauld was finally adopted. The assembly declared that its sentiments were well known, but that, from respect for liberty of conscience, it neither could nor ought to deliberate upon the proposition submitted to it.

A few days had scarcely elapsed before another plan for alarming and even dissolving the assembly was attempted. The new organisation of the kingdom was completed, and the people were about to be convoked for the purpose of electing their magistrates, which was deemed an excellent opportunity for getting new deputies nominated at the same time, to replace those who formed the existing assembly. This measure, once before proposed and discussed, had been already rejected. It was again brought forward in April 1790. Certain instructions limited the powers of deputies to one year, and as the assembly had been opened in May 1789, that period had very nearly expired. Although the instructions had been abrogated, though a solemn engagement had been entered into not to separate before the completion of the constitution, those men, in whose eyes no decree had been passed, no oath taken, when it suited the objects they aimed to accomplish, proposed to direct the election of other deputies, and give up their places to them. Maury, upon whom the brunt of this debate was laid, performed his part with as much confidence as ever, and with more than usual address. He appealed to the sovereignty of the people, and warned the assembly that it could not long usurp the prerogatives of the nation, nor indefinitely protract powers which were merely temporary. He asked by what title it had assumed sovereign attributes; he maintained that the alleged distinction between the legislative and constituent character was perfectly chimerical; that a sovereign convention can exist only in the absence of all other government; and that, if the assembly were such a convention, its only rational course was to dethrone the king, and declare the monarchy in suspension. Shouts of indignation interrupted him as he thus spoke, manifesting the general repugnance to such opinions. Mirabeau rose, with an air of dignified composure, to reply. "We are asked," said he, "when the deputies of the people became a national convention. To this I answer, upon that day when, finding the portals of their hall barricaded by soldiers, they proceeded to the first place in which they could assemble, to swear they would sooner perish than betray and abandon the rights of the nation. Our powers, whatever they might have been, were changed in their nature by that day. And whatever the powers may be that we have since exercised, our troubles, our labours, have legitimatised them; the adhesion of the whole nation has sanctified them. You all remember the words of that great man of antiquity, who had neglected legal forms in saving his country. Summoned by a factious tribune to aver whether he had observed the laws, he exclaimed, 'I swear I have saved the republic!' Gentlemen," cried Mirabeau, turning to the deputies of the commons, "I swear you have saved France!"

Upon this splendid adjuration, says Ferrières, the entire assembly, as if irresistibly moved by some spontaneous inspiration, declared the discussion at an end, and immediately decreed that the electoral bodies should not concern themselves with the choice of new deputies.

Thus this new expedient was equally fruitless as others that had preceded it, and the assembly was enabled to continue its labours. But troubles were not the less rife throughout France. The commandant, De Voisin, was massacred by the people; the forts of Marseilles were seized by the national guard. Movements of a contrary tendency took place at Nimes and Montauban. Emissaries from Turin had successfully appealed to bigotry; they had distributed papers, in which the monarchy was proclaimed in danger, and the Catholic religion claimed as the national creed. A royal proclamation had been vainly issued to dissipate illusions; the emissaries had replied by fresh invocations. The Protestants had been driven to arms against the Catholics; and the latter, disappointed in the succours promised them from Turin, had been ultimately subdued. Divers bodies of national guards had put themselves in motion to assist the patriots against the rebels. The battle was thus joined, and the Viscount de Mirabeau, the declared opponent of his illustrious brother, announcing the commencement of civil war from the tribune, seemed, by his warmth, his gestures, and his words, as if he would have provoked it in the assembly itself.

It was in this manner that, whilst the most moderate of the deputies laboured to appease the revolutionary ardour, an indiscreet opposition irritated the fever, which quietude alone could have calmed, and furnished topics for declamation to the most violent of the demagogues. The clubs were driven by the same cause into a more exaggerated tone. That of the Jacobins, the successor of the original Breton club, established first at Versailles and afterwards at Paris, rose above all the others, from the number of its members, as also from the talent and the violence displayed in it.* Its sittings were as regular as those of the assembly. It anticipated all the questions which were to be discussed by that body, and pronounced decisions which already operated as fetters upon the legislators themselves. The principal popular deputies resorted thither, and the most phlegmatic found in its exciting atmosphere energy and stimulus. Lafayette, as a counterpoise to this redoubtable influence, had concerted with Bailly and other enlightened men the formation of another club, called the Club of '89, and subsequently The Feuillants.† But the attempt was unavailing; a meeting of a hundred calm and well-informed men could not attract the multitude like the Jacobin Club, where all the fury of popular passions ran riot. Closing the clubs would have been the effectual course; but the court was too deficient in frankness, and inspired too many doubts, for the popular party to venture upon the adoption of such a plan. The Lameths reigned predominant at the Jacobin Club; Mirabeau appeared indifferently in both the one and the other; his position was evidently between the two parties. An occasion soon presented itself in which his part became more decided, and in which he gained a memorable advantage for the monarchy, as we shall shortly have occasion to relate.

CHAPTER V.

STATE OF EUROPEAN POWERS—FIRST ISSUE OF ASSIGNATS—FESTIVAL OF THE FEDERATION—RESIGNATION OF NECKER—CIVIL OATH IMPOSED UPON THE CLERGY.

At the period we have now reached, the French revolution began to attract the serious attention of foreign monarchs; its tone was so elevated and firm, and its predominant features of such universal applicability, that foreign princes were naturally in great alarm. They had hitherto imagined it a mere passing agitation; but the success of the assembly, its unexpected firmness and constancy, and, above all, the future results that it proposed to itself, and indeed to all nations, drew upon it of necessity a greater degree of observation and abhorrence, and gained for it the honour of setting every cabinet actively on the watch. Europe was then divided into two great antagonistic leagues; the Anglo-Prussian on one side, and the imperial courts on the other.

* This club, styled that of "The Friends of the Constitution," was transferred to Paris in October 1789, and was then known under the name of the Jacobin Club, because it met in a hall of the Jacobin convent in the street St Honoré.

† Instituted on the 12th May.

Frederick-William had succeeded the great Frederick on the throne of Prussia. That fickle and weak prince, renouncing the policy of his illustrious predecessor, had abandoned the alliance of France for that of England. In close union with that power, he had concluded the famous Anglo-Prussian league, which attempted so many grand schemes and executed none; which roused Sweden, Poland, Turkey, against Russia and Austria; abandoned all those whom it had excited to arms, and contributed even to despoil them, as in the partition of Poland.

The project of England and Prussia united had been to weaken Russia and Austria, by instigating against them Sweden, over which the chivalric Gustavus reigned—Poland, groaning under its first partition, and Turkey, exasperated at Russian encroachments. England's principal view in this league was to avenge herself for the aid furnished her American colonies by France, without a formal declaration of war against the latter. It had found means to effect this object by provoking war between the Turks and the Russians.* France could not remain neuter between these two nations without a rupture with the Turks, who relied upon its assistance, and without likewise losing its commercial supremacy in the Levant. On the other hand, by taking part in the war, it lost the alliance of Russia, with which it had just concluded a highly advantageous treaty, which secured it timber and all the materials the north furnishes so abundantly for naval purposes. Thus in both alternatives France suffered loss. In the mean time, England got ready its forces, and disposed them for active participation when the occasion suited. But, perceiving the disordered state of the finances under the notables, and the popular excesses under the Constituent Assembly, it thought there was no need for actual war, and, according to general belief, it preferred prostrating France by fomenting internal troubles rather than by an open appeal to arms. Thus England was always accused of encouraging discord in France.

This Anglo-Prussian league had succeeded in getting battles fought, without producing any decisive results. Gustavus had extricated himself like a general from a predicament into which he had plunged like a knight-errant. Holland, in rebellion, had been subdued to the stadtholder by English intrigues and Prussian arms. Wary England had thus deprived France of a powerful maritime alliance; and the Prussian monarch, who merely sought the gratification of vanity, had revenged an outrage perpetrated by the states of Holland on the wife of the stadtholder, who was his own sister. Poland had taken consistence in its government, and was preparing for war. Turkey had been beaten by Russia. However, the death of Joseph II., the Emperor of Austria, in January 1790, changed the aspect of affairs. Leopold, an enlightened and pacific prince, on whose mild dominion Tuscany had heaped benedictions, succeeded him. Leopold, equally skilful and sagacious, wishing to put an end to the war, employed as the readiest means of success, with an imagination so unsteady as Frederick-William's, arguments of seduction. To that prince were described in moving terms the sweets of peace, the evils of war, so long pressing on his people, and the dangers of the French revolution, which proclaimed such disastrous principles. Ideas of absolute power were awakened in his breast, and the hope was even suggested to him of chastising the French revolutionists as he had already done those of Holland. He allowed himself to be gained over by such specious reasons, at the very time he was about to reap the advantages of that league which his minister Hertzberg had so boldly conceived and formed. The peace was signed at Reichenbach in July 1790. In August, Russia made peace with Gustavus, and got rid of all her enemies but Poland, which excited little alarm, and Turkey, which had been repulsed on all sides. We will allude to these events more particularly hereafter. The attention of the powers, therefore, was ultimately almost entirely concentrated upon France and its revolution. Some time before the conclusion of the peace between Prussia and Austria, whilst the Anglo-Prussian league threatened the two imperial courts, and secretly attacked France, and also Spain, the constant and natural ally of France, certain English ships had been seized in Nootka Sound by the Spaniards. Energetic remonstrances were made, accompanied by a general arming in the English ports. Spain immediately demanded the assistance of France, upon the strength of existing treaties, and Louis XVI. ordered the equipment of fifteen ships of war. On this occasion, England was accused of attempting to augment the embarrassments under which France laboured. It is true the clubs of London had several times complimented the National Assembly; but it was said the cabinet might permit a few philanthropists to express their amiable sympathies, and yet at the same time subsidise those astounding agitators, who appeared in every quarter, and gave such incessant occupation to the national guards throughout the kingdom. The internal troubles became still greater at the time of the general arming, and it was impossible to avoid perceiving a connexion between the threats of England and the renewal of disorder. Lafayette even, who rarely spoke in the assembly except upon occasions relative to the public tranquillity, denounced at the tribune a secret sinister influence. "I cannot help calling the attention of the assembly," said he, "to a fresh and simultaneous fermentation, exhibited from Strasburg to Nimes, and from Brest to Toulon, and which the enemies of the people would vainly fasten on them, when it bears all the characteristics of a secret influence. The question affecting the establishment of departments is mooted, and the country is devastated; neighbouring powers arm themselves, and disorders instantly break out in our arsenals." Several commanders, in fact, had been murdered, and by chance or design, the best marine officers had been sacrificed. The English ambassador was ordered by his court to repel these imputations. But it is well known what degree of credit such assurances deserve. Calonne likewise wrote to the king in justification of England; but Calonne, vouching for foreigners, was himself suspected. He vainly urged that every item of expenditure is known in a representative government; that even secret expenses are stated as such; and that in the English budgets there was no appropriation of that description. Experience has proved that funds are never wanting even to responsible ministers. What may be more satisfactorily alleged is, that time, the unfolder of all mysteries, has discovered nothing upon this subject, and that Necker, who was in a situation to form a correct opinion, never believed in this secret influence.*

The king, according to the fact that has been narrated, informed the assembly by message of the equipment of fifteen sail of the line, not doubting, as he said, that it would heartily approve the measure and vote the necessary supplies. The assembly received the notification most favourably, but it perceived a constitutional question involved in the proceeding, which it judged expedient to solve before replying to the king. "The preparations are completed," said Alexander Lameth, "and our deliberations cannot retard them. We ought, however, to decide at once whether to the king or to the assembly the right of making peace and war should be delegated." This was in fact almost the last important attribute that remained to be fixed, and precisely one calculated to excite the most lively interest. The public mind was too fully impressed with the faults of courts, with their alternations of ambition and weakness, and hence greatly indisposed to leave the throne in possession of power to involve the nation in dangerous wars, or to dishonour it by shameful treaties. At the same time, of all the functions of government, the superintendence over war and peace is the one in which its action is the most appropriate, and in which the executive power ought to exercise the most influence; that, in fact, in respect of which the greatest extent of discretion should be left it, in order that it may act advantageously and with perfect good will. The opinion of Mirabeau, who was said to be gained by the court, was proclaimed previous to the discussion upon this important question. The occasion was deemed favourable for damaging the orator in that eminent popularity he enjoyed, and which so chagrined his rivals. The Lameths were not backward in seizing upon it, and they arranged that Barnave should lead the attack upon Mirabeau. The right side stood aloof, so to speak, and left the field of battle free to those combatants.

* [This is scarcely a credible statement. M. Thiers has overlooked the fact, that Catherine II.'s ambition needed no prompting to have swallowed the whole Turkish empire if she could have got it.]

* See what Madame de Staël says in her Reflections upon the French Revolution.

The debate was impatiently expected: it was at length begun.* After certain speeches had been delivered which scarcely touched the question, Mirabeau was heard, and argued it in a perfectly novel manner. War, according to him, is almost always an unforeseen catastrophe; hostilities are commenced before threats are given; the king, as charged with the public safety, must repel them; and thus war ensues before the assembly could possibly interfere. It is the same with treaties: the king alone can seize the critical moment for negotiating either in a friendly or a hostile spirit with foreign powers; it was the province of the assembly merely to ratify the conditions obtained. In both instances, the king alone can act, and the assembly approve or censure. Mirabeau, therefore, maintained that the executive power should be authorised to carry on effectively hostilities when once commenced, and that the legislative power, according to the circumstances of each case, should sanction the continuance of the war, or insist upon peace. This opinion was applauded, because the words of Mirabeau always were. Barnave afterwards entered the tribune, and passing aside the other speakers, applied himself to answer Mirabeau alone. He allowed that collisions often occurred before the nation could be consulted, but he denied that hostilities necessarily involved war, arguing that the king ought to repel them and immediately communicate with the assembly, which would then declare, as the sovereign authority, its definitive resolution. Thus the whole difference was little more than verbal; for Mirabeau granted to the assembly the right of disapproving a war and of insisting upon peace, and Barnave claimed for it the right of actually declaring the one or the other; but in both cases, the will of the assembly would be obligatory, and Barnave gave it no more than Mirabeau. Notwithstanding, Barnave was vociferously cheered and carried in triumph by the populace, whilst his opponent was upbraided with having sold himself. A pamphlet, entitled, The Grand Treason of the Count de Mirabeau, was hawked through all the streets by deep-mouthed itinerants. A critical moment for Mirabeau had arrived, and every one anticipated a mighty effort on the part of so unyielding a champion. He demanded leave to reply, obtained it, mounted the tribune in presence of an immense multitude gathered to hear him, and as he mounted declared he would descend only dead or victorious. "I likewise," said he, in commencement, "have been borne in triumph, and yet this day the streets resound with shouts of the 'grand treason of the Count de Mirabeau!' I did not need this example to be aware, that there is but a step from the Capitol to the Tarpeian Rock. But such revulsions shall not arrest me in my career." After this effective opening, he declared that it was his intention to answer Barnave only, and from the beginning to the end. "Explain yourself," said he, addressing that deputy; "you have in your speech maintained that the king should be compelled to notify the commencement of hostilities, and that to the assembly alone belongs the right of expressing the national will upon the point. To this I fix you, and ask if you have forgotten those principles of ours, by which the expression of the national will is left conjointly to the assembly and the king. In attributing it to the assembly alone, you have outraged the constitution. I call you, therefore, to order. You make no answer. I go on then."

Barnave could in fact allege nothing in reply to such a thrust. He remained during a long oration exposed to similar overpowering bursts of eloquence. Mirabeau dissected and triumphantly refuted his arguments point by point, and moreover demonstrated that he gave nothing more to the assembly than he himself had given; but that, by reducing the king to a simple notification, he had taken from him that concurrence declared necessary to the expression of the national will. He concluded by reproaching Barnave for stimulating idle rivalries between men who ought, as he said, to live like faithful companions in arms. In the course of his speech, Barnave had enumerated the supporters of his opinion, and Mirabeau, in his turn, mentioned those who thought with him. In the list he pointed especially to those moderate men, the first champions of the constitution, who sustained the cause of liberty for France, when his vile calumniators were picking up the crumbs of courts (he alluded to the Lameths, who had received favours from the queen); "such men," he added, "as will be honoured, even to the tomb, both by friends and foes."

Mirabeau descended from the tribune amid unanimous applause. The assembly contained a considerable number of deputies, belonging neither to the right nor to the left, but who, not having formed predeterminate opinions, decided upon the impressions of the moment. It was through them that genius and reason prevailed, because they turned the scale by joining either side. Barnave desired to answer, which the assembly opposed; and calls for a division became general. The decree of Mirabeau, as ably amended by Chapelier, had the priority, and was finally adopted on the 22d May, to the public satisfaction; for, after all, these rivalries scarcely extended beyond the circle in which they were engendered, and the great popular party deemed itself as victorious with Mirabeau as with the Lameths.

The decree conferred upon the king and the nation the right of making peace and war. The king was intrusted with the disposition of the force; he was to notify the commencement of hostilities, to convoke the assembly if not in session, and to propose the decree for war or peace; the assembly was to deliberate upon his express proposition, and the king to afterwards exercise his sanction upon its decision. It was Chapelier, who, by a most reasonable amendment, had required the express proposition, and the definitive sanction. As it passed, this decree, so conformable to sound sense and the principles already established, excited sincere joy amongst the constitutionalists, and absurd hopes amongst the counter-revolutionists, who imagined that the public mind was on the move to reaction, and that this victory of

* Sittings from the 14th to the 22d May.

Mirabeau would result in theirs. Lafayette, who upon this occasion was in unison with Mirabeau, wrote of it to Bouillé, gave him hopes of tranquillity and moderation, and strove, as was his invariable custom, to gain his cordial acquiescence in the new order of things.

The assembly still continued its financial labours. These consisted in making the best possible disposition of the church estates, the sale of which, long ago decreed, was not to be averted by protests, by episcopal charges, or by intrigues. To despoil a too potent body of large tracts of land; to distribute them to the best advantage, so as to improve their fertility by the division; by this process to constitute proprietors numberless individuals who were not so; and by the same operation to extinguish the debts of the state, and re-establish order in the finances—such were the objects of the assembly, and it was too deeply impressed with their utility to recoil before any opposing obstacles. The assembly had already ordered the sale of crown and church lands to the value of four hundred millions, but it was highly expedient to find means for selling those estates, without depreciating them by offering them for simultaneous disposal. Bailly proposed, in the name of the Paris municipality, a well-digested project, namely, to transfer those possessions to the municipalities, who should purchase them in a mass, in order to sell them out again in parcels, so that they should not be exposed to competition all at once. As the municipalities were without funds to pay immediately, he proposed they should form engagements for stipulated periods, and pay the national creditors with notes of the communes, which they should be enjoined to retire by instalments. Those notes, which were called in the discussion municipal paper, suggested the first idea of assignats. By following Bailly's plan, the ecclesiastical possessions were definitively appropriated; that is, their owners being displaced, they were divided amongst the municipalities, and the creditors brought more nearly in contact with their hypothec, by acquiring claims upon the municipalities, instead of those they held upon the state. The security was therefore increased, inasmuch as the payment was made more immediate; and the exaction of that payment, moreover, depended upon the creditors themselves, since with these notes or assignats they might purchase a proportionate amount of the estates exposed to sale. Thus a vast advantage was conferred upon them, nor was it the only or last one. It seemed possible they might not be disposed to convert their notes into lands, from scrupulous or other motives; and in that case, those notes, which they would be obliged to keep, as they were not allowed to circulate as currency, would become in their hands nothing more than simple undischarged claims. But one farther step, therefore, remained to be taken, which was to give those notes or claims the faculty of circulation, which converted them at once into an actual currency, and the state creditors, being enabled to transfer them in acquittances, would be in truth reimbursed. Another material consideration put the policy of the measure beyond doubt. Specie was excessively scarce, and its disappearance was attributed to the emigration, which bore away with it large amounts of coin; to payments which were necessarily made to foreigners; and finally to malignancy. The true cause was want of confidence, induced by the prevailing troubles. A profusion of specie is rendered apparent by circulation; for when confidence is unshaken, the activity of commercial exchange is pushed to its extreme limits; the medium of that commerce, the precious metals, passes with rapidity from hand to hand, is seen abundantly every where, and is believed to be considerably greater in amount than it actually is, because it is used to more purpose; but when political troubles fill the land with alarm, trade languishes, capital lies dormant, and money passes slowly and rarely, or is often perhaps buried, and the most unfounded accusations are made by popular prejudice as to the causes of its absence.

The desire of providing a substitute for the precious metals, which the assembly deemed exhausted, and of giving the creditors something more than a security to lie dead on their hands, besides the necessity that existed of meeting a vast variety of importunate wants, led to these notes or assignats being invested with a species of forced circulation, with the character of a legal tender. The public creditor was thereby paid, because he could insist upon the paper he had received being taken in return, and thus provide for all his engagements. If he had not thought fit to buy lands, those who had received the circulating paper from him would be ultimately driven to become purchasers. The assignats which came back in this way were destined to be burnt, and by this operation the church lands must necessarily soon be distributed and the paper money suppressed. The assignats bore an interest at so much per day, and increased in value by lying in the hands of capitalists.

The clergy, who were not slow to perceive that this project furnished a means of accomplishing the alienation of their possessions, opposed it with all their might. Their noble and other allies, ever inimical to any measure that facilitated the progress of the revolution, likewise opposed it, and expatiated on the evils of paper money. The name of Law was of course loudly resounded, and the recollection of his famous bankruptcy brought prominently forward. But the comparison was quite misplaced, because Law's paper was based merely on acquisitions of the India Company in expectancy, whilst the assignats rested on a territorial capital, at once substantial and easily available. Law had promulgated, in confederacy with the court, infamous exaggerations, and had prodigiously exceeded the actual capital of the company; the assembly, on the contrary, had no reason to surmise that any such spoliation could ensue from the new arrangements it had sanctioned. Besides, the amount of paper issues represented only a small portion of the capital which was pledged for them. But it was nevertheless true that paper, however safe it may be, is not, like bullion, a reality, or, according to Bailly's expression, a physical materiality. Specie carries with it an intrinsic value; paper, on the contrary, still needs an operation, an investment, a realisation. It must therefore bear a depreciation as compared with specie, and so soon as it is thus depreciated, the precious metals, which no one will exchange for paper, are concealed, and finally disappear altogether. If, in addition to this inherent evil, disorders in the administration of the estates, and immoderate emissions of paper, destroy the proportion between the circulating notes and the capital hypothecated, confidence is annihilated; the nominal value is preserved, but the real value exists no more; and he who pays away such a conventional currency robs him who receives it, and a deplorable crisis inevitably occurs. All this was possible, and with somewhat more experience would have appeared certain. As a financial measure, therefore, the issue of assignats was very blameable, but as a political measure it was indispensable, because it provided for pressing emergencies, and divided the property without having recourse to an agrarian law. With such inducements the assembly could not hesitate; and, in spite of Maury and his party, it decreed four hundred millions of forced assignats, with interest (April).

Necker had long ago lost the confidence of Louis XVI., the pristine deference of his colleagues, and the affection of the nation. Wrapped up in his calculations, he sometimes maintained disputations with the assembly. His reserve concerning extraordinary expenses had provoked a demand for the Red Book, a famous register, in which was recorded, as alleged, the list of all secret expenses. The king consented reluctantly to its production, and sealed up the leaves which contained the expenditure of his predecessor, Louis XV. The assembly respected his delicacy, and confined its scrutiny to the expenses of the existing reign. No items personal to the king were found in it; the prodigality was all owing to courtiers. The Lameths were mentioned for a largess of 60,000 francs, disbursed by the queen for their education. They immediately carried the sum to the public treasury. The pensions were reduced with a twofold reference to services and former station. The assembly, in every instance, evinced exemplary moderation; it solicited the king to fix his civil list himself, and then voted by acclamation the twenty-five millions he asked.

This National Assembly, strong and confident in its numbers, its talents, its sway, and its determination, had undertaken the task of regenerating all departments of the state, and in execution thereof, had recently framed a new judicial organisation. It had distributed the tribunals in the same manner as the administrations, by districts and departments. The judges were left for popular election. This last provision had been vehemently opposed. Political metaphysics had been again employed to prove that the judicial power emanated from the executive power, and that the king ought to nominate the judges. Good reasons had been alleged on both sides of the question, but the material one for the assembly should have been, since it was desirous of constituting a monarchy, that royalty, thus successively denuded of all its attributes, would sink into a simple magistracy, and the state resolve into a republic. But it was too hazardous an experiment to define explicitly what functions were inherent in monarchy; it would have involved concessions which a nation invariably refuses in the first moments of its enthusiasm for liberty. The fate of nations is ever to insist upon too much or upon nothing. The assembly was sincerely attached to the king, entertaining for him a profound deference, and manifesting that spirit in repeated instances; but whilst it was cherishing the person, it seemed unsuspicious that it was destroying the thing.

After this uniformity had been introduced into the civil and judicial administrations, the service of religion remained to be regulated and constituted in harmony with all others. Accordingly, when a superintending administrative council and a tribunal of appeal were established in each department, it was natural to assign a bishopric for it likewise. How, in fact, could it be sanctioned, that certain dioceses should embrace fifteen hundred square leagues, when others stretched over scarcely twenty? that certain parishes should be ten leagues in circumference, and others contain but a score of hearths? that numerous incumbents should possess at the most seven hundred livres a-year, whilst, not far from them, were benefices yielding from ten to fifteen thousand livres? The assembly, whilst reforming abuses, did not encroach upon ecclesiastical doctrines, nor upon the papal authority, because territorial limitations had always belonged to the temporal power. It contemplated, therefore, a new division, and also to subject, as in early times, the incumbents and the bishops to popular election; nor in this last intention did it interfere with aught but the temporal power, since the ecclesiastical dignitaries were always chosen by the king, and confirmed by the pope. This measure, which was called "The civil constitution of the clergy," and which brought upon the assembly a greater load of calumny than all it had done besides, was nevertheless the offspring of the most religious members. It was Camus and other Jansenists, who, wishing to strengthen religion in the kingdom, endeavoured to bring it into harmony with the new institutions. Certainly, when the spirit of justice was infused every where, it would have been very strange that the ecclesiastical administration alone should remain without its influence. But for Camus and some others, the members of the assembly, reared in the school of the philosophers, would have regarded Christianity as any other creed admitted in the state, and paid no attention to it. They yielded to sentiments, which, in modern society, it is customary not to combat, even when not participated in. They therefore supported the religious and sincerely Christian project of Camus. The clergy denounced it, alleging that it encroached upon the spiritual authority of the pope, and appealed to Rome. The principal articles of the project, however, were finally adopted,* and presented to the king, who demanded time to refer them to the holy see. The king, whose enlightened piety allowed him to acknowledge the justice of this measure, wrote to the pope, in the earnest hope of gaining his consent, and thus removing all the objections of the clergy. We shall soon see to what intrigues the failure of his beneficent views is to be attributed.

The month of July drew near: shortly, a year would have passed since the capture of the Bastille, since the nation had seized upon power, pronounced its fiats by the agency of the assembly, and of itself put them into execution, or secured that execution under its own superintendence. The 14th July was considered as the day which had commenced a new era, and it was resolved to celebrate its anniversary by a great festival. The provinces and the towns had already offered an example of confederating, the better to resist by union the enemies of the revolution. The municipality of Paris proposed for the 14th July a general federation of all France, which should be celebrated in the midst of the capital, by deputations from all the national guards and all the detachments of the army. This proposal was hailed with enthusiasm, and immense preparations were made to render the festival worthy of its object.

Foreign nations, as we have already seen, had long directed their eyes upon France; the sovereigns hated and feared the revolution, their people looked upon it with favour. Some enthusiastic foreigners presented themselves to the assembly, each in the costume of his nation. Their orator, Anacharsis Clootz, a Prussian by birth, a man of wild imagination, asked permission, in the name of the human race, to take part in the federation. Such occurrences, apparently so ridiculous to those who have not witnessed them, are calculated deeply to move those who are exposed to their immediate impression. The assembly granted the request, and the president informed these strangers that they would be admitted, in order that they might recount to their countrymen what they had seen, and convey to them a just appreciation of the happiness and the blessings attendant upon liberty.

The emotion caused by this scene led to another An equestrian statue of Louis XIV. represented that monarch trampling upon the figures of certain conquered provinces. "We ought not to suffer such monuments of slavery in days of liberty," said one of the Lameths. "It is not fitting that the deputies from Franche-Comté, when they arrive at Paris, should behold an emblem of their native province thus enchained." Maury opposed a measure which, although of little importance, it was expedient to grant to the public enthusiasm. An instant afterwards, a voice proposed the abolition of titles, such as count, marquis, baron, &c.; the prohibition of liveries; and finally, the suppression of all hereditary titles. Young Montmorenci supported the motion. A noble deputy inquired what was intended to be substituted for the words, "Such an one was made a count for having served the state." "We will simply express," said Lafayette, "that such an one on such a day saved the state." The decree was adopted (19th June), notwithstanding the extravagant irritation of the nobles, who felt the loss of their titles more acutely than all the more substantial sacrifices they had been compelled to make during the whole course of the revolution. The more moderate portion of the assembly would have been better pleased if, in abolishing titles, liberty had been left to those who might desire it still to retain them. Lafayette hastened to apprise the court of this tendency before the decree was sanctioned, and urged it to remit it to the assembly, which would make no difficulty in amending it. But the king somewhat eagerly affixed his sanction, and it was thought that such precipitancy demonstrated a malevolent intention to drive things to the worst.

* Decree of the 12th July.

The object of the federation was to administer the civic oath. It was canvassed whether the federalists and the assembly should take it upon the hand of the king, or whether the king, in his character of first public functionary, should swear with all the others upon the altar of the country. The last mode was preferred. The assembly thus placed etiquette itself in harmony with the spirit of its laws, and the king ranked in the ceremony precisely as he stood in the constitution. The court, to which Lafayette was an object of perpetual suspicion, took alarm at a report then prevalent, according to which he was to be named commander of all the national guards of the kingdom. This suspicion was but natural, perhaps, in those who were not acquainted with Lafayette, and his enemies of all grades did their utmost to foster it. It was difficult, in fact, to be convinced that a man enjoying such boundless popularity, and at the head of so considerable a force, would not abuse the means at his disposal. And yet he had no desire to do so; he was resolved to be nothing but a citizen; and whether his moderation was the result of virtue or well-understood ambition, the merit is the same. The pride inseparable from human weakness will always have developement in some shape, and virtue consists in bending it to good. Lafayette, anticipating the apprehensions of the court, brought forward a motion that the same individual should not be competent to command the guard of more than one department. The resolution was passed with acclamations, and the self-denial of the general rewarded with heartfelt approbation. However, he was intrusted with all the arrangements for the festival, and named chief of the federation, in his character of commander of the Parisian guard.

The day approached, and the preparations were made with the greatest activity. The festival was appointed to be held in the Field of Mars, a vast space stretching between the Military Academy and the course of the Seine. The plan decided upon was to carry the earth from the middle of the field to the sides, so as to form an amphitheatre capable of holding the mass of spectators. Twelve thousand workmen laboured thereat without intermission, but fears began to be entertained that the work would not be accomplished by the 14th. The inhabitants thereupon determined to assist the workmen. In an instant the whole population was transformed into a body of labourers: priests, soldiers, men of all classes, assumed the shovel and the spade; even females in elegant apparel contributed their aid. The impulse soon became universal; the people proceeded to the works in sections, carrying banners of different colours, and cheered by the sounds of music. When they reached the field, they mingled promiscuously, and laboured in common. At nightfall, upon a given signal, each rejoined his section, and returned in procession to his own quarter. This pleasing union continued until the work was finished. During its progress, the federalists were continually arriving, and were received with the liveliest enthusiasm and the most engaging hospitality. A sincere joy, a general rapture prevailed, despite the sinister rumours which that small minority, who were inaccessible to such emotions, endeavoured to propagate. It was said that the brigands would seize the opportunity of the federation to pillage the town. The Duke of Orleans, also, who had just returned from London, was alleged to have some direful projects in contemplation. But the national gaiety was not to be disturbed, and all these malignant forebodings were disregarded.

The 14th at length arrived. All the federalist deputies from the provinces and the army, ranged under their banners, started from the site of the Bastille, and proceeded to the Tuileries. The deputies from Béarn, when passing along the street of the Ferronnerie, in which Henry IV. was assassinated, rendered a tribute of reverence for his memory, expressed, on so affecting an occasion, by shedding tears. When the federalists reached the garden of the Tuileries, they received into their ranks the municipality and the assembly. A body of youths, armed like their fathers, preceded the assembly; a group of old men followed it; thus recalling the ancient recollections of Sparta. The procession advanced, amidst the shouts and cheers of the people. The quays were covered with spectators, and the houses filled to the roofs. A bridge, constructed a few days before over the Seine, led by a way strewed with flowers from one bank to the other, and opened immediately upon the field of the federation. The procession traversed it, and each repaired to the place destined for him. A magnificent amphitheatre erected in the background was set apart for the national authorities. The king and the president were seated side by side, upon similar chairs, worked with fleurs-de-lis in gold. A balcony reared behind the king, contained the queen and the court. The ministers were at some distance from the king, and the deputies were ranged on each side. Four hundred thousand spectators filled the lateral amphitheatres; sixty thousand armed federalists performed their evolutions in the intermediate space; and in the midst arose, upon a base of twenty-five feet, the magnificent altar of the country. Three hundred priests, clad in white surplices and tricoloured scarfs, covered its steps, in readiness to celebrate mass.

The arrival of the federalists occupied three hours. During this period, the sky was obscured with dark clouds, and the rain fell in torrents. That sky, whose brightness harmonises so well with the buoyancy of human joy, refused at this eventful moment its serenity and its lustre. One of the arrived battalions laid down its arms and began to dance; all immediately followed the example, and in one short moment the whole intermediate field was pressed by sixty thousand men, soldiers and citizens, opposing vivacity and gaiety to the relentless storm. At length the ceremony commenced; the weather, by a happy chance, cleared up, and the sun shone in all his splendour upon the solemn spectacle. The Bishop of Autun began the mass; choristers accompanied the voice of the pontiff; cannon mingled its awful roar. The holy rite performed, Lafayette dismounted from his horse, ascended the steps of the throne, and awaited the orders of the king, who handed to him the formula of the oath. Lafayette carried it to the altar, and at that moment all the banners were waved, and all swords glanced in the air. The general, the army, the president, the deputies, exclaimed, "I swear!" The king, standing up and stretching his hand towards the altar, said; "I, King of the French, swear to use the power delegated to me by the constitutional act of the state, in maintaining the constitution decreed by the National Assembly and accepted by me." Whilst the king thus spoke, the queen, impelled by the general impulse, took in her arms the august infant, the heir to the throne, and, from the rails of the balcony in which she stood, showed him to the assembled nation. At this sight, rapturous shouts of satisfaction, love, and enthusiasm, were directed towards the mother and the child, and all hearts were theirs. It was at this very instant that all France, collected in the chief towns of the eighty-three departments, took the same oath to love the king who loved them. At such a time, hatred itself was softened, the exclusiveness of pride laid aside, and all were happy at the common bliss, and felt dignified in the common dignity. Alas! wherefore are the deep-seated pleasures of concord so soon forgotten?

* [M. Bertrand de Moleville seems to avow some such intention. "The king," says he, "fearing to weaken the manifest nullity of the sanction which he had been forced to give to all the decrees passed since the outrages of the 5th and 6th October, sanctioned also, on the 28th June, the decrees of the 19th, notwithstanding the entreaties of M. Necker, who wished the king not to assent to the decree degrading the nobility till he had offered his observations to the National Assembly. The council did not approve of that step, and were of opinion that the sanction should be pure and unqualified. M. Necker did not the less persist in his opinion, and made a display of his opposition to his colleagues by a memorial which he published with the king's consent."—Annals, vol. ii. p. 476.]

This august ceremony being completed, the procession re-formed and resumed its march, the people giving way to unequivocal expressions of delight. The rejoicings lasted several days. A general review of the federalists afterwards took place; sixty thousand men under arms presented a most imposing spectacle, at once military and national. In the evening, Paris gave an appropriate entertainment. The chief places of resort were the Champs-Elysées and the Bastille. Upon the site of that ancient prison, then converted into a square, was to be read this phrase, "Dancing here." Brilliant lustres, ranged in circlets, supplied the light of day. The rich had been prohibited from disturbing this peaceable fête by the use of carriages. Every one was to render himself of the people, and feel happy at being so. The Champs-Elysées presented a touching scene; a vast concourse in motion, without noise, or tumult, or rivalry, or discord. All classes, mixing freely together, promenaded under a soft artificial light, all hilarity and cheerfulness at the auspicious union. Thus, even in the heart of this our worn-out and selfish civilisation, the times of primitive fraternity seemed to have returned.

The federalists, after having witnessed the imposing aspect of the National Assembly in debate, the ceremonious pomp of the court, the magnificent wonders of Paris, and receiving ocular testimony of the virtues of the king, to whom they were all presented, and from whom they heard nothing but affecting expressions of benevolence, returned to their own homes in transports of rapture, and full of patriotic sentiments and illusions. After so many deplorable scenes, and when entering on so many still more terrible, the historian pauses with pleasure on these too fugitive hours, when all hearts beat with but one emotion, ardour for the public welfare.*

The festival of the federation, however imposing, left nevertheless but a transient emotion. The next day

* I have already quoted some passages from the Memoirs of Ferrières, relative to the opening sitting of the states-general. As nothing is more important than to verify the real sentiments which the revolution evoked in men, I feel called upon to give the description of the federation by that same Ferrières. By his words it may be judged whether the enthusiasm were genuine, whether it were communicative, and whether that revolution were so hideous as it has been represented.

"In the mean time the federalists arrived from all parts of the kingdom. They were received at private houses, the owners of which vied with each other in furnishing beds, linen, wood, and all that might contribute to render agreeable and comfortable their residence in the metropolis. The municipality took measures proper to prevent so great an influx of strangers disturbing public tranquillity. Twelve thousand labourers worked without ceasing on preparations in the Champ de Mars. However great the activity displayed, the work advanced but slowly. Fears were entertained that it could not be finished for the 14th July, the day irrevocably fixed for the ceremony, because it was the anniversary of the insurrection of Paris and the capture of the Bastille. In this predicament, the districts invited good citizens, in the name of the country, to assist the labourers. This civic invitation electrified the imaginations of all; women partook and propagated the enthusiasm; seminarists, scholars, nuns, monks, grown old in solitude, were seen to quit their cloisters and speed to the Champ de Mars, with spades on their shoulders, and bearing banners ornamented with patriotic emblems. There, all the citizens, promiscuously amalgamated, formed a vast and moving workshop, every point of which presented a varied group; the dishevelled courtesan strove by the side of the fastidious prude, the capuchin carried a bucket with the chevalier of St Louis, the porter with the exquisite of the Palais-Royal, the brawny fish-woman wheeled a barrow filled by the elegant and perfumed damsel; the rich, the indigent, the well-attired, the tattered, the old, the adolescent, players, Swiss-guards, clerks, at labour or at rest, actors or spectators, offered to the astonished eye a scene replete with life and animation; taverns moved on wheels, portable shops, increased the charm and gaiety of the vast and ravishing picture; songs, shouts of joy, the beating of drums, the clang of martial music, the noise of pickaxes and of wheelbarrows, the voices of the labourers calling to and encouraging each other—the soul felt oppressed beneath the weight of a delicious intoxication, at sight of a people actuated by the gentle emotions of a primitive fraternity. When nine o'clock struck, the groups separated. Each citizen repaired to the place where his section was stationed, and rejoined his family and his acquaintances. The bands began their march to the sound of drums, returned to Paris, preceded by torches, spouting from time to time sarcasms against the the aristocrats, and singing the famous Ca ira.

At length the 14th July, the day of the federation, arrived, amid the hopes of some, the alarms and terrors of others. If that great ceremony had not the serious and august character of a festival at once national and religious, a character almost irreconcileable with French feeling, it presented those agreeable and lively features of joy and enthusiasm which are a thousand times more touching. The federalists, drawn up by departments, under eighty-three banners, started from the site of the Bastille; the deputies from the army and the marines, the Parisian national guard, drums, bands of music, the flags of the sections, led and closed the march.

The federalists traversed the streets St Martin, St Denis, St Honoré, and proceeded by the Cours-la-Reine to a bridge of boats laid across the river. They were greeted on the way by the acclamations of an immense multitude, thronging the streets, the windows, and the quays. The rain, which fell in torrents, neither deranged nor stayed the procession. The federalists, steeped in rain and perspiration, danced farandolas, and shouted, 'Long live our brethren of Paris!' The spectators handed them from the windows wine, hams, fruit, sweetmeats, and loaded them with benedictions. The National Assembly joined the procession at the Place Louis XV., and took their station between the battalion of veterans and that of the young pupils of the country—an expressive idea, which seemed to unite with it all ages and all interests.

The road which conducted to the Champ de Mars was covered with people, who clapped their hands, and chanted the Ca ira. The quay de Chaillot and the heights of Passy presented a long amphitheatre, in which the elegance of form and apparel, the charms and the graces of the women, enchanted and bewildered the eye, allowing it no resting-place or excuse for preference. The rain continued to fall, but no one seemed to perceive it: French gaiety triumphed over the bad weather, the bad roads, and the fatiguing length of the march.

M. de Lafayette, mounted on a superb charger, and surrounded by his aides-de-camp, gave orders, and received the homage of the people and the federalists. Perspiration rolled down his visage. A man, whom none knew, pierced the crowd, and came forward, holding a bottle in one hand and a glass in the other: 'My general,' said he, 'you are warm—drink!' The man raised his bottle, filled a large glass, and presented it to M. de Lafayette. The general received the glass, looked at the unknown for a moment, and swallowed the wine at a draught. The people applauded. Lafayette cast a smile of complacence and confidence upon the multitude, seeming to express: 'I will never conceive any suspicion, I will never have any disquieting apprehensions, so long as I am in the midst of you.'

Meanwhile, more than three hundred thousand people, male and female, from Paris and the environs, congregated since six in the morning on the Champ de Mars, seated on steps of turf forming an immense circle, drenched, bespattered, opposing parasols to the watery torrent descending upon them, drying their dripping countenances on the least glimpse of sunshine, and adjusting their head-dresses, awaited with laughter and small-talk the federalists and the National Assembly. A vast amphitheatre had been erected for the king, the royal family, the ambassadors, and the deputies. The federalists who arrived first began to dance farandolas; those who followed joined in the passions were as urgent as the day before, and the war began again. Trifling disputes with the ministry recurred to keep the spirit of strife alive. Complaints were made that a passage had been allowed to the Austrian troops in their march to the district of Liege. Saint-Priest was accused of having connived at the flight of several persons accused of counter-revolutionary plots. The court, in return, had caused to be inscribed on the order of the day the proceedings commenced at the Châtelet against the authors of the 5th and 6th October. The Duke of Orleans and Mirabeau found themselves implicated therein. That singular inquisition, several times abandoned and resumed, gave palpable token of the various influences by which it had been instigated. It exhibited a huge contradictory mass of evidence, and warranted no charge of any weight against the two accused principals. The court, after concluding a reconciliation with Mirabeau, had not pursued any fixed plan regarding him. It evinced, by alternate starts, a disposition to approximate with or withdraw from him, and at the most, sought to silence him rather than to follow his counsels. In renewing the process concerning the 5th and 6th October, it was not he whom the court attacked, but the Duke of Orleans, who had been greatly applauded since his return from London, and whom it had harshly repulsed when he expressed a wish to regain the favour of the king.* Chabroud was appointed to draw up the report to the assembly, whereby it might judge whether or not there were grounds for an impeachment. The court desired that Mirabeau should preserve silence, and abandon the Duke of Orleans, against whom alone its rancour was excited. Nevertheless, he mounted the tribune, and showed how ridiculous were the imputations against him. He was accused of having apprised Mounier that Paris was marching on Versailles, and adding these words: "We must have a king, but it is of little moment whether he be Louis XVI. or Louis XVII!' likewise of having gone through the regiment of Flanders, sword in hand, and of exclaiming, on the sudden departure of the Duke of Orleans: "This —— is not worth the trouble that is taken about him." Nothing could be more childish than such complaints. Mirabeau did not fail to exhibit all their weakness and absurdity with his accustomed force; he said but a few words on the matter as it affected the Duke of amusement, and formed a ring which soon embraced a large portion of the Champ de Mars. Here was a spectacle worthy the philosophic observer—a prodigious crowd of men, from the most distant parts of France, moved by the impulse of the national character, banishing all remembrance of the past, all idea of the present, all fear of the future, giving way to a buoyant carelessness; and three hundred thousand spectators, of every age and sex, following their movements, beating time with their fingers, oblivious of the rain, of hunger, of the tedium of long expectation. At length, the entire procession having passed into the field, the dance ceased, and each federalist rejoined his standard. The Bishop of Autun prepared to celebrate mass at an altar of antique form, erected in the middle of the field. Three hundred priests, in white surplices, relieved by wide tri-coloured sashes, ranged themselves on the four sides of the altar. The Bishop of Autun pronounced a benediction on the Oriflamme and the eighty-three banners; then he chanted the Te Deum. Twelve hundred musicians executed this anthem. Lafayette, at the head of the staff of the Parisian militia and of the deputies from the army and navy, ascended the altar and swore, on behalf of the troops and the federalists, to be faithful to the nation, the law, and the king. A discharge of four pieces of ordnance announced this solemn oath to France. The twelve hundred musicians rent the air with martial tunes; the flags and banners waved; the drawn swords glittered in the sun. The president of the National Assembly repeated the same oath. The people and the deputies responded in shouts of 'I swear!' Then the king arose, and pronounced in a loud voice these words: 'I, King of the French, swear to use the power delegated to me by the constitutional act of the state, in maintaining the constitution decreed by the National Assembly and accepted by me.' The queen took the dauphin in her arms, presented him to the people, and said, 'Behold my son!—he joins, as well as myself, in those sentiments.' This unexpected proceeding was the signal for a thousand shouts of 'Long live the king! Long live the queen! Long live the dauphin!' The guns continued to mingle their majestic roar with the warlike strains of the military instruments and the acclamations of the people. The weather had cleared up; the sun shone in all his splendour; it seemed as if the Eternal himself desired to witness this mutual engagement, and ratify it by his sanction. Yes: He saw it! He heard it!—and the frightful evils which, since that day, have not ceased to desolate France, oh Providence, omniscient and just! are the merited punishments of perjury. Thou hast stricken both the monarch and the subjects who have violated their oaths!

The enthusiasm and rejoicings were not limited to the day of the federation. There was a continued series of feasts, balls, and amusements, during the stay of the federalists in Paris. The Champ de Mars was again visited by crowds, who there drank, and sang, and danced. M. de Lafayette reviewed a part of the national guard from the departments, and of the army of the line. The king, the queen, and the dauphin, were present at this review, and were hailed with acclamations. The queen, with a graceful air, presented her hand to be kissed by the federalists, and showed the dauphin to them. Before quitting the capital, the federalists went to pay their respects to the king; all testified towards him the profoundest reverence, the most perfect devotion. The leader of the Bretons kneeled and presented his sword to Louis XVI., saying to him—'Sire, I deliver to you the sword of your faithful Bretons, pure and unsullied; it will be stained only with the blood of your enemies.' 'This sword cannot be in better hands than in those of my beloved Bretons,' answered the king, raising the leader of the Bretons and returning him his sword; 'I have never doubted their love and fidelity; assure them that I am the father, the brother, the friend of all Frenchmen.' The king, greatly affected, pressed the hand of the Breton leader, and embraced him. A mutual emotion prolonged for some seconds this touching scene. The Breton first found words. 'Sire,' said he, 'all Frenchmen, if I judge them by our hearts, cherish you, and ever will cherish you, because you are a citizen king.'

The municipality of Paris likewise determined to give a fête to the federalists. There were aquatic contests on the river, fireworks, an illumination, a ball and supper in the corn-market, and a ball on the site of the Bastille. At the entrance to the enclosure were inscribed in large characters, 'Dancing here;' a happy motto, contrasting in a striking manner with the old ideas of horror and despair which the recollection of that odious prison suggested. The people moved to and fro from one scene of entertainment to the other, without annoyance or interruption. The police, by prohibiting the driving of carriages, prevented the accidents so common in public rejoicings, and also the tumultuous clatter of horses, wheels, and cries of 'Take care;' a noise which fatigues and stupifies the citizens, makes them fear every instant to be crushed, and gives the most brilliant and best-ordered festival the appearance of a flight. Public festivals are essentially for the people. It is they alone who ought to be attended to. If the rich wish to partake their pleasures, let them become part of the people on that day; they will imbibe unknown sensations, and not disturb the joy of their fellow-citizens.

It was at the Champs-Elysées that sentimental men enjoyed with the greatest satisfaction this delightful popular festival. Strings of lights hung on all the trees, garlands of small lamps connected them together, pyramids of flame, placed at regular distances, shed a clear brilliancy, which the towering mass of the surrounding gloom rendered more dazzling from contrast. The people filled the avenues and the lawns. The citizen, seated with his wife, and encompassed by his children, ate, talked, laughed, took a promenade, and exquisitely felt the charms of existence. Here were young girls and boys dancing to the music of several orchestras stationed on the slopes, which had been railed off for the purpose. A little farther, some sailors, in close jackets and drawers, surrounded by numerous groups, regarding them with curious interest, were endeavouring to climb up high poles rubbed with soap, to gain a prize awarded to him who should succeed in bringing away a tri-coloured flag affixed to the summit. It was worth hearing the shouts of laughter provoked by those who were compelled to abandon the enterprise, and the words of encouragement given to those who, with more skill or fortune, seemed likely to attain the object. A mild and contemplative cheerfulness, spread over all countenances, sparkling in all eyes, portrayed, as it were, the quiet bliss of happy shades in the Elysian fields of the ancients. The white garments of numberless females, meandering under the foliage of the avenues, served to strengthen the illusion."—Ferrières, vol. ii. p. 89.

* See the Memoirs of Bouillé.

Orleans, and exclaimed, as he concluded—"Yes! the secret of this infernal inquisition is at length discovered: it is altogether there (pointing to the right side); it is for behoof of those whose testimonies and calumnies have formed its groundwork; it is in the resources it has furnished to the enemies of the revolution; it is in the malevolence of judges, such as will be ere long marked in history by a just and implacable vengeance!"

Acclamations accompanied Mirabeau to his seat; the two inculpated persons were declared free from accusation by the assembly, and the court incurred the disgrace of an abortive enterprise.*

The principles of the revolution were destined to be universally developed, as well in the army as amongst the people. That army, the last prop of absolutism, was also the last object of alarm to the popular party. All the military officers were enemies of the revolution, because, having an exclusive right to rank and promotion, they perceived with disgust merit admitted to competition with them. By an opposite tendency, the soldiers were favourable to the new order of things, although, doubtless, hatred of discipline and expectation of increased pay, operated as powerfully upon them as the spirit of liberty. A dangerous insubordination was manifested throughout almost the entire army. The infantry especially, probably from its mingling more with the people, and having less military pride than the cavalry, was in a state of complete insurrection. Bouillé, seeing with grief his army slipping from his control, employed all possible means to stop this revolutionary contagion. He had received from Latour-du-Pin, minister of war, the most extensive powers, of which he took advantage to keep his troops perpetually shifting quarters, so as to prevent their forming familiar associations with the people, by long residence in the same place. He expressly prohibited them from attending clubs, and, in short, neglected no precaution to maintain military obedience. He himself, after a lengthened resistance, had ultimately taken the oath to the constitution; and as his honour was of the purest order, he appeared from that moment to have deliberately resolved to be faithful to the king and the constitution. His repugnance towards Lafayette, to whose disinterestedness he could not be insensible, was overcome, and he evinced greater readiness to unite with him. The national guards, in the vast district he commanded, had wished to nominate him their general; he had refused the offer in his earlier captiousness, and had afterwards cause for regret when he reflected upon the good he might have been enabled, by such a position, to have effected. In the mean time, in spite of certain denunciations at the clubs, Bouillé still held a high place in popular estimation.

The spirit of revolt displayed itself openly first at Metz. The soldiers imprisoned their officers, seized the flags and military chest, and even attempted to levy a contribution on the municipality. Bouillé exposed himself to the most imminent danger, and succeeded in repressing the sedition. Shortly afterwards, a similar revolt broke out at Nanci. Some Swiss regiments took part in it, and there were substantial grounds for fearing, if this example were followed, that the whole kingdom would soon be at the mercy, and delivered up a prey to the combined excesses, of the soldiery and the populace. The assembly itself trembled at the prospect. An officer was ordered to put in force the decree passed against the rebels. He was unable to procure its execution, and Bouillé received orders to march upon Nanci, in order that the power of the law might be vindicated. He had but a small body of soldiers upon whom he could implicitly rely. Fortunately, the troops formerly in revolt at Metz, feeling deeply humiliated that he did not venture to trust them, demanded to be led against the insurgents. The national guards likewise offered their services; and Bouillé advanced upon Nanci with these united forces, and a moderately numerous cavalry. His position was one of considerable embarrassment, because he could not bring his cavalry into effective action, and his infantry was not sufficient to attack the rebels aided by the populace. However, he addressed these infatuated men with great firmness, and succeeded in awing them into submission. They were on the point of laying down their arms, and leaving the town in conformity with his orders, when some shots were fired, from which side is unknown; and thereupon an engagement was inevitable. The troops under Bouillé, believing themselves exposed to treachery, fought with the greatest ardour; but an obstinate resistance was maintained, and they had to force their way step by step under a murderous fire. (31st August.) Master at last of the principal defences, Bouillé obtained the surrender of the regiments, and made them quit the town. He delivered from their incarceration the officers and magistrates, caused the ringleaders to be picked out, and handed them over to the National Assembly.

This success diffused a general joy, and lulled the fears that had been entertained for the tranquillity of the kingdom. Bouillé received from the king and the assembly congratulations and eulogies. At a subsequent period he was calumniated, and his conduct accused of cruelty. It was, nevertheless, quite irreproachable, and was universally applauded as such at the time. The king enlarged the limits of his command, which then became very considerable, for it reached from Switzerland to the Sambre, and comprehended the greatest portion of the frontier. Bouillé, placing greater reliance on cavalry than on infantry, chose for his cantonment the banks of the Seille, which falls into the Moselle; he had there wide plains to exercise his cavalry, forage to support it, places of sufficient strength to intrench behind, and above all, a scanty population to fear. He was determined not to attempt any thing against the constitution; but he was doubtful of the patriots, and took his measures for affording succour to the king if circumstances should render it necessary.

And now the assembly, having abolished the parliaments, instituted juries, and suppressed guilds, was preparing to make a new emission of assignats. The possessions of the clergy composing an enormous capital, and the assignats being the means by which that capital was made disposable, it was natural it should employ them. All the old objections were started with yet greater vehemence; the Bishop of Autun himself declared against this new issue, and foretold, with sagacious prescience, all the financial results of such a measure.* Mirabeau, looking principally at

* [It is amusing to read Bertrand's version of Mirabeau's speech on this occasion. He says: "Mirabeau then spoke and pleaded his own cause with the most arrogant confidence. According to him, the Châtelet and the witnesses were the only persons guilty in this affair, and he swore to pursue the authors of it to the grave. This blustering, as ridiculous as it was indecent, obtained the most lively applause. To overturn the depositions which accused him of having, at five in the afternoon of the 5th October, ran through the ranks of the regiment of Flanders, sword in hand, he referred to a deposition of a witness examined in the proceedings (De la Motte, 48th witness), who had said that the man seen in the ranks was M. de Gamaches, and that his person very much resembled Mirabeau's. He also adduced the testimony of M. de la Marck, a member of the assembly, at whose house he had passed the whole afternoon. 'Thus,' said he, 'all things being duly weighed and considered, the proceedings have in reality nothing unpleasant upon this head, but as they attack M. de Gamaches, who finds himself judicially and vehemently suspected of being very ugly, from his resemblance to me.' This expression, and that which I mentioned before, suffice to give a just idea of the style of Mirabeau's defence."—Annals, vol. iii. p. 116.]

* M. de Talleyrand (the Bishop of Autun) predicted in a very striking manner the financial consequences of the paper-money. In his speech on that question, he first enters into the nature its political results, argued strenuously for its adoption, and succeeded. Eight hundred millions of assignats were decreed, and upon this occasion it was decided that they should not bear interest. It was preposterous, in fact, to allow interest upon an actual currency. It may be granted upon obligations which cannot circulate, but remain idle in the hands of the possessor, for nothing can be more proper; but to attach it to issues which become veritable acquittances by their forced currency, was an error the assembly was not disposed to commit a second time. Necker opposed this new emission, and sent a memorial which was not listened to. Times were sadly changed for him; he was no longer the minister upon whose restoration to office the people rested their hopes of happiness but a year before. Wanting the confidence of the king, at war with all his colleagues, except Montmorin, he was disregarded by the assembly, and treated with less consideration than he certainly had a right to receive. The misfortune of Necker was his belief in the sufficiency of reason in all cases, and that its demonstration, with an admixture of sentiment and logic, must of necessity triumph over the mulish stubbornness of aristocrats and the heated passions of patriots. Necker possessed that intellect which, with a certain haughtiness, sits in judgment upon, and censures the delusions of, passion; but he was deficient in that more lofty and less vain intellect, which stops not short at censuring, but knows how to mould them to its own suggestions. Thus, thrown into the midst of violent parties, he fretted all, but never curbed. Left without friends by the secession of Mounier and Lally, he had preserved only the useless Malouet. He had irritated the assembly, by perpetually and reproachfully reminding it of the most embarrassing of all its cares, that of the finances; and he had furthermore incurred much ridicule by the manner in which he spoke of himself. His resignation was hailed with pleasure by all parties.* His carriage was arrested on the frontiers by that same people who had formerly drawn it in triumph, and an order of the assembly was required to procure him liberty to proceed into Switzerland. It was immediately granted; and he retired to Coppet, to contemplate at a distance a revolution which he was more fitted to observe than lead.†

The ministry was reduced to a nullity as complete as the king himself, and devoted itself, as the extent of that money, characterises it with admirable precision, and unfolds the reasons of its early depreciation.

"Will the assembly order," said he, "an emission of two thousand millions of assignats? You judge of this second emission by the success of the first; but you close your eyes to the fact that the wants of commerce, slackened by the revolution, were calculated to have quickly absorbed our first conventional currency; and those wants were such, that, in my opinion, commerce would have adopted that medium of circulation even had it not been forced. To adduce this first success, which, after all, has not been complete, since the assignats are losing value, in favour of a second and much larger emission, is a course full of delusion and danger; for the empire of the law has its limits, and those limits are expressed by the interest which men have to respect or infringe it.

The assignats will unquestionably possess characteristics of safety which no paper-money ever previously possessed; none has ever been founded upon a pledge equally valuable, invested with an hypothecation of equal solidity; all this I am far from denying. The assignat, considered as an obligation of debt, has a positive and material value; that value being precisely the same as that of the domain it represents; but at the same time it must be borne in mind that no national paper ever circulated on a par with specie; the secondary emblem of the original representative emblem of wealth can never have the precise value of its model; the very obligation confesses the exigency, and exigency bears alarm and distrust as inherent concomitants.

Why will the paper-money always be below the precious metals in value? In the first place, because doubts will always exist as to the exact relation between the mass of assignats and that of the national domains; because there will be a protracted uncertainty as to the consummation of sales; because it is not to be predicated when two thousand millions of assignats, representing nearly the value of the domains, will be cancelled; because, specie being brought into competition with paper, both the one and the other become merchandise, and the more abundantly an article of merchandise is supplied, the more it sinks in price; because with specie it will be always possible to dispense with assignats, whilst it will be impossible with assignats to do without specie; and fortunately the absolute occasion for specie will preserve some portion in circulation, for the most dreadful of all evils would be its complete disappearance."

The orator subsequently added:

"The creation of an assignat currency is assuredly not to supply an equivalent for an intrinsically valuable commodity, but simply a substitute for a metallic currency. Now, a substance invested with the character of money cannot, whatever ideas may be attached to it, represent that which is at once money and commodity. An assignat currency, therefore, however safe, however solid it may be, is an abstraction of the metallic currency; it is but the free or enforced emblem, not of wealth, but simply of credit. It follows, as a necessary deduction, that to give paper the functions of money, by rendering it, like other convertible mediums, an agent for all operations of exchange, is to alter the quantity recognised as unity, or, as it is called in this matter, the standard of value; it is to effect in a moment what ages scarcely effect in a state gathering wealth; and if, to borrow the expression of a learned foreigner, money performs the same functions with regard to the value of commodities as degrees, minutes, and seconds, with regard to angles, or scales with regard to geographical charts or plans of any sort, I ask, what must be the result of this alteration in the common standard?"

After having shown the nature of this new currency, M. de Talleyrand foretells, with singular precision, the confusion that must ensue from it in private transactions:—

"But let us follow the assignats in their progress, and see what course they are destined to describe. The creditor thus paid will have to purchase domains with his assignats, or he will keep them, or he will employ them in other objects of acquisition. If he buys domains, then your views will be accomplished; and I will join you in applauding the creation of assignats, because they will not be forced into circulation—because, in fact, they will have merely effected what I propose you should give the public obligations, the faculty of being exchanged for the public domains. But if this creditor, in his distrust, prefers to lose interest by retaining an unproductive obligation; if he converts assignats into specie to hoard, or into foreign bills to transport; if instances of the latter operations should be more numerous than of the first; if, in a word, the assignats linger long in the circulation before falling into the exchequer to be cancelled; if they come forcibly and remain in the hands of men obliged to receive them at par, and who, owing nothing, can only make use of them at a sacrifice; if they are the cause of a great injustice perpetrated by all debtors towards former creditors, in paying assignats at the exchangeable value of specie, whilst they belie the amount they express, as it will be impossible to compel venders to take them at the metallic par, or, in other words, without raising the price of their articles on account of the depreciation of assignats—how much in such cases will this ingenious operation deceive the patriotism of those whose sagacity has conceived it, and whose sincere conviction upholds it; and to what inconsolable regrets shall we not be condemned?"

It cannot, therefore, be said that the Constituent Assembly was completely in the dark as to the possible consequences of its measures; but to these warnings one of those answers might have been opposed which are never hazarded at the moment, but which would be decisive, and which become so in the end; this answer was necessity—the necessity of providing for financial exigencies, and of dividing the national domains.

* [Necker resigned on the 4th September.]

† ["Necker, whom the recollection of his old ascendancy perpetually haunted, addressed memorials to the assembly, in which he combated its decrees, and complacently offered his advice. That minister could not accommodate himself to a secondary part; he refused to follow the expeditious plans of the assembly, which were so diametrically opposed to his ideas of successive reforms. At length, convinced or weary of the inutility of his exhortations, Necker departed from Paris, after giving in his resignation on the 4th September 1790, and he passed in obscurity through those provinces which a year before he had traversed as a triumphant hero. In revolutions men are easily forgotten, because the people have many before their eyes, and numberless events are crowded into little time—people live quick at such eras."—Mignet, vol. i. p. 140.]

Drawn by J. D. Harding from a Sketch by W. Page

of its action, to intrigues either useless or culpable. Saint-Priest corresponded with the emigrants; Latour-du-Pin gave way to all the desires of the military leaders; and Montmorin, enjoying the esteem of the court, had none of its confidence, and was employed in intrigues with the chief popular deputies, with whom his moderation brought him in relation. The ministers were all denounced on the occasion of fresh outbreaks. "I likewise," exclaimed Cazalès, "would denounce them, if it were generous to attack men so thoroughly weak; I would accuse the minister of finances for not having explained to the assembly the veritable resources of the kingdom, and for not taking measures to direct a revolution which he had incited; I would accuse the minister at war for having suffered the army to fall into disorganisation, and the minister of the interior for not having made the king's orders be obeyed—all of them, in short, for their utter incompetence, and their treacherous counsels to the king." Inertness is a high crime in the eyes of parties eager to attain their object; and accordingly the right side condemned the ministers, not for what they had done, but for what they had left undone. And yet Cazalès and his party, though overwhelming them with reproaches, opposed an address to the king for their removal, for they regarded it as an invasion of the royal prerogative. This dismissal was not demanded, but they successively gave in their resignations, except Montmorin, who alone maintained his office. Duport-du-Tertre, a simple advocate, was appointed keeper of the seals. Duportail, recommended to the king by Lafayette, replaced Latour-du-Pin in the war department, and exhibited a more favourable bias towards the popular party. One of the measures he took was to deprive Bouillé of the uncontrolled license he permitted himself in his command, and particularly of the power to displace the troops at his own will—a power much exercised by Bouillé, as we have already observed, to prevent the soldiers from fraternising with the people.

The king had pondered deeply on the history of the English Revolution. The fate of Charles I. had always particularly affected him, and he could not divest himself of certain gloomy presentiments. He had especially reflected that the motive for the condemnation of Charles was his having excited civil war. He had thus contracted an invincible repugnance for all measures calculated to provoke the effusion of blood; and had constantly opposed all the projects for flight suggested by the queen and the court.

During the summer of 1790, passed at St Cloud, he might have fled, but he was always disinclined to hear the proposal mooted. The friends of the constitution were as apprehensive as he of a measure which seemed certain to result in civil war. The aristocrats alone were strenuous for its adoption, because they flattered themselves that, rendered masters of the king by his removal from the assembly, they would govern in his name, and return with him at the head of a foreign army, little reflecting that they would but follow in its train. The aristocrats were possibly accompanied in their wishes by certain minds more rapid in conclusions, which already began to consider the feasibility of a republic, a thing as yet unthought of; the name of which had never been mentioned, unless by the queen in her passionate gusts against Lafayette and the assembly, whom she was wont to accuse of aiming at that object with all their might. Lafayette, as leader of the constitutional force, and of all the sincere friends of rational liberty, watched with unremitting zeal over the person of the monarch. The two ideas, the withdrawal of the king and civil war, had been so intimately associated in all minds from the commencement of the revolution, that the first event was universally regarded as the harbinger of the greatest calamity that can befall a nation.

However, the dismissal of the ministry, which, if it had not possessed the confidence of Louis XVI., was at least his own choice, irritated him against the assembly, and raised fears in his mind of the complete prostration of the executive power. The fresh debates on religion, which the hypocrisy of the clergy originated on the subject of their civil constitution, alarmed his timorous conscience, and serious thoughts of flight began to occupy his imagination. Towards the end of 1790, he wrote respecting it to Bouillé, who at first opposed the measure, but afterwards yielded, lest his zeal might seem suspicious to the unfortunate monarch. Mirabeau, on his part, had formed a plan for sustaining the cause of the monarchy. Although in constant communication with Montmorin, he had hitherto attempted nothing of serious moment, because the court, vacillating between foreign aid and the emigration on one hand, and the national party on the other, was really not disposed to be precipitate; and, perhaps, of all measures, feared that most which should submit it to a master so sincerely constitutional as Mirabeau. Nevertheless, it was upon a perfectly good understanding with him at this period. Every thing was promised him if he were successful, and all available resources were placed at his disposition. Talon, civil-lieutenant at the Châtelet, and Laporte, recently installed near the king's person as administrator of the civil list, had orders to communicate with him and aid in the execution of his plans. Mirabeau condemned the new constitution. For a monarchy it was, in his opinion, too democratical; and for a republic, there was one thing too much—a king. The popular agitation especially, which was always on the increase, operated on his mind, and he determined to arrest it. At Paris, against the sway of the multitude, and of an all-powerful assembly, no enterprise was feasible. He saw but one resource, which was to remove the king from Paris and fix him at Lyons. There the king would explain his views; he would energetically proclaim the reasons which induced him to condemn the new constitution, and would publish another, which was already framed. At the same moment, a first legislature would be convoked. Mirabeau, in corresponding by letter with the most popular members, had artfully succeeded in drawing from them all a disapproval of some particular provision in the actual constitution. By putting together these different avowals, the entire constitution was found to be condemned by its very authors.* He purposed appending them to the king's manifesto, in order to give it greater weight, and to demonstrate more fully the necessity for a new constitution. We are ignorant of all his means of execution; we are only aware that, through the police of Talon, the civil lieutenant, he had gained pamphleteers, and club and street orators; and that, through his extensive correspondence, he had reason to feel sure of thirty-six departments in the south. He unquestionably intended to avail himself of Bouillé's assistance, but he would not place himself at the mercy of that general. Whilst Bouillé was encamped at Montmedy, he designed that the king should remain at Lyons; and he himself, according to circumstances, would station himself at Paris or Lyons. A foreign prince, the friend of Mirabeau, saw Bouillé on the king's part, and communicated to him this project, but without the knowledge of Mirabeau,* who never thought of a retreat to Montmedy, whither the king subsequently proceeded. Bouillé, struck with the genius evinced by Mirabeau, declared that nothing should be omitted to make sure of such a man, and that, so far as he was concerned, he was ready to second him with all his power.

* It was not possible that, in a work collectively composed by a great number of individuals, there should be perfect uniformity of opinion. As unanimity prevailed only upon very few points, it follows that each article must have been disapproved by those who voted against it. Thus every clause in the constitution of 1791 must have had disapprovers amongst the very authors of that constitution; but, nevertheless, the whole was their real and incontestible work. What happened in this instance is inevitable as regards every deliberative body, and Mirabeau's manœuvre was but a trick. It may be even said that there was little honour in such a proceeding; but great allowances must be made for a powerful and reckless being, whom the morality of the end rendered very indifferent as to that of the means; I say designedly the morality of the end, for Mirabeau sincerely believed in the necessity of a modified constitution; and although his ambition, and his petty personal rivalries, greatly contributed to alienate him from the popular party, he was sincere in his detestation of anarchy. Others besides him feared the court and the aristocracy more than the people. Thus on all sides there were, according to positions, different apprehensions; and as genuine conviction changes with points of view, morality, that is to say, sincerity, is found equally in the most opposite parties.

M. de Lafayette was unacquainted with this project. Although he was sincerely devoted to the person of the king, he enjoyed not the confidence of the court, and besides, he was viewed with envy by Mirabeau, who had no intention of giving himself such a comrade. Furthermore, M. de Lafayette was known to be favourable only to a straight course, and this plan was too unscrupulous, too apart from legal ways, to suit him. However, whether this were so or not, Mirabeau was determined to be the sole executor of his own plan, and, in fact, he conducted it quite alone during the winter of 1790-91. It is impossible to decide whether he would have succeeded; but it is certain that, although incapable of turning back the revolutionary torrent, he would at least have influenced its direction, and assuredly, without changing the inevitable result of a revolution such as the French, he would have modified its events by his powerful opposition. We may still be allowed to doubt whether, if he had succeeded in controlling the popular party, he would have been enabled to render himself master of the aristocracy and the court. One of his friends suggested to him this latter objection. "They have promised me all," said Mirabeau. "And if they should not keep their word?" "If they break their word, I will blow them into a republic."

The principal articles of the civil constitution of the clergy, such as the new limitations of dioceses, and the election of all the ecclesiastical functionaries, had been decreed. The king had referred them to the pope, who, after returning an answer in a mixed tone of severity and paternal mildness, had remitted the determination to the clergy of France. The clergy took advantage of this appeal, and raised a cry that the spiritual authority was compromised by the measures of the assembly. At the same time, they disseminated mandates, and declared that the deposed bishops would not retire from their sees unless by constraint and force; that they would hire houses and continue their ecclesiastical functions; and that those who remained true to their faith should attend only to them. The clergy prosecuted their intrigues especially in La Vendée, and in certain departments of the south, where they acted in concert with the emigrants. A federative camp was formed at Jallez,† where, under the alleged pretext of federations, the pretended federalists designed to establish a centre of opposition to the measures of the assembly. The popular party was greatly exasperated at these plots; and, resolute in its power, weary of its moderation, it determined to adopt a decisive step. We have already seen what motives influenced it in the enactment of the civil constitution. The authors of that constitution were the most sincere Christians in the assembly; and these, provoked at so unjust an opposition, resolved to vanquish it.

It has been already stated that an express decree obliged all public functionaries to take an oath to the new constitution. When the question concerning this civic oath was discussed, the clergy had strenuously laboured to establish a distinction between the political and the ecclesiastical constitution; nor had they stopped at that point. In the present case, the assembly resolved to exact a rigorous oath from the ecclesiastics, which should place them under the necessity either of retiring if they declined to take it, or of faithfully performing their pastoral functions if they took it. The assembly was careful to declare that it compassed no violence to consciences; that it would pay all respect to those who, believing that religion was injured by the new laws, were indisposed to take the oath; but that it was anxious to ascertain who were imbued with such ideas, in order that it might avoid intrusting to them the new bishoprics. In this respect, its declarations were just and candid. It subjoined to the decree, that those who refused to swear should be deprived of their functions and stipends; and furthermore, as an example to others, that all ecclesiastics who were deputies should take the oath in the assembly itself, within eight days after the sanction of the act.

The right side opposed the measure: Maury gave way to frantic violence, and laboured diligently to stimulate interruptions to his harangue, so that he might have grounds for publishing complaints. Alexander Lameth, who occupied the chair, preserved order whilst he spoke, and deprived him of the pleasure of being driven from the tribune. Mirabeau defended the assembly with greater eloquence than ever. "You," he exclaimed, "persecutors of religion! You who have paid it so noble and affecting an homage in the most illustrious of your decrees! you who consecrate to its service a public grant, when your justice and prudence rendered you so watchful of economy! you who have brought religion to interfere in the division of the kingdom, and who have planted the sign of the cross on the boundaries of all the departments! you, in fine, who acknowledge that God is as necessary to men as liberty!"

The assembly decreed the oath.* The king immediately referred it to the pope. The Archbishop of Aix, who had originally opposed the civil constitution, feeling now the urgent necessity for a pacification, joined the king and some of his more moderate colleagues in earnestly soliciting the pope to grant his consent. The emigrants at Turin, and the recusant bishops of France, wrote to Rome in an entirely opposite strain; and his holiness, under divers pretexts, withheld his determination. The assembly, irritated at these studied delays, insisted upon having the king's sanction; and he, though prepared to yield, put in use the ordinary devices of imbecility. He wished to have himself constrained, so as to appear acting without freedom. Consequently, he awaited a riot, and then hastened to give his sanction. The decree thus made law, the assembly resolved to put it into execution, and accordingly called upon its ecclesiastical members to take the oath within its walls. Then men and women, whose previous lives had manifested but a small regard for religion, suddenly commenced a movement to provoke the refusal of the ecclesiastics.†

* Bouillé, in his Memoirs, seems of opinion that it was on the part both of Mirabeau and the king that overtures were made to him. But it is a mistake. Mirabeau was ignorant of this double plot, and never thought of putting himself into the hands of Bouillé.

† This camp was formed in the early days of September.

* Decree of the 27th November.

† Ferrières, an eye-witness of the intrigues of this period, relates those which were employed to prevent the oath of the priests. This account appears to me too characteristic not to be quoted.

"The bishops and the revolutionists agitated and intrigued, some to promote the taking of the oath, others to prevent its being taken. The two parties were sensible of the influence which the conduct pursued by the ecclesiastics in the assembly would have in the provinces. The bishops became on intimate terms with their clergy; devotees of both sexes were in active motion. Conversation in all societies turned only on the oath of the priests. It might have been thought that the destiny of France and the fate of all its inhabitants depended on the priestly adjuration or non-adjuration. Men of the greatest latitude in their religious opinions, women the most notorious for their dissolute manners,

Certain bishops and incumbents took the oath. The greater number resisted, with an affected resignation and an alleged attachment to principles. The assembly not the less persisted in the nomination of new bishops and incumbents, and was energetically aided by the departmental administrations. The old ecclesiastical functionaries had full liberty to celebrate worship where they chose, but those who were recognised by the state took possession of the churches. The dissenters hired the church of the Théatins at Paris to pursue their exercises. The assembly did not interfere, and the national guards protected them as much as possible against the fury of the populace, who were not always disposed to allow them the tranquil exercise of their isolated ministrations.

The assembly has been condemned for having occasioned this schism, and for having added a new cause of division to those which existed before. Now, first, with regard to its functions, it must appear evident to every impartial mind that the assembly did not exceed them when it legislated upon the temporalities of the church. Next, with regard to considerations of prudence, it assuredly added but partially to the difficulties of its position. And in fact, the court, the nobility, and the clergy, had lost, and the people gained, enough to become irreconcileable enemies, and for the revolution to take its inevitable course, even without the consequences of the new schism. Besides, when all abuses were destroyed, could the assembly suffer those of the old ecclesiastical organisation? Could it sanction lazy prelates living in abundance, whilst the really useful pastors had scarcely common necessaries?*

suddenly became austere theologians and ardent vindicators of the purity and integrity of the Roman faith. The Journal de Fontenay, the Ami du Roi, and the Gazette de Durosoir, employed their ordinary weapons, exaggeration, falsehood, calumny. A legion of pamphlets was disseminated, in which the civil constitution of the clergy was treated as schismatical, heretical, and destructive to religion. The devotees hawked these writings from house to house; they prayed, entreated, threatened, according to different feelings and characters. They showed to some the clergy triumphant, the assembly routed, the perjured ecclesiastics despoiled of their benefices, and shut up in houses of correction; and, on the other hand, the faithful ecclesiastics covered with glory, loaded with riches. The pope, said they, was about to hurl his thunders upon a sacrilegious assembly and upon apostate priests. The people, deprived of the sacraments, would rise, foreign powers would enter France, and this edifice of iniquity and abominations would crumble on its own foundations."—Ferrières, vol. ii. p. 198.

* ["In its desire to dissolve this clerical league, the assembly unwittingly strengthened it. If it had left the malecontent priests to themselves, regardless of their fumes, they would have failed in their machinations to rake up the elements of a religious war. But the assembly decreed that all ecclesiastics should swear fidelity 'to the nation, the law, and the king,' and to maintain the civil constitution of the clergy. The refusal to take the oath was to be followed by the dismissal of the incumbents from their sees or benefices. The assembly expected that the dignified clergy, from self-interest, and the inferior clergy, from ambition, would yield to this measure. The bishops, on the other hand, anticipated that the whole ecclesiastical body would follow their example, and that if they refused to swear, they would leave the state without religious worship, and the people without ghostly comfort. The result was in accordance with the ideas of neither party. The majority of the bishops and priests in the assembly refused the oath, but some bishops and many priests took it. The dissenting incumbents were deprived, and the electors named successors to them, who received canonical institution from the Bishops of Autun and Lida. But the deprived ecclesiastics refused to surrender their functions, and proclaimed their successors intruders, the sacraments administered by them of no avail, and such Christians as ventured to recognise them under excommunication. They remained steadfast in their dioceses, issued mandates, and excited disobedience to the laws within them; and thus a mere affair of temporal interest became first of all an affair of religion, and afterwards one of party. There were thenceforth two orders of clergy, the constitutional and the refractory; and they had each their sectaries, and stigmatised each other as rebels and heretics. Religion became, according to the passions and interests of parties, an instrument or an incumbrance; and if the priests made fanatics, the revolutionists made infidels. The people, whom that evil of the upper classes had not previously infected, abandoned, especially in the towns, the faith of their fathers, on account of the imprudence of those who forced them to choose between the revolution and their creed. 'The bishops,' says the Marquis de Ferrières, whose censure cannot be suspected, 'refused to listen to any arrangements; and by their culpable intrigues blocked up every avenue to conciliation, sacrificing the Catholic religion to an insane obstinacy and a disgraceful love of riches.' "—Mignet, vol. i. pp. 143, 144.]

CHAPTER VI.

PROGRESS OF THE EMIGRATION—DEATH OF MIRABEAU—FLIGHT OF THE KING, AND HIS CAPTURE—DECLARATION OF PILNITZ—TERMINATION OF THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY.

THE long and final struggle between the national party and the privileged order of the clergy, the principal circumstances of which we have just related, resulted in an universal discord. Whilst the clergy stirred up the provinces of the west and the south, the refugees at Turin made various demonstrations, which their weakness and divisions rendered futile. A conspiracy was attempted at Lyons. The arrival of the princes was announced, and a profuse distribution of largesses; promises were even made that Lyons should become the capital of the kingdom, instead of Paris, which had deserved so ill of the court. The king was informed of these intrigues, and not very sanguine of their success, perhaps not too anxious for it; since he might rationally despair of controlling the victorious aristocracy, he did all he could to defeat them. This conspiracy was unmasked at the end of 1790, and its principal agents delivered over to the tribunals. This last reverse decided the emigrants to remove from Turin to Coblentz, where they established themselves in the territory of the Elector of Treves, to the no small diminution of his authority, which they entirely usurped. We have already seen that the members of the nobility in emigration were divided into two parties; the one (comprising old servants, feeding on bounty, and composing what was called the court, who were not at all inclined to grant a participation of influence to the provincial nobility, even whilst they accepted their aid) regarded the appeal to foreigners as the only feasible resource; the other, formed of men who relied more upon their own swords, looked to a rising in the southern provinces, by stimulating fanaticism, as the advisable course to be pursued. The first party prevailed, and a move to Coblentz ensued, where, upon the northern frontier, the march of the powers was awaited. It was in vain that those who desired to combat in the south had insisted upon the expediency of calling to their aid Piedmont, Switzerland, and Spain, faithful and disinterested allies, and of leaving in the immediate neighbourhood of those powers some distinguished leader. The aristocracy which Calonne ruled would not listen to them. That aristocracy had not changed on quitting France; frivolous, haughty, incapable, and prodigal, at Coblentz as at Versailles, it made its vices only the more prominent amid the difficulties of exile and civil war. "You need burgher in your commissions," it answered to those intrepid men who offered to fight in the south, and who asked under what title they were to serve.* Only some

* M. Froment relates the following fact in his work already quoted:—

"Under these circumstances, the princes projected the formation in the interior of the kingdom, as early as they could effect it, of legions composed of all the faithful subjects of the king, to be used until the troops of the line were entirely re-organised. Desirous of being at the head of the royalists whom I had directed and commanded in 1789 and 1790, I wrote to the Count d'Artois, to entreat his royal highness to grant me a commission of lieutenant-colonel, framed in such terms that every royalist who, like me, should collect under his orders a sufficient number of subaltern agents were left at Turin, who, a prey to mutual jealousies, passed their time in recriminations and thwarting every chance of success. The Prince of Condé, who seemed to have inherited all the energy of his race, was not in favour with a certain portion of the nobility; he stationed himself near the Rhine, with all those who, like himself, were more disposed to fight than intrigue.

The emigration became every day more considerable, and the roads were covered with nobles, who seemed to think they fulfilled a sacred duty in flying to take arms against their country. Women even thought it necessary to testify their abhorrence of the revolution by abandoning the soil of France. In a nation where every thing is done by impulse, emigration became the rage; farewells were scarcely taken, so prevalent was the idea that the journey would be short, and the return speedy. The revolutionists of Holland, betrayed by their general and abandoned by their allies, had succumbed in a few days; those of Brabant had not held out much longer; consequently, according to the deductions of these short-sighted emigrants, the French revolution was sure to be subdued in one short campaign, and absolute power flourish once more over enslaved France.

The assembly, more irritated than alarmed at their presumption, had projected measures, but they had always been postponed. The king's aunts, finding their consciences troubled at Paris, deemed it essential to seek salvation under the wing of the pope. They departed for Rome (19th February 1791), and were stopped on the route by the municipality of Arnay-le-Duc. The people immediately flocked to the residence of Monsieur, who was said to be on the eve of flight. Monsieur came forward, and promised not to abandon the king. The people were satisfied, and the assembly entered into deliberation upon the departure of the king's aunts. A long debate ensued, which Menou terminated by a witty remark: "Europe," said he, "will be much astonished, when it learns that an august assembly has consumed several days in deciding whether two old women should hear mass at Rome or at Paris." The committee on the constitution, however, was instructed to present a law as to the residence of public functionaries and as to emigration. This decree, adopted after violent discussions, obliged public functionaries to reside in the seat of their functions. The king, as the highest of all, was bound not to remove from the legislative body during each session, and at all other times not to go beyond the limits of the kingdom. In case of this law being violated, the penalty upon all functionaries was deprivation. A separate decree upon emigration was left to the committee.

In the mean time, the king, unable any longer to endure the constraint that was imposed upon him, and the reductions of power that the assembly forced from him, above all, having terrors upon his conscience since the last decrees touching the priests, had determined to fly. The whole winter had been devoted to preparations; the zeal of Mirabeau was stimulated —he was loaded with promises if he succeeded in placing the royal family at liberty, and on his own part he prosecuted his plan with the greatest activity.

Lafayette had recently quarrelled with the Lameths. They found him too steady in his attention to the court; and as his integrity was not to be suspected, like that of Mirabeau, they reproached him with want of intellect, and with allowing himself to be grossly played upon. The enemies of the Lameths, on the other hand, accused them of envying Lafayette's military power, as they had envied Mirabeau's oratorical power. The brothers coalesced, or appeared to coalesce, with the friends of the Duke of Orleans; and it was alleged that they desired to obtain for one of them the command of the national guard. It was Charles Lameth who had the ambition to aspire to it, as was said; and to this cause were attributed the perpetually recurring difficulties henceforth raised in the path of Lafayette.

On the 28th February, the populace, stimulated by the emissaries of the Duke of Orleans, as was alleged, proceeded to the castle of Vincennes, which the municipality had prepared for the reception of prisoners, who were growing somewhat too numerous for the jails of Paris. This castle was attacked as a new Bastille. Lafayette reached the scene in good time, and afterwards dispersed the faubourg Saint-Antoine, headed by Santerre, flocking to that expedition. Whilst he re-established order in that part of Paris, difficulties of another kind were preparing for him at the Tuileries. Upon the report of a riot, many of the frequenters of the palace had resorted thither, to the number of some hundreds. They bore concealed arms, such as hunting-knives and poniards. The national guard, at a loss to account for this sudden concourse, deemed it suspicious, and accordingly disarmed and maltreated some of those men. Lafayette arrived, cleared the palace, and took possession of the weapons seized. Rumours of the occurrence soon spread; it was said that men bearing daggers had been found, hence they were afterwards called "Knights of the Dagger." They asserted, on their part, that they had attended at the palace merely to defend the king's person, which was threatened. They were reproached with a design to carry him off; and, as usual, the event was terminated by mutual calumnies. This day displayed the actual position of Lafayette. It was made more palpable than ever, that, placed between extreme parties, his functions were to protect both the king's person and the constitution. His twofold victory augmented at once his popularity, his influence, and the hatred of his enemies. Mirabeau, who is open to censure for instigating the suspicions of the court respecting him, represented this conduct as profoundly hypocritical. Under the mask of moderation and of resistance to all parties, it tended, according to his version, to usurpation. In his ill humour, he stigmatised the Lameths also as traitors and fools, in league with Orleans, and commanding scarcely thirty partisans in the assembly. As to the right side, he declared it was impossible to make any thing of it, and that he relied altogether upon the three or four hundred members who were free from party ties, and always prepared to decide upon the impressions which he conveyed at the moment by his reason and eloquence.

The only true points in these representations were his estimate of the respective strength of parties, and his opinion upon the means of directing the assembly. He exercised control over it, in fact, by swaying all who had no positive engagements. That very day, the 28th February, he evinced, almost for the last loyal citizens to compose a legion, might flatter himself with obtaining the same rank. The Count d'Artois approved of my suggestion, and listened favourably to my request; but the members of the council were not of his opinion; they thought it so strange that a burgher should pretend to a military commission, that oné of them said to me with disdain, 'Why don't you ask for a bishopric?' I replied to the speaker by a burst of laughter, which somewhat disconcerted his gravity. However, the question was again debated at M. de Flaschlanden's; the deliberators were of opinion that these legions should be called burgher legions. I observed to them, 'that under this denomination they would simply organise national guards; that the princes would be unable to make them march wherever necessity called, because they would allege they were only bound to defend their own hearths; that it was to be apprehended the factious might succeed in sowing discord between them and the troops of the line; that with empty phrases they had roused the people against the depositaries of public authority; that it would be, therefore, more politic to follow their example, and to give those new regiments the denomination of royal militia; that'—— time, his empire, signalised his hatred against the Lameths, and brought all his formidable powers to bear upon them.

The Bishop of Arras, roughly interrupting me, said, 'No, no, sir, it is fitting you should have burgher in your commission;' and the Baron de Flaschlanden, who drew it out, inserted the word burgher."—Collection of various Documents relative to the French Revolution, p. 62.

The law respecting emigration was appointed for discussion. Chapelier presented it, as the reporter of the committee. That committee partook, he said, the general indignation against those Frenchmen who abandoned their country; but after several days' consideration, it had come to the conclusion that it was impossible to frame a law upon emigration. There is no doubt that many difficulties opposed the passing of such a law. It was necessary to settle, first of all, whether any right existed for pinning men, as it were, to the soil. If the safety of the country demanded such a measure, it was unquestionably just and expedient; but then the motives of travellers would require to be ascertained, a process involving a species of inquisition; it would be also necessary to determine their quality, whether of Frenchmen or foreigners, of emigrants or simple commercial wayfarers. A law upon the subject was therefore very difficult, if not altogether impossible. Chapelier added, that the committee, in obedience to the assembly, had nevertheless framed one, which, if it were wished, he would then read, but he declared beforehand that it violated every fundamental principle. "Read"—"Don't read"—resounded from all quarters. A number of deputies attempted to speak. Mirabeau demanded to be heard in his turn, obtained the right, and, what was of more consequence, imposed silence. He read a very eloquent letter, formerly addressed to Frederick-William, in which he asserted the liberty to emigrate as one of the most sacred rights of men, who, not being rooted to the earth, were held in attachment to it by happiness alone. To gratify the court, perhaps, but more especially from conviction, he rejected as tyrannical every measure against the freedom of locomotion. Doubtless, this freedom was abused at that moment; but the assembly, relying upon its strength, had disregarded so many outrages of the press perpetrated on itself, had stood the shock of so many futile conspiracies, and had so victoriously repelled them all by mere contempt, that a continuance in the same course was eminently advisable. Mirabeau's opinion was applauded, but it did not succeed in suppressing the desire to have the project of law read. Chapelier at length read it: it proposed, in case of disturbances, to institute a dictatorial commission, composed of three members, with power to designate by name, and at their own pleasure, those who should have liberty to travel without the limits of the kingdom. Upon hearing this extravagant proposition, which bespoke at once the impossibility of legislation, violent murmurs arose. "Your murmurs re-assure me," exclaimed Mirabeau; "your hearts beat in unison with mine, and repudiate this absurd tyranny. As for me, I hold myself freed from all oath towards those who shall be infamous enough to sanction a dictatorial commission."—Shouts arose from the left side—"Yes," he resumed, "I swear"—he was again interrupted—"That popularity," he cried, in a voice of thunder, "for which I have longed, and which I have enjoyed as well as others, is not a feeble reed: I will dig it deeply into the earth; I will make it flourish on the soil of justice and reason." Cheers broke forth from all sides. "I swear," added the orator—"if an emigration law be passed—I swear to disobey you!"

He descended from the tribune, after electrifying the assembly and awing his enemies. However, the debate was still proceeded with; one party wished an adjournment, to afford time for digesting a better law, whilst others demanded that a resolution of the intention to enact none should be at once passed, in order to calm the people and put an end to agitation. Murmurs, shouts, applauses, were mingled in strange confusion. Mirabeau again claimed to be heard, and seemed to insist upon it as a right. "By what name is the dictatorship exercised here by M. de Mirabeau known?" exclaimed M. Goupil. Mirabeau, without listening to him, sprang up the tribune. "I have not granted liberty to speak," said the president; "let the assembly decide." But the assembly disposed itself to hear him without any formal decision upon the point. "I beg the interruptors to remember," said Mirabeau, "that I have combated tyranny all my life, and that I will combat it wherever it may be seated;" and as he pronounced these words, he cast his eye from right to left. Loud cheers greeted the expression. He resumed: "I beg M. Goupil to recollect, that he once before egregiously erred as to a certain Catiline, whose dictatorship he this day denounces;* I beg the assembly to reflect, that the question of adjournment, apparently so simple, involves others, and that, for example, it supposes a law to make." Fresh murmurs interrupted him from the left. "Silence to those thirty voices!" exclaimed the orator, fixing his eyes on the benches of Barnave and the Lameths. "In a word," added he, "if you desire it, I will also vote for the adjournment, but on condition that it be decreed that from this moment to the expiration of the adjournment there shall be no seditious movement." Unanimous applause followed these words. However, the adjournment was carried, but by so small a majority that the result was contested and a second division demanded.

In this debate, Mirabeau drew more than ever upon the audaciousness of his character; never, perhaps, had he so imperiously overawed the assembly. But his end was approaching, and these were his final triumphs. Presentiments of death mingled with his vast projects, and occasionally prevented their developement. But his conscience was satisfied; the public esteem was united with his own, and assured him that if he had not yet done enough for the good of the state, he had at all events done enough for his own glory. With his countenance deadly pale, and his eyes deeply sunk, his appearance in the tribune was greatly altered, and he was often seized with sudden fainting-fits. Pleasure and labour, both pushed to excess, and the exhausting emotions of the tribune, had prematurely worn out his powerful frame. Baths, containing sublimate of mercury in solution, had produced that greenish tint which was attributed to poison. The court was in consternation, all parties in amazement, and, some time before his death, its cause was a subject of general conversation. Upon a last occasion, he spoke at five different intervals, left the hall exhausted, and never re-appeared. The deathbed received him, and gave him up only for the Pantheon. He had insisted with Cabanis, his friend, that no physicians should be called; but his injunction was disobeyed, and when they came they found death upon him; it had already seized his feet. The head was affected last, as if nature were desirous to leave his genius brilliant to the final moment. An immense crowd flocked around his dwelling, and blocked up all the avenues, awaiting the issue in profound silence. The court sent messenger after messenger; the bulletins of his condition were passed from mouth to mouth, and disseminated the grief, at each advance of the malady, into every quarter of the city. He himself, surrounded by his friends, expressed regret for his unaccomplished labours, and some feeling of pride for those he had achieved. "Sustain this head," said he to his servant, "the strongest in France!" The proofs of popular concern greatly moved him; and the visit of Barnave, his enemy, who presented himself at his bedside in the name of the Jacobins, caused in him an agreeable emotion. He still bestowed some thoughts on public affairs. The assembly was shortly to discuss the subject of testamentary dispositions: he beckoned to M. Talleyrand, and put in his hands a speech he had prepared. "It will be amusing," said he to him, "to hear a man speak against testaments who is no more, and who has already made his own." The court had desired that he should make a will, promising to discharge all the legacies. Recurring to the state of Europe, and divining the projects of England: "That Pitt," said he, "is the minister for preparations: he governs by threats; I would give him some trouble if I lived!" The priest of his parish coming forward to offer his services, he thanked him with cordiality, and told him, with a smile, that he would have willingly accepted them if his superior ecclesiastic, the Bishop of Autun, were not in the house. He ordered his windows to be opened: "My friend," said he to Cabanis, "I will die to-day; there remains nothing more but to be wrapped in perfumes, crowned with flowers, and surrounded with music, in order to glide peaceably into the eternal sleep." Acute pains interrupted from time to time his resigned and touching phrases. "You promised," said he to his friends, "to spare me from useless anguish." With these words, he asked earnestly for opium. As they refused it him, he demanded it with his accustomed violence. To satisfy him, they practised deception, and presented him a cup, with the assurance that it contained opium. He calmly grasped it, swallowed the draught he deemed mortal, and seemed satisfied. An instant afterwards he expired. His death occurred on the 2d April 1791. The news was immediately conveyed to the court, the assembly, the whole city. All parties had placed hopes upon him, and every one, except the envious, was overwhelmed with sorrow. The assembly intermitted its labours; a general mourning was ordered, and a magnificent funeral was prepared. Those charged with the ceremonial begged the presence of some deputies: "We will all go!" they exclaimed. The church of St Geneviève was constituted a Pantheon, with this inscription, which is effaced at the moment I record these facts:

* M. Goupil, on a previous occasion attacking Mirabeau, had exclaimed with the members of the right side, "Catiline is at our gates!"

TO GREAT MEN, A GRATEFUL COUNTRY.*

Mirabeau was the first deposited there by the side of Descartes. On the 4th April, the funeral obsequies were celebrated. All the authorities, the department, the municipalities, the popular clubs, the assembly, and the army, accompanied the procession. To this simple orator were accorded more honours than the pompous burials at St Denis were ever wont to receive. Thus the scene closed upon this extraordinary man, who, after having daringly attacked and subdued the men of an effete system, had the surprising boldness to turn his efforts against the new men who had assisted him to conquer, to arrest their course by his voice, and make them respect it even when employed against themselves; upon a man, in short, who performed his duty under the impulses of reason and genius, but not for a handful of gold cast to his passions, and who enjoyed the singular felicity, when all popularities finish by popular disgust, to see his yield only to death. But would he have infused resignation into the mind of the court, moderation into the hearts of the ambitious? Would he have said to the popular tribunes, struggling for supremacy in their turn: "Remain in your obscure alleys?" Would he have said to Danton, that other Mirabeau of the populace: "Confine yourself to your section, and aspire no higher?" We cannot tell: but at the moment of his death, all uncertain interests were centred in his hands, and dependent upon him. His departure was long regretted. In the confusion of discord, all eyes were turned to the place he was wont to occupy, and seemed to invoke him who used to end it with a victorious phrase. "Mirabeau is no longer here," cried Maury one day, as he ascended the tribune; "there is none to prevent me from speaking."

The death of Mirabeau paralysed the energies of the court. New events occurred to stimulate its resolution to fly. On the 18th April, the king desired to pay Saint-Cloud a visit. A rumour was spread that, not wishing to employ a constitutional priest for the Easter devotions, he had determined to remove from Paris during passion week; another report asserted that it was his intention to fly. The people forthwith assembled in crowds, and seized the horses' heads. Lafayette hastened forward, and entreated the king to remain in his carriage, assuring him he would open a passage. The king, however, immediately alighted, and refused to allow any attempt to proceed; it was in accordance with his old policy of appearing under constraint. Pursuant to the advice of his ministers, he repaired to the assembly, in order to complain of the outrage he had just encountered. The assembly received him with its accustomed marks of respect, and promised to take all such measures as depended upon it to assure his perfect freedom. Louis XVI. left the hall amidst cheers from all sides except from the right. On the 23d April, upon advice tendered him, he wrote, by means of M. de Montmorin, a letter to the foreign ambassadors, in which he denied the intentions attributed to him out of France, declared to the powers of Europe that he had sworn fidelity to the constitution, which oath he was determined to keep, and denounced as his enemies all who should insinuate to the contrary. The terms of this letter were designedly exaggerated, in order that it might appear extorted by violence, which in fact the king himself avowed to the envoy of Leopold. This monarch was then travelling in Italy, and at that identical moment was staying in Mantua. Calonne was engaged in negotiations with him. An envoy, M. Alexandre de Durfort, came from Mantua, accredited to the king and queen, to ascertain their dispositions. He first interrogated them upon the letter written to the ambassadors, and they replied, that from the language none could doubt it had been extorted; he afterwards questioned them upon their hopes, and they answered that they no longer entertained any since the death of Mirabeau; he finally inquired as to their dispositions towards the Count d'Artois, and they assured him they were most friendly.

To understand the reason of these questions, it ought to be mentioned that the Baron de Breteuil was the declared enemy of Calonne, which enmity had not subsided in emigration; and that he, being accredited to the court of Vienna, with full powers from Louis XVI.,* counteracted all the operations of the princes. He assured Leopold that the king was not anxious to be saved by the emigrants, because he feared their future demands, and that the queen had personally quarrelled with the Count d'Artois. He always proposed, as a means of saving the throne, the direct contrary to what Calonne projected, and omitted no expedient to destroy the effect of the latter's more recent negotiation. The Count de Durfort returned to Mantua; and, on the 20th May 1791, Leopold promised to march 35,000 men into Flanders, and 15,000 into Alsace. He declared that an equal number of Swiss would proceed towards Lyons, as many Piedmontese into Dauphiny, and that Spain would assemble [illegible]0,000 men. The emperor undertook for the co-operation of Prussia and the neutrality of England. A protestation, drawn up in the name of the house of Bourbon, was to be signed by the King of Naples, the King of Spain, the Infant of Parma, and the expatriated princes. Until the promulgation of that document, the most profound secrecy was imposed. It was also recommended to Louis XVI. not to think of removing, although he had testified a strong desire to do so; whilst Breteuil, on the contrary, advised the king to depart from Paris. It is quite possible that on both sides the counsel was given in good faith; but it must be at the same time observed, that each gave such advice as suited best his own interests.

* The revolution of 1830 has re-established this inscription, and restored the monument to the destination decreed by the National Assembly.

* See on this subject Bertrand de Moleville.

Breteuil, who wished to nullify Calonne's negotiation at Mantua, urged the departure; and Calonne, whose reign would have ceased if Louis XVI. had stationed himself on the frontier, conveyed suggestions inducing him to remain. However the case may be, the king resolved upon leaving; and he often said with some sourness of temper, "It was Breteuil who would have it."* He therefore wrote to Bouillé that he was determined to defer his flight no longer.

* See Bertrand de Moleville. [Bertrand's Annals are, in all matters affecting the king and queen personally, very admirable authority. He himself was much trusted by the king, was one of his ministers, was intimate at this time with all who formed the court, and afterwards in exile with M. de Calonne and others, who were prominently concerned in these important negotiations. Bertrand's details as to the mission of Durfort are extremely curious, and are faithfully embodied in M. Thiers's text. Their length, however, forbids us to insert them fully here; but the questions propounded by M. de Durfort, and the answers given to them, present so singular a record, as to render them eminently worthy of being transcribed. M. Bertrand says—"The following is an exact copy of those questions and answers; the answers are supposed to be addressed to the Count d'Artois:—

1st Question. Do your majesties confide in the intentions and in the zeal of the Count d'Artois? Is there any ground for the anxiety he has been made to suffer as to your sentiments in respect to him, and as to your intentions to put yourselves into the hands of the factious in the assembly, rather than owe your safety, and the re-establishment of your authority, to the efforts and success of the princes, in conjunction with the nobility of the kingdom?

Answer (dictated by the queen). You are deceived. Your situation is that which occupies their majesties most. How can it be believed, that with the exalted spirit you know they possess, they prefer remaining under the yoke of infamous villains, to being succoured by their near relations and faithful servants?

2d Question. What do your majesties think of M. de Lafayette?

Answer. We consider him as a fanatical, weak, factious man, in whom we can never have the least confidence.

3d Question. What do you think of M. de Montmorin?

Answer. His will is good, but he has no power.

4th Question. Has the Archbishop of Sens any influence on the determinations of your majesties?

Answer. None. He is generally abhorred and despised by all parties. We concur in this public opinion. He has, besides, deceived us.

5th Question. Why did the king go to the assembly, after being prevented from going to St Cloud?

Answer. He was forced by his ministers, on whom he could not rely.

6th Question. In what state is the mind of the people? Have your majesties any persons in the assembly on whom you can rely?

Answer. The mind of the people is detestable; they are for no king. We have no person in the assembly. The only deputy who made overtures to us is dead.

7th Question. How is the letter addressed to all the ambassadors to be justified?

Answer. The date proves the necessity of it. The king did not sign it; and he made no alteration in it, that it might appear as monstrous as it really was; it was drawn up by the members of the assembly, who thought this step indispensably necessary, and who expected great success from it.

8th Question. Have your majesties a desire or intention of leaving Paris?

Answer. The greatest desire; but the means of effecting it appear to us almost impossible. In case the opportunity should offer, we wish to know beforehand in what place we should be most secure—by Valenciennes or Metz. We are very anxious on this head."

The Count de Durfort subsequently brought a plan, dictated and corrected by the Emperor Leopold, in which, after specifying the assistance to be afforded by himself and the other foreign powers, it is stated:

"Though hitherto it had been wished that their majesties might themselves procure their liberty, the present situation of affairs makes it necessary to entreat them earnestly to drop the idea. This is the emperor's opinion. He depends solely on this plan of conduct for the success of the measures which he has adopted, and particularly requests that every other may be given up. What might happen to their majesties, if in their flight they should not be able to escape a barbarous vigilance, makes him shudder with horror. His imperial majesty thinks that their majesties' surest course is the movement of the armies of the allied powers, preceded by threatening manifestos."—"The plan being read," proceeds Bertrand, "their majesties, without entering upon a minute discussion of the different articles of it, only observed, that with respect to the parliaments, after the declarations contained in their last resolutions, they could not, and ought not, to be more than judges. The king did not deliver his sentiments concerning the last article of the plan; but the queen appeared very much dissatisfied with it, and said with warmth, 'We ought to attempt every thing in order to leave Paris; but to go only to the frontiers, for a king ought never to leave his kingdom. Confess,' added she, addressing herself to Count de Durfort, 'that my brother was hurt that we employed the Baron de Breteuil. We did it because he was the only person acquainted with the court of Vienna, where he resided; and because he was known to the Prince de Kaunitz, who has so long held the reins there.' Several other questions relative to the Count d'Artois terminated this conversation."—Bertrand's Annals, vol. iv. pp. 58-77.]

His intention was not to leave the kingdom, but to retire to Montmedy, where he could, in case of necessity, fall back on Luxumbourg, and receive foreign aid. The Châlons route, by Clermont and Varennes, was preferred, in spite of Bouillé's counsels. All the preparations were in readiness for departure on the 20th June. The general assembled those troops upon which he placed the firmest reliance; formed a camp at Montmedy, amassed stores of forage, and accounted for all these dispositions by movements which he alleged to be making on the frontier. The queen had taken upon herself the charge of the progress from Paris to Châlons; and from that town to Montmedy was under the care of Bouillé. Small detachments of cavalry were to be stationed upon various points, under pretext of escorting a treasure, but in reality to receive the king on his passage. Bouillé himself proposed to advance some distance from Montmedy. The queen had secured a secret door for the purpose of escaping out of the palace. The royal family was to travel under an assumed name, and with a false passport. Every thing was ready for the 20th; but some apprehension caused the journey to be delayed till the following day, a delay which was fatal to the unfortunate family. M. de Lafayette was in complete ignorance of the journey, and M. de Montmorin himself, notwithstanding the confidence the court reposed in him, was left in absolute ignorance likewise; no one was intrusted with the secret of the project but the persons indispensable to its execution. Some rumours of flight were nevertheless current in Paris, either from the plan having transpired to some partial extent, or from their originating in one of those alarms so common at the time. Howsoever it may have been, the committee of inquiry had been apprised of it, and the vigilance of the national guard was stimulated in consequence.

On the 20th June, at midnight, the king, the queen, Madame Elizabeth, and Madame de Tourzel, governess of the children of France, disguised themselves, and successively issued from the palace. Madame de Tourzel, with the children, proceeded to the Petit Carrousel, and got into a carriage driven by M. de Fersen, a young foreign nobleman, disguised as a coachman. The king soon joined them; but the queen, who had left the palace with a life-guardsman, caused them the most lively solicitude. Neither she nor her guide was acquainted with the streets of Paris; she mistook the way, and did not find the Petit Carrousel for a whole hour; on the road, she encountered the carriage of M. de Lafayette, whose servants were walking with torches. She concealed herself under the gateway of the Louvre, and, saved from that danger, she reached the carriage, where she was so impatiently expected. After being thus united, the whole family proceeded forward, and arrived, after a long circuit, and a second mistake in the route, at the gate St Martin, where a coach drawn by six horses awaited them, into which they all transferred themselves. Madame de Tourzel, under the name of Madame de Korff, was to pass for a mother travelling with her children; the king was to be supposed her valet-de-chambre; three body-guardsmen in disguise were to precede the carriage as couriers, or to follow it as domestics. They at length departed, accompanied by the earnest hopes of M. de Fersen, who re-entered Paris to take the road to Brussels. At the same time, Monsieur directed his course towards Flanders, with his wife, pursuing a different route, in order to avoid exciting suspicions, and causing a failure of horses for relays.

The king and his family travelled all night without any alarm being given at Paris. M. de Fersen repaired to the municipality, to observe if any thing were known; but at eight in the morning all were still in profound ignorance. However, the news soon transpired, and circulated with rapidity. Lafayette summoned his aides-de-camp around him, saying to them that he feared there was no hope of their overtaking the fugitives, but that some effort must be made in the emergency; he took upon himself the responsibility of the orders he issued, and in drawing up those orders, acted upon the idea that the royal family had been carried off by the enemies of the public welfare. This respectful supposition was admitted by the assembly, and adopted throughout by all the authorities. At the moment, the tumultuous populace reproached Lafayette with having favoured the flight of the king, and at a later date the aristocratic party accused him of having allowed the king to fly, in order afterwards to arrest him, and by so futile an attempt to ruin him. But if Lafayette had been disposed to wink at Louis XVI.'s flight, would he have dispatched, without any orders from the assembly, two aides-de-camp in pursuit? And if, as the aristocrats alleged, he only permitted him to escape in order to re-capture him, would he have given a whole night's start to the carriage? The people were speedily undeceived, and Lafayette was again established in their previous good opinion.

The assembly met at nine in the morning. Its appearance on that momentous occasion was as imposing as during the first days of the revolution. The received idea was that Louis XVI. had been carried off. The greatest calmness, the most perfect union, reigned during the whole sitting. The measures spontaneously adopted by Lafayette were approved. The populace had stopped his two aides-de-camp at the barriers; the assembly, every where obeyed, caused the gates to be opened for them. One of them, young Romeuf, took with him the decree confirming the orders already given by the general, and enjoining all public functionaries "to arrest, by all possible means, the persons implicated in the said abduction, and to prevent the journey being continued." Following the wish and indications of the people around him, Romeuf took the route of Châlons, which was the true one, and which the marks of a carriage with six horses pointed out as such. The assembly called the ministers to its bar, and decreed that they should receive orders from none but itself. On departing, Louis XVI. had left orders for the minister of justice to send him the state seal. The assembly decided that the seal should be retained, and appended to its own decrees. At the same time, it passed a resolution that the frontiers should be put in a state of defence, and directed the minister for foreign affairs to assure the powers that the dispositions of the French nation with regard to them were in no wise altered.

M. de Laporte, intendant of the civil list, was then heard. He had received various communications from the king, amongst which were a note, which he besought the assembly not to open, and a memorial containing the motives of his departure. The assembly, anxious to respect all rights, restored, without opening, the note which M. de Laporte was indisposed to render public, and ordered the memorial to be read. It was listened to with the greatest tranquillity, and produced a very slight impression. The king complained therein of his curtailments of power with a marked want of dignity, and seemed to feel as acutely the reduction of his civil list to thirty millions, as the loss of all his prerogatives. The grievances of the monarch were heard in silence, his weakness was pitied, and the assembly passed to the affairs before it.

Few persons in the National Assembly were desirous of the king's arrest. The aristocrats saw in his flight the oldest of their hopes realised, and flattered themselves with an immediate civil war. The extreme members of the popular party, already beginning to grow weary of a king, perceived in his absence an opportunity for dispensing with him, and formed the idea, as well as the hope, of a republic. All the moderate party, at this moment the governing party in the assembly, wished that the king might reach Montmedy in safety; and, relying upon his equity, it entertained little doubt that an accommodation would from thence become more easy between the throne and the nation. Less apprehension prevailed now than formerly at the prospect of the monarch threatening the constitution from the midst of an army. The people alone, upon whom terror at this event had been sedulously inculcated, were still affected by it when the assembly had shaken off its influence, and they put up many ardent vows for the arrest of the royal family. Such was the state of opinion and of things at Paris.

The royal carriage, departing in the night of the 20th and 21st, had happily traversed a considerable part of the route, and had reached Châlons without impediment about five in the afternoon of the 21st. At that town, the king, who was indiscreet enough to put his head several times out of the window, was recognised; the person who made this discovery was eager to give it immediate proclamation, but he was prevented by the mayor, who was a steady royalist. When the royal family arrived at Pont-de-Sommeville, the detachments which ought to have received it there were not visible: those detachments had been in waiting for several hours, but the ferment of the people, who were alarmed at this military display, had obliged them to retire. However, the king proceeded to Sainte-Menehould. There, still persisting in thrusting his head out of the carriage, he was perceived by Drouet, the postmaster's son, and a zealous revolutionist. This young man, not having time to procure the arrest of the carriage at Sainte-Menehould, instantly started for Varennes. A loyal quartermaster, who had observed his eagerness, and suspected his design, hastened in pursuit to stop him, but was unable to overtake him. Drouet used such diligence, that he reached Varennes before the unfortunate family. He immediately aroused the municipality, and caused the necessary measures for the arrest to be taken without delay. Varennes is built on the banks of a narrow but deep stream. A detachment of hussars was placed there on guard; but its officer, seeing no prospect of the money arriving for which he had been sent to watch, had permitted the soldiers to retire into quarters. The carriage at length arrived, and passed the bridge. So soon as it came under an arch beneath which it could move but slowly, Drouet, seconded by another individual, seized the horses' heads: "Your passport!" he exclaimed, and presenting a musket, he threatened to fire if the travellers persisted in advancing. They obeyed the call, and the passport was delivered. Drouet took possession of it, and saying that the attorney of the commune was the proper person to examine it, the royal family was conducted to the house of that personage, whose name was Sausse. This official, after inspecting the passport, pretended to find it regular, and, with many polite expressions, begged the king to wait. He had to wait in truth a pretty long time. When Sausse was at length assured that a sufficient number of national guards had been collected, he threw off all dissimulation, and declared to the king that he was known and under arrest. A dispute ensued: Louis alleged he was not the person they supposed; and the contest growing somewhat too warm—"Since you acknowledge him for your king," exclaimed the queen, losing all patience, "speak to him with the respect you owe him."

The king, finding all denial useless, ceased to dissemble any longer. The little room was full of people; he spoke to them, and expressed himself with more energy than was usual with him. He made protestation of his good intentions, assuring them that his only object in going to Montmedy was to learn with more freedom the wishes of the people, by removing from the thraldom of Paris; in conclusion, he urged them to allow him to continue his progress, and even to conduct him to the end of his journey. The unfortunate prince, in the deepest emotion, embraced Sausse, and asked at his hands the safety of his consort and his children: the queen joined her entreaties to the king's, and taking the dauphin in her arms, conjured Sausse to save them. The attorney was touched, but he resisted the impulse, and begged them to return to Paris in order to prevent a civil war. The king, on the contrary, dismayed at the idea of returning, was urgent in his desire to proceed towards Montmedy. In the mean time, Messieurs de Damas and de Goquelas had arrived with the detachments stationed at various points. The royal family looked upon itself as delivered; but the hussars proved that the confidence reposed in them was misplaced. The officers drew them up, and announced to them that the king and his family were arrested, and that it was their duty to rescue them; but they answered that they were for the nation. At this juncture, the national guards, summoned from all the surrounding districts, poured in and filled Varennes. The whole night was passed in this state. At six in the morning, young Romeuf arrived, bearing the decree of the assembly: he found the carriage harnessed with six horses, and turned towards Paris. He ascended to the room occupied by the captives, and delivered the decree. Exclamations from the whole family arose against M. Lafayette, that he should thus provoke their arrest. The queen seemed even astonished, perhaps sorry, that he had not perished at the hands of the people. Romeuf observed that his general and he had only done their duty in pursuing them, but they had hoped not to overtake them. The queen snatched hold of the decree, threw it upon her children's bed, and then caught it off again, saying it would defile them. "Madam," said Romeuf, who was much devoted to her, "would you rather prefer that some other than I should witness these passionate emotions?" The queen immediately resumed all her self-possession and dignity. At the same moment, the arrival of various detachments, placed in the vicinity by Bouillé, was announced. But the municipality ordered the instant departure; and the royal family was obliged to seat itself in the carriage, and retake the route to Paris—that fatal and so dreaded route.

Bouillé, having learnt what had occurred at Varennes in the middle of the night, had immediately called a regiment to horse, and set off with shouts of "Long live the king!" This brave and faithful general proceeded in great disquietude, at a rapid pace, and covered nine leagues in four hours. He reached Varennes, where he found several detachments assembled; but the king had left an hour and a half before. The town itself was barricaded, and likewise defended by certain excellent precautions, for the bridge had been broken down, and the river was not fordable. Thus, to effect the king's rescue, Bouillé must first of all have made a vigorous assault to carry the barricades, then have crossed the river, and after so great a loss of time have succeeded in overtaking the carriage, which was already an hour and a half in advance. These obstacles rendered any effort impossible; and nothing less was needed than such an impossibility to stop a man so devoted and so enterprising as Bouillé. He consequently retreated to his quarters, with a heart torn by deep regret and sorrow.

When the arrest of the king was known at Paris, he was imagined to have been beyond the reach of pursuit. The people experienced an indescribable joy at the intelligence. The assembly deputed three commissioners, taken from the three sections of the left side, to accompany the monarch, and reconduct him to Paris. Those commissioners were Barnave, Latour-Maubourg, and Petion. They repaired to Châlons; and from the moment of their junction with the royal family, all orders emanated from them alone. Madame de Tourzel removed into another carriage, and followed, in company with Latour-Maubourg. Barnave and Petion got into the royal carriage. Latour-Maubourg, a man of distinguished merit, was a friend of Lafayette, and, like him, equally attached to the king and the constitution. In yielding to his two colleagues the honour of sitting with the royal family, he was actuated by a wish to interest them in behalf of fallen greatness. Barnave seated himself in the back of the carriage, between the king and the queen; Petion in the front, between the Princess Elizabeth and the princess-royal. The young dauphin rested alternately upon the knees of his relatives. How striking an evidence of the rapidity with which events had flowed! A young advocate, twenty and some years old, remarkable only for his talents; another, distinguished by his acquirements, but especially by the rigorous sternness of his principles, were sitting alongside a prince, shortly ago the most absolute in Europe, and commanding all his motions!

The journey was performed very slowly, because the carriage followed the march of the national guards. Eight days were consumed between Varennes and Paris. The weather was extremely sultry, and a scorching dust, raised by the crowd, suffocated the wretched travellers. At first a dead silence prevailed as the coach moved tediously along, and the queen took little pains to disguise her annoyance. The king at length began a conversation with Barnave. Their discourse referred to various topics, and ultimately to the flight of the monarch. Both were astonished at the discovery of each other's qualities. The queen was greatly surprised at the superior intellect and delicate politeness of the young Barnave; she shortly threw back her veil, and took part in the conversation. Barnave, on his part, was touched with the goodness of the king, and the graceful dignity of the queen. Petion displayed infinite surliness; he evinced and obtained much less consideration. On concluding their journey, Barnave had become attached to this unfortunate family; and the queen, charmed with the merit and good sense of the young tribune, had formed for him a high esteem.* Consequently, in the rela-

* The particulars of the return from Varennes, as related to Madame Campan by the queen herself, are interesting enough to be recorded.

"On the very day of my arrival, the queen called me into her cabinet to tell me she would require my assistance in the communications she had established with Barnave, Duport, and Alexander Lameth. She informed me that M. J—— was her agent with these remnants of the constitutional party, whose good intentions were unfortunately so tardily evinced; and said that Barnave was a man calculated to command esteem. I was astonished at hearing the name of Barnave pronounced with so much good feeling. At the time I left Paris, many persons spoke of him only with horror. I made this remark to the queen; she was not surprised at it, but told me he was much changed; that this young man, of high accomplishments and noble sentiments, was of that class of men distinguished for education, and only misled by an ambition which springs from real merit. 'A feeling of pride, which I can scarcely blame in a young man of the plebeian order,' said the queen, with reference to Barnave, 'has led him to applaud all that might smooth the road to honours tions she afterwards had with the constitutional deputies, she always placed the most confidence in Barnave. Parties would often forgive each other, if they could come to mutual and frank explanations.

The reception intended for the royal family at Paris had been expressly arranged. A notice was circulated and affixed every where to this effect:—"Whoever applauds the king will be beaten; whoever insults him will be hanged." The order thus intimated was punctually obeyed; and neither cheers nor hootings were heard. The carriage took a circuit in order to avoid traversing Paris. It was made to enter by the Champs-Elysées, which lead directly to the palace. A prodigious crowd received it in silence, and with covered heads. Lafayette, attended by a numerous guard, took all possible precautions to prevent disturbance. The three guardsmen, who had assisted the flight, were on the box-seat of the carriage, exposed to the view and the rage of the multitude; but they sustained no injury. The instant the carriage reached the palace, it was surrounded by national guards. The royal family precipitately descended, and walked between a double row of national guards, drawn up as a protection. The queen, who was the last to alight, was almost carried in the arms of Messieurs de Noailles and d'Aiguillon, enemies of the court, but generous friends of misfortune. When she saw them approach, she was at first doubtful of their intentions; but she gave herself up to them, and gained the palace portals in full security.

Such was that famous journey, the fatal termination of which can be justly attributed to none of those who had arranged it. An accident caused it to miscarry; an accident might have equally caused it to succeed. If, for instance, Drouet had been overtaken, and stopped by the man who pursued him, the carriage had experienced no obstacle. The king, perhaps, was deficient in energy when he was recognised. However that may be, the journey itself is a subject of reproach to no person—neither to those who strenuously advised it, nor to those who attempted its execution; it was an expedient resulting from that fatality which pursues weakness in the midst of revolutionary crises.

The effect of the flight to Varennes was to destroy all respect for the king, to accustom the minds of men to his absence, and to stimulate the idea of a republic. Previous to the morning of his arrival, the assembly had provided for the emergency of the case by a decree.* Louis XVI. was suspended from his functions, and a guard assigned for his person, for that of the queen, and for that of the dauphin. This guard was made responsible for their safety. Three deputies, D'André, Tronchet, and Duport, were deputed to receive the declarations of the king and queen. The greatest nicety was observed in the expressions, for never did that assembly betray a want of attention to delicacy: but the fact itself was not to be disguised —the king was provisionally dethroned.

The responsibility imposed upon the national guards rendered them severe and sometimes harassing in their duty at the palace. Sentinels were constantly stationed at the doors of the royal apartments, and they kept the objects of their solicitude always in view. The king, wishing one day to ascertain whether he were really a prisoner, presented himself at a door; the sentinel opposed his progress: "Do you know who I am?" said Louis XVI. to him. "Yes, sire," answered the sentinel. There only remained to the king the privilege of walking in the Tuileries, early, before the garden was thrown open to the public.

Barnave and the Lameths now did what they had so bitterly upbraided Mirabeau with doing—they lent their aid to the throne, and came to an understanding with the court. It is true they received no money; but it was much less the price of the alliance than the alliance itself with which they had reproached Mirabeau; and after having been formerly so severe, they now came under the law common to all popular leaders, which drives them to successively ally them-and glory for the class in which he was born: if power should ever return to us, the pardon of Barnave is written beforehand in our hearts.' She added that it was far different with regard to the nobles who had taken part in the revolution—men who obtained all favours, and often to the detriment of those in an inferior grade, amongst whom were found talents of the highest order; in short, that the nobles, born to be the rampart of the monarchy, were too culpable in betraying its cause to deserve forgiveness. The queen astonished me more and more by the warmth with which she justified the favourable opinion she had conceived of Barnave. She then told me that his conduct on the journey had been singularly meritorious, whilst the republican harshness of Petion had been disgusting; that he ate and drank in the coach with excessive vulgarity, throwing chicken-bones out of the window with such unconcern as to risk hitting the king's face; raising his glass, without saying a word, when the Princess Elizabeth poured him out wine, to indicate that he had sufficient: that this offensive behaviour was designed, inasmuch as the man had received a liberal education; and that Barnave had been greatly shocked at it. When pressed by the queen to take some refreshment: 'Madame,' answered Barnave, 'the deputies of the National Assembly, in so solemn a conjuncture, ought to fatigue your majesties with their mission only, and not with their wants.' In fine, his respectful demeanour, his delicate attentions, and his whole discourse, had gained him not only the queen's regard, but that of the Princess Elizabeth.

The king had begun to speak with Petion on the situation of France, and on the motives of his conduct, which were founded on the necessity of securing to the executive power a strength indispensable to its action for the advantage even of the constitutional act, since France could not be a republic. 'Not yet, I own,' answered Petion; 'because the French are not ripe enough for it.' This audacious and unfeeling reply imposed silence on the king, which he never broke until he arrived at Paris. Petion upon one occasion held the dauphin on his knees, and amused himself by passing his fingers through the beautiful fair hair of the interesting child: speaking with energy, he pulled his locks with such force as to make the boy cry out. 'Give me my son,' said the queen; 'he is accustomed to treatment—to respect—that little inclines him to such familiarity.'

The Chevalier de Dampierre had been killed near the king's carriage on leaving Varennes. A poor village priest, some leagues from the spot where the murder had been committed, had the imprudence to approach with the view of speaking to the king. The cannibals who surrounded the carriage flew upon him: 'Tigers!' cried Barnave to them, 'have you then ceased to be Frenchmen? From a nation of brave men have you become a nation of assassins?' These words alone saved the curate, already on the ground, from immediate death. Barnave, in uttering them, had thrown himself almost out of the window, and the Princess Elizabeth, moved by his noble transport, held him by the coat. The queen said, in speaking of this circumstance, that in moments of the greatest crises, odd contrasts always peculiarly attracted her mind; and that, upon this occasion, the pious Elizabeth supporting Barnave by the coat-tails, had struck her as an occurrence in the highest degree surprising.

This deputy had experienced another species of astonishment. The discourses of Madame Elizabeth upon the situation of France, her mild and persuasive eloquence, the noble simplicity with which she addressed Barnave, without departing in the least from her dignity, all appeared to him divine in that amiable princess; and his heart, disposed to noble sentiments, if it had not been led astray by error, was subdued into a most heart-felt admiration. The conduct of the two deputies taught the queen how total was the separation between the republican and the constitutional parties. In the inns at which they alighted, she had some confidential conversations with Barnave. He spoke much of the faults of the royalists in the revolution, and said that he had often seen the interests of the court so feebly and so ill defended, that he had several times been tempted to offer her a courageous champion, who knew the spirit of the age and that of the nation. The queen asked him what means he would have advised her to employ. 'Popularity, madam.' 'And how could I have any?' retorted the queen; 'it was wrested from me.' 'Ah! madam,' replied Barnave, 'it was much more easy for you to regain it than for me to win it.' This observation might furnish matter for commentary; but I restrict myself to relating this curious conversation."—Memoirs of Madame Campan, vol. ii. p. 150, et seq.

* Decree of Saturday the 25th June.

selves with power, in proportion as they touch upon it. Nevertheless, nothing was more praiseworthy, in the state of affairs, than the service afforded the king by Barnave and the Lameths; and never did they evince more address, courage, and talent. Barnave dictated the king's answer to the commissioners named by the assembly. In that document, Louis XVI. grounded his flight upon the desire to learn more accurately the state of public opinion, which he alleged to have closely studied during his journey; and he demonstrated by a series of facts that it was never his intention to leave France. As to the protests contained in his memorial delivered to the assembly, he said, with much reason, that they bore, not upon the fundamental principles of the constitution, but upon the means of execution which were permitted him. "Now," he added, "that the general desire was made manifest to him, he did not hesitate to submit to it, and to make all the sacrifices necessary for the general welfare."*

* The following is the answer itself, the production of Barnave, and a fine model of argument, tact, and dignity:—

"I find, gentlemen," said Louis XVI. to the commissioners, "an examination is not involved in the objects of the mission confided to you; but I am anxious to meet the wishes of the assembly. I shall never be afraid of declaring publicly the motives of my conduct.

The outrages and threats, then, which were heaped on my family and myself, on the 18th April, were the causes of my departure from Paris. In various publications attempts were made to excite violence against my person and my family. I thought that neither safety nor decency could be expected by me if I remained any longer in this city. It was never my intention to quit the kingdom. For such an object I had no plan concerted, either with foreign powers, or with my relatives, or with any of the emigrant Frenchmen. I can allege, as a proof of my intentions, that apartments were prepared for my reception at Montmedy. I had selected that town, because, being fortified, my family would be there in greater security, and because, being near the frontier, I would have been in a better position to oppose every species of invasion, if any had been attempted, of France.

One of my principal motives in quitting Paris was to destroy the argument founded on my not being free, which might furnish an occasion for troubles. If I had designed to leave the kingdom, I would not have published my memorial the very day of my departure; I would have waited until I was beyond the frontiers: but I always retained the desire of returning to Paris. It is in this sense that the last phrase of my memorial is to be understood, in which it is said: 'Frenchmen, and you Parisians especially, what pleasure shall I not experience in being again amongst you!'

I had in my carriage only three thousand livres in gold, and fifty-six thousand livres in assignats. I apprised Monsieur of my intended departure but a very short time previously. Monsieur has proceeded into a foreign country only because it was agreed between us that we should not pursue the same route—he was to return into France and join me.

The passport was necessary to facilitate my journey. It was made out for a foreign country only because passports are not given at the foreign office for the interior of the kingdom. The road to Frankfort was, in fact, not followed.

I have not made any protest except in the memorial which I left before my departure. That protest does not refer, as the context proves, to the fundamental principles of the constitution, but to the form of the sanctions; that is to say, to the little liberty I seemed to enjoy, and to the fact that, forasmuch as the decrees had not been presented altogether, I could not judge of the entire constitution. The principal objection adduced in the memorial refers to the difficulties of administration and execution. I have ascertained, in the course of my journey, that public opinion has decided in favour of the constitution; I think I could not have fully learned this public opinion in Paris; but, from the ideas that I have personally gathered during my journey, I am convinced how necessary it is to the maintenance of the constitution to give strength to the powers established for the preservation of public order. The moment I ascertained the general will, I did not hesitate, nor have I ever hesitated, to make the sacrifice of all that personally concerned me. The happiness of the people has ever been the object of my wishes. I will willingly bury in oblivion all the annoyances I have suffered, if I can secure peace and prosperity to the nation."

Bouillé, with the view of drawing on his head the whole rage of the assembly, addressed to it a letter, which might be called insane, if the generous motive which prompted it were not considered. He avowed himself the sole instigator of the king's journey, whilst he had in fact opposed it; and he declared, in the name of the allied sovereigns, that Paris should answer for the safety of the royal family, and that the least injury perpetrated on it should be avenged in a signal manner. He added, what he knew to be inconsistent with fact, that the military resources of France were utterly exhausted; furthermore, that he was acquainted with the ways of invasion, and would himself conduct the foreign armies into the bosom of his country. The assembly lent itself to this generous bravado, and threw the whole odium upon Bouillé, who had nothing to fear, as he had already passed to the enemy.

The court of Spain, apprehensive that the slightest hostile demonstration might exasperate the French, and expose the royal family to greater dangers, stopped an enterprise prepared on the southern frontier, and which the Knights of Malta were to assist with two frigates. It subsequently declared to the French government that its friendly dispositions were unchanged. The northern powers conducted themselves with less reserve: excited by the emigrants, they assumed a threatening tone. Envoys were dispatched by the king to Brussels and Coblentz, whose mission was to attempt an understanding with the emigrants, to communicate to them the friendly spirit of the assembly, and the hope that had been generally conceived of the possibility of an advantageous arrangement. But no sooner had they arrived, than they were outrageously insulted, and they immediately returned to Paris. The emigrants levied troops in the king's name, and thus compelled him to give a formal disavowal. They pretended that Monsieur, then with them, was regent of the kingdom; and that the king, being a prisoner, had no longer a will of his own; and that what he stated was merely the forced expression of his oppressors' suggestions. The peace between Catherine and the Turks, which was concluded in the month of August, tended to raise their joy to still more absurd heights; and they concluded that all the powers of Europe were at their disposition. When they reflected on the dismantling of the fortified places, and the disorganisation of the army, abandoned by all its officers, they could not doubt that an invasion must be speedily made, and must succeed. And yet, nearly two years were gone since they had quitted France; and in spite of their daily sanguine hopes they had not yet returned as conquerors, according to their flattering anticipations. The powers seemed to promise much: but Pitt was waiting events; Leopold, exhausted by war, and discontented with the emigrants, was disposed to peace; the King of Prussia, certainly, held out hopes, but he had little interest in gratifying them; Gustavus was eager to lead an expedition against France, but was at an inconvenient distance; and Catherine, who might have assisted him, though delivered from the Turks, had Poland to keep in subjection. Besides, in order to effect such a coalition, so many interests required to be brought into harmony, that it needed a sanguine temperament to anticipate success in such a scheme.

The declaration of Pilnitz ought especially to have opened the eyes of the emigrants as to the zeal of the sovereigns.* That declaration, published conjointly by the King of Prussia and the Emperor Leopold, imported that the situation of the King of France was a matter of common interest to all monarchs, and that they were imperiously called upon to exert their united powers to assure Louis XVI. the means of establishing a government conformable to the interests of the throne and the people. Upon that principle, the King of Prussia and the emperor expressed their readiness to co-operate with other princes to effect that desirable object. In the mean time, their forces were to be prepared for offensive operations when the emergency arrived. It was afterwards known that this declaration contained certain secret articles, to the effect that Austria should oppose no obstacle to the pretensions of Prussia to a part of Poland. Such an inducement was needed to draw Prussia into an abandonment of her ancient principles, and into a league with Austria against France. What could be expected from a zeal which it was necessary to stimulate by such bribes? And if it were so reserved and cautious in the expressions, was it not sure to be equally so in the acts whereby it should manifest itself? France, it is true, was disarmed, but a whole nation on the alert is soon in arms; and, as the celebrated Carnot said somewhat later, "What is there impossible to twenty-five millions of men?" True it was, the officers were retiring; but they for the most part were beardless youths, promoted by favour, utterly without experience, and objects of hatred and contempt to the soldiers. Besides, the spirit imparted to all minds was soon to produce officers and generals. But, at the same time, it must be confessed that, without possessing the presumption so rife at Coblentz, it was not unreasonable to doubt that the resistance to be made by France to invasion would be so powerful as it subsequently proved.

* The declaration of Pilnitz is dated the 27th August 1791.

The assembly, in the interim, sent commissioners to the frontiers, and ordered great preparations. All the national guards demanded to be led against the enemy; several generals offered their services, and, amongst others, Dumouriez, who subsequently saved France in the defiles of the Argonne.

Whilst directing its serious consideration to the external safety of the state, the assembly did not intermit its labours in perfecting the constitutional act, nor the less hasten to restore to the king his functions, and, if it might be possible, some of his prerogatives.

All the subdivisions of the left side, except the men who had recently taken the new name of Republicans, had merged into one party of moderation. Barnave and Malouet walked hand in hand, and worked in companionship. Petion, Robespierre, Buzot, and some others, had adopted the republic as their motto; but they were few in number. The right side continued its imprudent course, and, instead of joining the moderate majority, exacerbated by protests. That majority, however, was the predominant power in the assembly. Its enemies, who would have so fiercely accused it if it had dethroned the king, have nevertheless reproached it for having brought him back to Paris and replaced him on a tottering throne. But what could it do? To displace the king for a republic was an experiment too full of hazard. To change the dynasty was worse than useless, for if a king were to be, the one they had was as good as any other: the Duke of Orleans was certainly unworthy to be preferred to Louis XVI. In either case, to dispossess the actual monarch, was to contemn recognised rights, and dispatch to the emigration a chief most precious for its purposes, since he would have borne it sanctions which it had not. On the other hand, to restore his authority to Louis XVI., to confer on him as great an extent of prerogative as was expedient, was to fulfil the constitutional intent, and remove all pretext for civil war; in a word, it was to perform its duty, for the duty of the assembly, according to the engagements by which it had become bound, was to establish a free, but monarchical, government.

The assembly did not hesitate, but it had great obstacles to overcome. The new word Republic, had quickened the minds of men, already somewhat sickened of the old phrases, Monarchy and Constitution. The absence and suspension of the king had, as we have previously stated, shown that he was not indispensable. The newspapers and the clubs soon laid aside the respect with which his person had been hitherto treated. His departure, which, according to the terms of the decree upon the residence of functionaries, rendered forfeiture exigible, supplied the argument that he was actually dethroned. Still, according to that decree, withdrawal beyond the kingdom and contumacy to the summons of the legislative body were necessary for absolute forfeiture; but such distinctions were little heeded by enthusiastic minds; and they unhesitatingly asserted that the king was an offender against the law, and had incurred its penalty. The Jacobins and Cordeliers agitated the question with extreme violence, and refused to understand how, after getting rid of the king, the nation should again and voluntarily impose him on itself. If the Duke of Orleans had formed expectations, now was the time for their realisation. But he could not avoid perceiving what little influence his name possessed, and how little in accordance with the state of opinion was a new sovereign at all, howsoever popular he might be. Some pamphleteers in his interest, probably without his sanction, endeavoured, like Antony towards Cæsar, to put the crown upon his head: they proposed to give him the regency; but he felt himself obliged to repudiate the proposition by a declaration which was as little regarded as his person. "No more kings!" was the general cry at the Jacobins', at the Cordeliers', in public places, and in the journals.

Numerous addresses were published. Amongst the rest was one affixed to all the walls of Paris, and even to those of the assembly. It bore the signature of Achille Duchâtelet, a young colonel. It was addressed to the French; it reminded them of the tranquillity they had enjoyed during the absence of the monarch, whence it drew the inference that it was more advantageous than his presence; adding that his desertion was an abdication, and that the nation and Louis XVI. were relieved from all obligation towards each other; finally, that history was full of the crimes of kings, and that it behoved them to avoid giving themselves one again.

This address, attributed to young Achille Duchâtelet, was the production of Thomas Paine, an Englishman, and a principal actor in the American revolution. It was denounced to the assembly, which, after warm debates, deemed it expedient to pass to the order of the day, and treat with indifference seditious appeals and attacks, as it had always done.

The commissioners charged to report upon the affair of Varennes, at length presented the result of their deliberations, on the 16th July. The journey, they said, involved nothing of a criminal nature, and, had it done so, the king was inviolable. Nor could forfeiture be judged to have resulted, since the king had not remained absent for a sufficient length of time, and had not resisted the summons of the legislative body.

Robespierre, Petion, and Buzot, reiterated all the usual arguments against inviolability; Duport, Barnave, and Salles, replied to them; and it was ultimately decreed that the king could not be brought under accusation for the offence of flight. Two articles were merely added to the decree of inviolability. So soon as this decision was pronounced, Robespierre arose, and entered his solemn protest in the name of humanity

On the evening which preceded this decision, there was a great tumult at the Jacobins. A petition was drawn up, addressed to the assembly, calling upon it to declare the king deposed, as a traitor faithless to his oaths, and to provide for his substitution by all constitutional means. It was resolved that this petition should be carried the next day to the Champ de Mars, and laid on the altar of the country for signatures. Accordingly, it was borne in the morning to the place agreed upon; and the crowd of the seditious was swelled by that of the curious, who desired to witness the ceremony. By this time the decree was already passed, and therefore no occasion existed for any petition. Lafayette arrived, broke down the barricades already raised, had execrations and threats hurled abundantly at his head, and, finally, a shot fired at him, which, although discharged with deliberate aim, passed harmlessly by. The municipal officers having come to his aid, ultimately prevailed on the populace to disperse. The national guards were placed so as to observe their retreat, and for a moment hopes were entertained they would quietly separate; but the tumult shortly recommenced. Two invalids standing, it is unknown for what purpose, under the altar of the country, were massacred, and thereupon the disorder became universal and boundless. The assembly summoned the municipality, and charged it to watch over public order. Bailly repaired to the Champ de Mars, and unfolded the red flag, in token of martial law. The employment of force, whatever may have been alleged, was just and indispensable. New laws were desired, or they were not: if they were desired, it was necessary they should be executed; that some fixed and settled order should prevail; that insurrection should not be perpetual, and that the determinations of the assembly should not be open to modification by the *plebis-scita of the multitude. Bailly was, therefore, justified in adopting all means to secure the execution of the laws. He advanced with that calm courage which he had always evinced, received without injury some shots, and attempted in vain, amidst the din and uproar, to make the necessary summonses. Lafayette at first ordered the national guards to fire in the air; at this menace the crowd abandoned the altar, but soon rallied again. Thus reduced to extremity, he issued his orders to fire on the multitude. The first discharge laid low certain of the most seditious. Their number was exaggerated. Some have reduced it to thirty, others have raised it to four hundred, and the furious to some thousands. The latter were believed at the time, and a general terror was infused. So severe an example silenced the agitators for a period.†

As usual, all parties were accused of having excited this movement; and it is probable that several had co-operated in provoking it, for it was convenient for several. The king, the majority of the assembly, the national guard, the municipal and departmental authorities, were all in concert to establish the constitutional order of things; and they had to combat democracy within and aristocracy without. The assembly and the national guards composed that middle class, wealthy, enlightened, and prudent, who desired order and the supremacy of law; and under existing circumstances, they were naturally disposed to ally closely with the king, who, on his part, appeared cordially resigned to a limited authority. But if it suited them to stop at the point already reached, it was far otherwise with the aristocracy, which rested its hopes on discord and confusion; and with the populace, which was eager to gain more and rise higher. Barnave, as formerly Mirabeau, was the orator of that well-informed and moderate burgher class, and Lafayette its military chief. Danton and Camille-Desmoulins were the orators, and Santerre the general, of that multitude, anxious for supremacy in its turn. A few ardent or fanatical spirits were its representatives, as well in the assembly as in the new administrative bodies, and accelerated the era of its reign by their declamations.

The massacre of the Champ de Mars was the occasion of much obloquy to Lafayette and Bailly. But both, placing their duty on the observation of the law, and ready to sacrifice their popularity and lives in its enforcement, felt neither remorse nor fear for what they had done. The energy which they manifested awed the factious. The most prominent sought to shelter themselves from the punishment they deemed in store for them. Robespierre, who had hitherto supported the most violent propositions, trembled in his obscure dwelling; and, notwithstanding his inviolability as a deputy, besought an asylum from all his friends. Thus the example was not without effect; and, for a time, all the turbulent spirits were kept in check by their fears.

The assembly adopted at this period a determination which has been since greatly censured, but which was not so disastrous in its consequences as has been thought. It decreed that none of its members should be re-elected. Robespierre was the author of the proposition; and it was accounted for in him by the envy he felt towards colleagues amongst whom he had never distinguished himself. It was at least natural that he should bear them no good will, since he had been always embroiled with them; and in his feelings on the question, there might be at once conviction, envy, and malice. The assembly, accused as it was of a desire to perpetuate its power, and, furthermore, out of favour with the multitude for its moderation, hastened to repel all attacks by a disinterestedness perhaps too exaggerated, by deciding that its members should be excluded from the succeeding legislature. The new assembly was thus deprived of men whose enthusiasm was somewhat sobered, and whose legislative science had ripened in an experience of three years. But, when we treat of the causes of the subsequent revolutions, we shall be better enabled to judge what weight should be attached to that measure so often reprobated.

The time was at length arrived for concluding the constitutional labours, and closing in tranquillity so stormy a career. Certain members of the left side entertained the project of agreeing to a compromise, in order to remodel certain parts of the constitution. It had been resolved that the whole should be read over, so that it might be judged of in the aggregate, and its various articles made to harmonise; this was called the revision, and afterwards, in the days of republican fervour, was regarded as a culpable proceeding. Barnave and the Lameths had agreed with Malouet to modify certain articles framed in a hostile spirit to the royal prerogative, and to what was styled the stability of the throne. It was even alleged that they designed to re-establish the two chambers. It was arranged that, immediately after the perusal was finished, Malouet should make his attack, and that Barnave should afterwards reply to him with vehemence, the better to mask his real views; but that, whilst defending the major part of the articles, he should give up some as palpably dangerous, and condemned by the test of experience. Such were the stipulated conditions of this compact, when the ridiculous and irritating protests of the right side were made, in which it resolved to abstain from giving any future votes. Thenceforth all accommodation was out of the question: the left side would listen to no further overtures; and when the attempt was made, according to agreement, the shouts which rose from all parts prevented Malouet and his friends from proceeding.* The constitution

* [Laws made by the people alone, without the senate, in the Roman republic, were thus called.]

† This event occurred on the evening of Sunday the 17th July.

* Bouillé had an intimate friend in the Count de Gouvernet; and although their opinions were far from completely coinciding, they had a great esteem for each other. Bouillé, who pays little respect to the constitutionalists, expresses himself in the most honourable terms when he speaks of M. de Gouvernet, and seems to place entire confidence in him. To give an idea of what was passing in the assembly at this period, he cites the following letter in his memoirs, written to himself by the Count de Gouvernet, on the 26th August 1791:—

"I had given you hopes which I have now lost. That fatal constitution, which was intended to be revised, ameliorated, will not be so. It will remain as it is, a code of anarchy, a source of calamity; and our unfortunate destiny wills it that at the moment the democrats themselves become sensible of a portion of their errors, it is the aristocrats who, by refusing their aid, oppose the reparation. To enable you to understand the matter, and to justify myself in your eyes for having possibly given you was therefore concluded with some haste, and presented to the king for his acceptance. From that moment his liberty was restored, or, if the phrase be more suitable, the strict guard on the palace was relaxed, and he had power to go where he chose to study the constitutional act, and accept it with free will. But what course was open to Louis XVI.? To refuse the constitution was to abdicate in favour of a republic. The most sure, even upon his own system, was to accept, and trust to time for those restitutions of power which he conceived due to him. Accordingly, after the lapse of some days, he declared that the constitution was accepted by him (13th September). An extraordinary joy was evinced when this intelligence was promulgated, as if any real obstacle had been feared on the part of the king, or as if his sanction had been some unhoped-for concession. He repaired to the assembly, where he was hailed with the enthusiasm of better days. Lafayette, who never omitted an opportunity of healing the inevitable maladies of political troubles, proposed a general amnesty for all offences relative to the revolution. That amnesty was voted amidst shouts of joy, and the prisons were instantly thrown open. Finally, on the 30th September, Thouret, the last president, declared that the Constituent Assembly had terminated its sittings.

CHAPTER VII.

THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

The Constituent Assembly had closed its long and laborious career; and, notwithstanding its heroic false hopes, I must recur to things somewhat stale, and tell you all that has passed, since I have to-day a safe opportunity for writing to you.

On the day and the morrow of the king's departure, the two sides of the assembly remained in observation upon their respective movements. The popular party was in great consternation; the royalist party in great uneasiness. The least indiscretion might arouse the fury of the people. All the members of the right side kept silence, and those of the left side intrusted to their leaders the proposition of measures which they called 'of safety,' and which were opposed by no one. The second day after the departure, the Jacobins became threatening, and the constitutionalists moderate. They were then, and still are, much more numerous than the Jacobins. They spoke of accommodation, and of a deputation to the king. Two of them proposed a conference to M. Malouet, which was to have been opened the next day; but in the mean time the king's arrest became known, and the idea was dropped. However, their sentiments having been thus manifested, they saw themselves more than ever separated from the furious. The return of Barnave; the respect he had evinced towards the king and queen, whilst the ferocious Petion insulted their misfortunes; the gratitude their majesties testified to Barnave, changed in some sort the heart of that young man, hitherto steeled to pity. He is, as you know, the most culpable,* and one of the most influential in his party. He had, therefore, rallied around him four-fifths of the left side, not only to save the king from the fury of the Jacobins, but to restore him a portion of his authority, and likewise to give him means for defending himself in future, whilst adhering to the constitutional line of conduct. Of this latter part of Barnave's plan, only Lameth and Duport were apprised, for the constitutional mass still inspired sufficient distrust to render them uncertain of the majority of the assembly, except they could reckon on the right side; and they thought they might reasonably rely on it, when, in the revision of their constitution, they should grant more latitude to the royal authority.

Such was the state of things when I wrote to you. But fully convinced as I was of the infatuation and continual blunders of the aristocrats, I confess I did not foresee to what lengths they could push their absurdity.

When it was known that the king had been stopped at Varennes, the right side, in secret council, resolved to vote no more, nor to take any further part in the deliberations or debates of the assembly. Malouet was opposed to that determination. He represented to them that so long as the session lasted, and they assisted in its labours, they were under an obligation to give active opposition to measures dangerous to public order, and inimical to the fundamental principles of the monarchy. All his arguments were thrown away: they persisted in their resolution, and secretly drew up a protest against all that had been done. Malouet stated that he would continue to protest in the tribune, and ostensibly to use all his efforts to prevent the mischief. He told me that he was unable to bring over to his opinion more than thirty-five or forty members of the right side, and that he was very apprehensive this injudicious measure of the more zealous royalists would be productive of the most fatal consequences.

The general feeling of the assembly was at that time so favourable to the king, that, whilst he was on the road to Paris, Thouret having ascended the tribune to propose the manner in which the king should be guarded (I was at the sitting), a profound silence reigned in the hall and in the galleries. Almost all the members, even of the left side, bore an expression of dismay on hearing that infamous decree read; but not an individual spoke a word. The president was about to put it to the vote, when Malouet suddenly rose, and with an air of dignity, exclaimed, 'What are you about to do, gentlemen? After having arrested the king, it is proposed that you constitute him a prisoner by decree! Where does such a step lead you? Have you well considered it? You would order the imprisonment of the king!' 'No, no!' exclaimed several members of the left side, rising tumultuously. 'We do not mean that the king should be a prisoner;' and the decree would have been rejected almost unanimously, had not Thouret hastened to add—

'The member has misconceived the terms and the object of the decree. We have no more than himself an intention to imprison the king; it is for his safety and for that of the royal family that we propose these measures.' And it was only after this explanation that the decree passed; although the imprisonment has become real, and is shamelessly continued to this very day.

To the end of July the constitutionalists, who suspected the intended protest of the right side, without being quite certain of it, slowly prosecuted their plan of revision. They were more distrustful than ever both of Jacobins and aristocrats. Malouet appeared in their committee of revision. He spoke at first as to men who were perfectly aware of the dangers and faults of their constitution; but he found them little disposed to great reformations. They were afraid of losing their popularity. Target and Duport argued against him in defence of their work. The next day he met Chapelier and Barnave, who disdainfully refused to answer his animadversions, but ultimately acceded to a plan of attack, all the risk of which was to be incurred by him. He proposed to discuss, in the sitting of the 8th, all the principal articles of the constitutional act, and to demonstrate their vices. 'You, gentlemen,' said he, 'answer me; discharge upon me the full force of your indignation; defend your work successfully on the least dangerous articles, even on the majority of the points against which my censure shall be directed; and as to those which I designate as anti-monarchical, as impeding the action of government, say that neither the assembly nor the committee needed my observations in that respect; that you meant, in fact, to propose their amendment, and immediately move accordingly. Believe me, that such a course is possibly our only chance of maintaining the monarchy, and of making time available to give it all the props which are indispensable to it.' It was thus agreed; but the protest of the right side having transpired, and its dogged determination to vote no longer, depriving the constitutionalists of all hope of succeeding in their project of revision, which the Jacobins thwarted with all their power, they renounced it. Malouet, who had not regular communications with them, nevertheless made his attack. He solemnly repudiated the constitutional act as anti-monarchical, and in several particulars impracticable in execution. The development of his reasons was beginning to make considerable impression, when Chapelier, who had given up all idea of the agreement being observed, at once broke through it with cries of blasphemy, interrupting the speaker, and demanding that he be made to descend from the tribune; which was ordered. The following day, he confessed he had been wrong; but he said that he and his friends had given up all hope, the moment they were assured that no assistance was to be anticipated from the right side.

It was necessary that I should give you this long history, to prevent you losing all confidence in my prognostics. They are at the present moment most mournful; the evil is extreme; and to remedy it, I see but one resource, either at home or abroad, and that is the alliance of force with reason."—Mémoires de Bouillé, p. 282, et seq.

* [The text has been followed, but it is probable the word should be capable.]

courage, its scrupulous equity, its vast labours, it was execrated as revolutionary at Coblentz, and as aristocratical at Paris. To form a correct judgment upon that memorable assembly, in which the aggregate of talents was so rich and varied, the determination so bold and inflexible, and in which, for the first time perhaps, all the enlightened men of a nation were assembled together, with the will and the power to give reality to the theories of philosophy, it is necessary to consider the state in which it had found France and that in which it left her.

In 1789, the French nation was sensible and cognisant of all the evils that oppressed it, but the possibility of removing them was scarcely within the range of thought. Then, upon the unexpected demand of the parliaments, the states-general are convoked, the Constituent Assembly is formed, and marches into presence of the throne, majestic from its ancient supremacy, and disposed in its utmost condescension to sacrifice a few prized grievances. But that body is impressed with a sense of its own rights, proclaims itself the nation, and dares thunder it in the ear of an astounded government. Menaced by a powerful aris- (acy, a court, and an army, and not yet foreseeing po lar demonstrations, it declares itself inviolable, and wa power to respect that sanction; convinced of its una d rights it has to address enemies who are not so assured of theirs; and it prevails, by the simple expression of its will, over a sway of several centuries, and over an army f thirty thousand men. Therein is the whole revolution; it is its first and most glorious act; it is just, it is heroic; for never did a nation stand forth more legitimately or more perilously.

Power vanquished, it became necessary to reconstruct it on an equitable and expedient basis. But beholding that social ladder, at the top of which all good things are in such plentiful store—power, honours, riches; whilst at the foot, all is wanting, even the bread indispensable to life—the Constituent Assembly experienced a violent reaction in its sentiments, and was moved to level grades. Consequently, it decided that the mass of the citizens, perfectly equalised, should express i s will, whereof the king should stand in vested simply with the execution.

The error that it committed here did not consist in reducing royalty to a simple magistracy, for the king still left with sufficient authority to maintain the law and with more than is wielded by the magistrates in republics, but in believing that a king, with the recollections of what he had been, could resign himself to the change, and that a people but just aroused from a long lethargy, and in so recent possession of a portion of public power, would not insist upon its exclusive monopoly. All history proves, in fact, that an infinite subdivision of magistracies is indispensable; or, if a single chief be instituted, he should be so liberally endowed as to remove all desire for usurpation.

When nations, almost exclusively occupied with their private interests, feel a necessity for throwing the cares of government upon a chief, they do well to give themselves one; but in such case it is expedient that this chief, like the English sovereign, being empowered to convoke and dissolve national assemblies, not compelled to receive the law, but consenting to it only as it suits him, and impeded solely in perpetrating evil, should practically possess the greatest portion of the sovereignty. The dignity of man can easily comport with such a government, where the law is rigorously observed, where each citizen has a full sense of his own value, and knows that the high prerogatives invested in the monarch have been left to him only as an avowal of human weakness.

But it is not at the moment a nation suddenly springs to an appreciation of its dormant rights that it can consent to assume a secondary part, and voluntarily remit supremacy to a chief, in order that he may have no temptation to usurp it. The Constituent Assembly was no more capable of such an abdication than the nation itself. It consequently reduced royalty to a simple hereditary magistracy, hoping that the king would content himself with that position, still resplendant with honours, riches, and authority, and that the people would willingly leave it in that possession.

But whether the assembly formed that hope or not, could it, in the emergency, escape the difficulty? Could it suppress the king? or, on the other hand, could it give him all the power that England yields to its monarchs?

In the first place, it could not depose Louis XVI.; for, if it be always essential to observe justice in a government, it was not consulted in changing its form, when justice prevailed therein, and abruptly converting a monarchy into a republic. Besides, possession is entitled to respect; and if the assembly had despoiled the dynasty, what epithets would not its enemies have indulged in, when they accused it of violating property because it attacked the feudal abominations?

On the other hand, it could not grant the king an absolute veto, the nomination of judges, and other similar prerogatives, because public opinion was inimical to such concessions; and that opinion constituting its only strength, it was obliged to submit to its dictates.

With regard to the establishment of a single chamber, its error was more undoubted, perhaps, but equally inevitable. If it were dangerous to leave but the semblance of power to a king who had enjoyed its unlimited substance, and in front of a people eager to tear from him its last shred, it was much more false in principle to disregard social inequalities and gradations, when even republics admit them—when we find in all democracies a senate, either hereditary or elective. But it is vain to exact from men and from intelligence all they ought to have done at every epoch. How, in the midst of a revolt against the injustice of orders, was their necessity to be recognised? How constitute an aristocracy at the very instant of a crusade against aristocracy? To establish royalty would have been more easy, because, placed far from the people, its oppressions had been less galling, and because, in addition, it fulfilled functions which seemed more necessary.

But, I repeat, if these errors had not prevailed in the assembly, they were predominant in the nation; and the detail of subsequent events will demonstrate, that if the king and the aristocracy had been left all the prerogatives which were taken from them, the revolution would not the less have run its course, even to its last excesses.

To be convinced of the truth of this deduction, we ought to draw a line of distinction between revolutions which break out amongst populations long held in thraldom, and those which occur amongst free populations, that is to say, in possession of a certain political activity. At Rome, Athens, and elsewhere, we perceive nations and their rulers disputing for greater or less degrees of authority. With modern nations, long defrauded of their rights, the progress is quite different. Completely enslaved, they slumber long. The lethargy is shaken off by the enlightened classes, who arise and recover a portion of power. The process is successive; ambition is contagious, and finally spreads to the lowest classes; and the entire mass is stimulated into movement. Then, satisfied with what they have obtained, the enlightened classes desire to stop; but their efforts to stem the current are futile, and they are trodden under foot by those who press behind them. Such as would stop, be they but a remove from the lowest, are for the last an aristocracy; and in this contest of classes, surging tumultuously against each other, the simple burgher is ultimately called an aristocrat by the artisan, and assailed as such.

The Constituent Assembly presents to us that race of men who, urged by intelligence, first enters the lists against the yet overbearing power; sufficiently moderate to appreciate what is due to those who held all, and to those who possessed nothing, it desires to leave to the first a portion of what they possess, because they have always possessed it, and above all, to procure for the last knowledge, and the rights which are its consequence. But regrets torment the old possessors, ambition stimulates the rising classes: on the one hand, the object is to recover all, and on the other, to conquer all; and thus a war of extermination results. The members of this assembly, then, were those early patriots, who, shaking off slavery, attempt to institute an equitable order of government, prosecute the attempt unmoved by the difficulties that surround them, even achieve their mighty task, but fail at last by seeking to induce the one party to yield a portion, and the other to abstain from insisting upon all.

The Constituent Assembly, in its equitable adjustment, had manifested fitting respect for the old possessors. Louis XVI., with the title of King of the French, thirty millions a-year, the command of the armies, and the prerogative of suspending the national decrees, still enjoyed fair and enviable possessions. The remembrance of his absolute power can alone excuse him for not being satisfied with so brilliant a remnant of supremacy.

The clergy, deprived of immense estates which they had formerly received on condition of cherishing the poor whom they did not cherish, and of administering the gospel, the care of which they abandoned to indigent curates, no longer formed a political order; but their ecclesiastical dignities were preserved, their creed venerated, their scandalous affluence converted into a sufficient, and, indeed, it may be said, an abundant allowance, since it permitted a considerable parade of episcopal luxury. The nobles no longer formed an order, nor did they now enjoy the exclusive right of sporting, and other privileges of a like nature; they were likewise no longer exempt from taxes: but could they adduce such matters as objects of rational regret? Their immense possessions were left them, and instead of being dependent on court favour, they had the more certain and manly foundation of merit to rely upon for distinction. They were eligible to be elected by the people, and to represent it in the state, on the easy terms of evincing good feeling and resignation. The bar and the army were open to their talents: wherefore were they not actuated by a generous emulation? And why make so degrading a confession of incapacity, by lamenting the times of favouritism?

The Constituent Assembly had paid due consideration to old pensioners, had re-endowed the ecclesiastics, and, in a word, had treated every one with a regard as tender as the circumstances warranted; and we may ask, whether the lot it had accorded was, after all, so vastly insupportable?

The constitution being consummated, no hope remained to the king of recovering by deliberative means the prerogatives he so much regretted. Only one course was open to him, namely, to rest satisfied and observe the constitution, unless he relied upon foreign powers; but anticipating little from their zeal, and being distrustful of the emigrants, he at once decided for resignation; and what proves his sincerity is, that he wished frankly to express his opinion to the assembly upon the defects he perceived in the constitution. But from that desire he was dissuaded, and he resolved to expect from time the restitutions of power which he deemed due to him. The queen was not less resigned. "Courage!" said she to the minister Bertrand, as he entered her presence; "all is not yet lost. The king is determined to adhere to the constitution; that system is certainly the best." And we may be permitted to believe, that if she had really entertained any other sentiments, she would not have hesitated to express them in the presence of Bertrand de Molleville.*

The old assembly, then, had finally separated; its members had returned to the bosom of their families, or had spread themselves over the city of Paris. Some of the most eminent, such as Lameth, Duport, Barnave, kept up a communication with the court, and gave it the benefit of their counsels. But the king, all decided as he was to observe the constitution, could not bring himself to follow the advice tendered to him, for he was recommended not only not to violate that constitution, but also to make it clear to all minds, by

* The minister Bertrand de Molleville has exhibited the dispositions of the king and queen at the commencement of the Legislative Assembly, in terms which leave little doubt of their sincerity. He relates his first interview with those august personages in the following manner:—

"After having replied to some general observations which I had made upon the difficulties of the times, and on the numberless faults I must needs commit in a department with which I was unacquainted, the king said to me, 'Well—have you still any objection?' 'No, sire; the wish to obey and gratify your majesty is the only sentiment I feel; but, in order that I may know whether I can serve you usefully, it is necessary your majesty should have the goodness to communicate to me what plan you have determined upon relative to the constitution, and what conduct you desire your minister should pursue.' 'That is but proper,' replied the king. 'I do not regard this constitution as a masterpiece—far from it: I think it has very considerable faults, and that if I had enjoyed the liberty of addressing some observations to the assembly, very advantageous amendments might have resulted; but now the opportunity is past, and I have accepted it, such as it is. I have sworn to cause it to be executed, and I am bound to be strictly faithful to my oath, the more especially as I believe the most scrupulous execution of the constitution is the most certain means of making it understood by the nation, and of bringing it to perceive the alterations that ought to be made in it. I have not, nor can have, any other plan than that: I shall certainly not depart from it, and I desire that my ministers conform to it.'

'This plan appears to me extremely prudent, sire: I feel cordially disposed to follow it, and I incur the obligation. I have not sufficiently studied the new constitution, either in the aggregate or in the details, to have formed a settled opinion, and I shall abstain from adopting one, whatever it may be, until its execution has enabled the nation to appreciate it by its effects. But may I be permitted to ask your majesty, whether the opinion of the queen, on this point, be conformable to the king's?' 'Yes, perfectly—she will tell you so herself.'

I proceeded to the queen's apartment, and she, after expressing to me with great benignity her sense of the obligation she, as well as the king, had incurred towards me for having accepted the ministry under circumstances so critical, added these words, 'The king has informed you of his intentions relative to the constitution; do you not think that the only plan he ought to follow is to be faithful to his oath?' 'Yes, undoubtedly, madam.' 'Very well; be assured we shall not be made to swerve from our resolution. Come, M. Bertrand, let us take courage; I hope that with patience, firmness, and consistency, all is not yet lost.'"—Bertrand de Molleville, vol. vi. p. 22; in the English edition, vol. i. p. 214, of his Private Memoirs.

With the testimony of Bertrand de Molleville coincides that of Madame Campan, who, although sometimes a suspicious authority, has upon this occasion a great appearance of truth:—

"The constitution was, as I have said, presented to the king on the 3d September. I return to this presentation, because it afforded a subject for very grave deliberation. All the ministers, except M. de Montmorin, insisted upon the necessity of accepting the constitutional act in its entirety. This was also the advice of Prince Kaunitz. Malouet wished that the king should explain his views with sincerity upon the vices and dangers he remarked in the constitution. But Duport and Barnave, alarmed at the spirit that reigned in the Jacobin Club, and even in the assembly, where Robespierre had already denounced them as traitors to the country, and fearing great disasters, joined their voices to those of the majority of the ministers and of Prince Kaunitz. Those who were cordially desirous to maintain the constitution, advised that it should not be accepted purely and simply; of this number were, as I have said, Messieurs Montmorin and Malouet. The king seemed to prefer their opinion, and this is one of the greatest proofs of the unfortunate monarch's sincerity."—Memoirs of Madame Campan, vol. ii. p. 161.

his simplest actions, that he was sincerely attached to it. These three members of the late assembly, in coalition with Lafayette since the revision, were the leaders of that revolutionary generation which had given the first rules to liberty, and now desired that they might not be departed from. They were supported by the national guard, which long service under Lafayette had completely attached to that general and his principles. The members of the Constituent Assembly committed the indiscretion of holding in disdain the new assembly, and of irritating it by frequent sarcasms. A species of aristocratic vanity had already seized upon these first legislators, and they seemed to imagine that all legislative science had disappeared with them.

The new assembly was composed of different classes of men. It included many enlightened partisans of the first revolution, Ramond, Girardin, Vaublanc, Dumas, and others, who denominated themselves constitutionalists, and occupied the right side, where not one of the old privileged classes was found. Thus, in the natural and progressive march of the revolution, the left side of the first assembly became the right side of the second. Next to the constitutionalists was a numerous body of distinguished men, whose imaginations the revolution had heated, and enlarged the scope of their desires. Witnesses of the constituent labours, and tormented by the impatience common to those who contemplate others in action, they were of opinion that not sufficient had been accomplished; they dared not avow themselves republicans, because from all parts came recommendations to be faithful to the constitution; but the republican essay made during the flight of Louis XVI., and the suspected intentions of the court, perpetually brought the idea to their minds; and the state of constant hostility in which they found themselves with respect to the court, was calculated to attach them more strongly to it every day.

In this new generation of talents, those who principally attracted observation were the deputies from the department of the Gironde, whence the whole party, though formed by men from all the departments, was called the Girondist. Condorcet, an author distinguished for great comprehensiveness of ideas, and for the extremely rigorous cast of his mind and character, was its journalist; and Vergniaud, a ready, elegant, and seductive speaker, was its orator. This party, continually augmented by all who gave up the court in despair, was far from looking forward to such a republic as fell to it in 1793; it dreamt of a republic with all its alluring concomitants, its virtues, and austere manners. Enthusiasm and vehemence may be said to have been its chief characteristics.

This party likewise was destined to have its extreme members. These were, Bazire, Chabot, Merlin de Thionville, and others; inferior in talent, they surpassed the other Girondists in audacity. They became the party of the Mountain, when, after the overthrow of the throne, they seceded from the Gironde. Finally, this second assembly had, like the first, an intermediate mass, which, without any fixed engagement, voted first with one and then with the other. Under the Constituent Assembly, in which liberty really reigned, a similar body had remained independent; but since it had done so not through energy but from a spirit of indifference, in the subsequent assemblies, where violence raged uncontrolled, it became cowardly and despicable, and received the contemptuous and disgraceful epithet of "the Belly."

The clubs acquired at this period still greater importance. Agitators under the Constituent, they became dominators under the Legislative Assembly. The National Assembly not being numerous enough to embody all the ambitious spirits in the community, they had flocked to the clubs, where they found a tribune and scenes of excitement. To those resorts thronged all who were eager to speak, to agitate, to stimulate—that is to say, almost the entire nation. The people ran to so novel a spectacle; they occupied the galleries of all the meetings, and began about this time to find it a lucrative occupation, since the system of paying for applauses was now introduced. The minister Bertrand confesses that he himself had paid for them.

The oldest of the clubs, that of the Jacobins, already exercised an extraordinary influence. A whole church scarcely sufficed to contain the crowd of members and auditors. An immense amphitheatre was reared in form of a circus, and occupied all the great nave of the Jacobin church. A desk was placed in the centre, at which a president and secretaries were seated. A regular system of voting was pursued, and the decisions were recorded in a register. An active correspondence kept up the zeal of the societies spread over the whole surface of France, which were styled affiliated societies. This club, from its longer existence and its persevering violence, had invariably succeeded over all those who had attempted to inculcate more moderate, or even more vehement, counsels. The Lameths, together with all the distinguished men it contained, had abandoned it after the return from Varennes, and joined the Feuillants. In this latter were amalgamated all the essayists at moderate clubs, the attempts to form which had always been unsuccessful, inasmuch as they proceeded in direct contradiction to the spirit which prompts recourse to clubs, that of agitation. To the Feuillants were at that time joined the constitutionalists, or partisans of the first revolution. Hence the name of Feuillant became a passport to proscription, when that of moderate was one.*

Another club, that of the Cordeliers, had endeavoured to rival the Jacobins in violence. Camille-Desmoulins was its journalist, and Danton its leader. This latter, who had failed at the bar, had nevertheless known how to win the favour of the multitude, whom he strongly interested by his athletic frame, his sonorous voice, and his passions, so essentially popular. The Cordeliers had not been able, even by the aid of superior exaggeration, to prevail over their rivals, to whom custom secured a great concourse; but they were at the same time almost all members of the Jacobin club, and when any important point rendered it necessary, they repaired thither at the heels of Danton, to determine the majority in his favour.

Robespierre, whom we have seen during the Constituent Assembly distinguished for the rigorous violence of his principles, was excluded from the Legislative Assembly by the decree of non re-election, which he had himself contributed to have passed. He thenceforth confined himself to the Jacobins, where he ruled without a rival, from the dogmatism of his opinions, and from a reputation for integrity, which had procured him the name of "the incorruptible." Paralysed with terror, as we have seen, at the time of the revision, he had since plucked up fresh courage, and now prosecuted with unremitting attention the work of popularity. He had encountered two competitors whom he began to hate with great cordiality, namely, Brissot and Louvet. Brissot, who had mingled with all the most distinguished members

* [Bertrand gives the following account of the Feuillant Club:—"It was chiefly composed of the remains of the constitutional party of the first assembly, of the members of the Legislative Assembly, who had adopted similar opinions, and of a small number of moderate royalists, who, although they did not in this association find principles as pure as their own, considered it nevertheless as favourable to royalty, from the mere circumstance of its being opposed to Jacobinism, hoping that it might one day become a rallying point to the royalists who had not emigrated, and who, having no means of uniting, could offer to the king only a barren zeal and unavailing wishes. The motto of the club was, The constitution, the whole constitution, and nothing but the constitution."—Vol. v. p. 200. Such a rallying cry has been known in the history of other countries besides that of France.]

† of the first assembly, being the friend of Mirabeau and Lafayette, known as a republican, and one of the most eminent members of the Legislative, was fickle in character, but remarkable for certain intellectual qualities. Louvet, possessing great warmth of temperament, high mental powers, and unflinching boldness, formed one of those, who, overstepping the constitution, looked forward to a republic; he, therefore, naturally found himself drawn towards the Girondists. His contests with Robespierre soon attached him more closely to them. This party of the Gironde, gradually formed, as it were unintentionally, by men who had too much loftiness of mind to propitiate the populace, but were sufficiently distinguished to raise its envy and that of its leaders, and who were rather united by similarity of position than from actual concert, was, from its composition, sure to be brilliant but likewise weak, and incapable of standing before the more real factions which sprung up around it when the day of battle came.

Such, then, was the state of France. The old privileged classes had retired beyond the Rhine; the partisans of the constitution filled the right of the assembly, the national guard, and the Feuillant club; the Girondists had the majority in the assembly, but not in the clubs, where vulgar violence reigned supreme; finally, the hotheads of this new epoch, seated on the highest benches in the assembly, and on that account called the Mountain, were all-powerful in the clubs and over the populace.

Lafayette, having resigned all military rank, had been accompanied to his estate by the esteem and regret of his companions in arms. The command had not been delegated to a new general, but six heads of legions commanded in turns the whole national guard. Bailly, the faithful friend of Lafayette during these three painful years, likewise abdicated the mayoralty. The votes of the electors were divided between Lafayette and Pétion; but the court, determined to support Lafayette upon no consideration, although his sentiments were favourable to it, preferred Pétion, although an avowed republican. It anticipated much good from a sort of coldness which it took for stupidity, but was something very different; and it lavished large sums to secure him a majority.* He obtained it in consequence, and was nominated mayor of Paris (17th November). Pétion, with a cultivated mind, cold but deliberate in conviction, and possessed of much address, invariably aided the republicans in opposition to the court, and became linked to the Gironde from conformity of views, and the envy his new dignity excited amongst the Jacobins.

However, notwithstanding these dispositions of parties, if the king could have been relied upon, it is possible that the distrust of the Girondists might have been subdued, and the pretext of troubles being removed, that the agitators would have thenceforth been deprived of topics to exasperate the populace into acts of violence.

The intentions of the king were certainly formed, but owing to his feebleness of character, they were never irrevocable. It behoved him to demonstrate them in some signal manner before they could be trusted; and, whilst that proof was withheld, he was exposed to more than one outrage. Although the disposition of Louis XVI. was amiable, it was not without a certain dash of irritability; thus his resolutions might very easily be shaken by the first operations of the assembly. That body was formed, and with much ceremony took the oath upon the book of the constitution. Its first decree, relative to etiquette, abolished the titles of "sire" and "majesty," generally used towards the king. It furthermore ordered that, when he appeared in the assembly, he should be seated on a chair exactly similar to that occupied by the president.* These were the first bursts of the republican spirit, and the pride of Louis XVI. was acutely wounded. To escape from what he regarded as a humiliation, he resolved not to enter the assembly, and to send his ministers to open the legislative session. The assembly, repenting of its first hostility, revoked the decree the following day, thereby giving a rare example of contrition. The king accordingly proceeded thither, and was extremely well received. Unfortunately, it had been decreed that the deputies should remain seated if the king did so; this they carried into practice, and Louis XVI. esteemed it a fresh insult. The applauses wherewith he was covered were insufficient to heal the wound. He returned to the palace, pale, and with his countenance agitated. When alone with the queen, he threw himself on a sofa, sighing deeply. "Ah! madam," he exclaimed, "you have been a witness to this degradation! What! to come into France to see"—— The queen endeavoured to soothe him, but his heart was profoundly afflicted, and his good intentions were grievously shaken.†

But if he thenceforward turned his eyes to foreign succour alone, the dispositions of the powers were not calculated to afford him much hope. The declaration of Pilnitz had remained without effect, as well from deficiency of zeal in the sovereigns, as also from regard to the danger to which Louis XVI. was exposed, he being, since the return from Varennes, a prisoner of the Constituent Assembly. The acceptance of the constitution was an additional reason for waiting the course of events before proceeding to action. Such was the opinion of Leopold and his minister Kaunitz. Accordingly, when Louis XVI. had notified to the European courts that he accepted the constitution, and that his intention was to faithfully observe it, Austria returned a very pacific answer; Prussia and England did the same, and conveyed assurances of their amicable views. It is observable that neighbouring powers acted with more reserve than those at a distance, such as Sweden and Russia, because they were more immediately compromised by war. Gustavus, who contemplated a brilliant expedition against France, replied to the notification that he did not consider the king free. Russia delayed to explain herself. Holland, the principal Italian states, and especially Switzerland, gave satisfactory rejoinders. The Electors of Treves and Mayence, in whose territories the emigrants were located, used evasive expressions. Spain, besieged by emissaries from Coblentz, was equally cautious in her statements, alleging that she desired time to be convinced of the king's liberty; but she gave assurances, nevertheless, that she did not purpose to disturb the tranquillity of the kingdom.

Such replies, of which not one was decidedly hostile, the assured neutrality of England, the uncertainty of Frederick-William, the pacific and well-known dispositions of Leopold, all conduced to the supposition of peace. It is difficult to surmise what might be passing in the vacillating mind of Louis XVI., but his evident interest, and the fears with which war at a later date inspired him, must lead to the conclusion that he was likewise anxious for the preservation of peace. Amidst this general concert, the emigrants alone persisted in wishing for war, and in making preparations for it.

* [The court, acting upon that spirit of infatuation which seems common to all ages, factions, and ranks, prompting political parties to prefer a man of extreme opinions to one more nearly approximating to their own principles, opposed Lafayette upon this occasion, according to the avowal of Bertrand de Molleville himself. "The court," says he, "detesting M. de Lafayette, and fearing above all his ambition and intrigues, openly favoured Pétion. 'M. de Lafayette,' said the queen to me on this occasion, 'only desires to be Mayor of Paris, with the view of being soon after Mayor of the palace. Pétion is a republican and a Jacobin, but he is a fool, incapable of ever being the leader of a party; he will be a nullity of a mayor!'"—Bertrand's Annals, vol. v. p. 106. Pétion was elected mayor on the 17th November, by a majority over Lafayette of 6728 to 3126.]

* Decree of the 5th October.

† See Madame Campan, vol. ii. p. 129.

They still resorted in crowds to Coblentz. There they armed with activity, collected magazines, outbid competition for munitions, formed regiments (which were certainly not filled up, since none were disposed to become private soldiers), established grades which were exposed to sale, and, if they attempted nothing really dangerous, they nevertheless made great preparations, which they themselves deemed formidable, and which tended very naturally to alarm the popular imagination.

The important point was to ascertain whether Louis XVI. was countenancing them or not; and it was difficult to believe that he was not well disposed towards relatives and servants who were taking arms to restore him his ancient powers. There needed the most perfect sincerity, and its continual demonstration, to corroborate a contrary opinion. The king's letters to the emigrants conveyed an invitation, and even an order, to return; but he had, it was rumoured, a secret correspondence which belied his public correspondence, and counteracted its effects. It is doubtless impossible to deny a secret intercourse with Coblentz, but I am far from believing that Louis XVI. used it for the purpose of contradicting the injunctions which he had publicly addressed to the emigrant princes.* It was his clear and incontestible interest that they should return. Their presence at Coblentz could only be useful in as far as they designed to invade; now, Louis XVI. shuddered above all things at the idea of a civil war. Not desiring, therefore, to employ their swords upon the Rhine, it was better that he should have them near him, in order that they might assist him in emergency, and join their efforts to those of the constitutionalists in protecting his person and throne. Besides, their continuance at Coblentz provoked severe laws, which he was unwilling to sanction; his refusal would compromise him with the assembly, and we shall in fact see that it was the use he made of the veto which completely turned the popular feeling against him, by rendering him suspected as an accomplice of the emigrants. It would be strange if he had not perceived the force of these reasons, with which all his ministers were impressed. They were unanimously of opinion that the emigrants ought to return, in order to defend the person of the king, to put an end to alarm, and to remove all pretext for agitation. Such was even the opinion of Bertrand de Molleville, whose principles were not peculiarly constitutional. "It was necessary," says he, "to use all possible means for increasing the popularity of the king. The most efficacious and certain of all, at this moment, was to recall the emigrants. Their return, so generally desired, would have revived in France the royalist party, which the emigration had completely disorganised. This party, strengthened by the odium into which the assembly had fallen, by the numerous deserters from the constitutional party, and by all the discontented, would have speedily become sufficiently powerful to render decisive the explosion which might, sooner or later, be certainly anticipated."*

Louis XVI., conforming to this counsel of his ministers, addressed exhortations to the principal officers of the army and navy, recalling them to a sense of their duty, and to the retention of their commands. But such exhortations were utterly disregarded, and the desertion continued uninterruptedly. The minister of war came forward to announce the desertion of nineteen hundred officers. The assembly could not moderate its wrath, and resolved to take most vigorous measures to stop the evil. The Constituent had restricted itself to pronouncing deprivation against all public functionaries leaving the kingdom, and levying on the possessions of emigrants a triple contribution, to indemnify the state for the services of which their absence deprived it. The new assembly proposed more severe penalties.

Various motions were submitted. Brissot distinguished three classes of emigrants—the leaders of the desertion, the public functionaries who forsook their duties, and, lastly, those whom fear had impelled to fly their native country. The full measure of punishment should be meted to the first classes, said he, but the last might be contemned and pitied.

It is quite certain that the liberty of man does not consist with his being chained to a particular soil; but when positive knowledge is acquired from a number of concurrent circumstances, that citizens are abandoning their country in order to collect together without its limits and stir up war against it, in such cases it is clearly allowable to adopt precautions against projects so fraught with danger.

A long and obstinate debate ensued upon the question. The constitutionalists opposed all the proposed measures, and maintained that futile schemes ought to be held in contempt, according to the plan always pursued by their predecessors. However, the opposing party prevailed, and a preliminary decree was passed, enjoining Monsieur, the king's brother, to return within two months, or in default thereof, condemning him to forfeit his eventual right to the regency. Another more severe decree was passed against the emigrants in general; it declared that the French assembled beyond the frontiers of the kingdom were suspected of a conspiracy against France; that if, on the first day of the ensuing January, they should still continue assembled, they should be deemed guilty of conspiracy, prosecuted as such, and punished with death; and that the incomes of those in contumacy should be during their lives received for the national benefit, without prejudice to the rights of wives, children, and legitimate creditors.†

The act of emigrating not being in itself reprehensible, it is difficult to assign the point distinctly at which it becomes so. What the law could equitably do, was to publish beforehand who would be held culpable in certain cases; and all those who were desirous of not being so held, had only to yield obedience. Those who, after notice of the period at which absence from the kingdom would become a crime, did not return, thereby voluntarily consented to pass for criminals. Those who, without warlike or political motives, were beyond the kingdom, were bound to hasten their return; it was but a slight sacrifice to

* It is Madame Campan who has favoured us with the information that the king kept up a secret correspondence with Coblentz:—

"Whilst the couriers were on the road with the confidential letters of the king to the princes his brothers, and to the foreign princes, the assembly invited the king to address the princes, urging them to return into France. The king directed the Abbé de Montesquiou to draw up the letter which he ought to send. This letter, admirably written, expressed in a simple and touching style, so analogous to the character of Louis XVI., and replete with strong arguments upon the advantage of rallying to the principles of the constitution, was intrusted to me by the king, with orders to make him a copy.

At this period, M. Mor——, one of the intendants of Monsieur's household, obtained a passport from the assembly, enabling him to visit the prince, on account of some matter of essential interest to his affairs. The queen selected him to bear this letter; she determined upon giving it him herself, and explaining to him its purport. The choice of such a courier surprised me: the queen assured me it was the best in the world, that she reckoned upon his indiscretion, and that it was merely essential the public should be made acquainted with the king's letter to his brothers. The princes were, doubtless, forewarned in the private correspondence. Monsieur, however, showed some surprise; and the messenger returned more afflicted than satisfied with such a mark of confidence, which nearly cost him his life during the reign of terror."—Madame Campan, vol. ii. p. 172 the safety of a state, that a traveller for pleasure or business should curtail the extent of his journey.

* Vol. vi. p. 42. † Decrees of the 28th October and 9th November.

The king, with the view of gratifying the assembly and public opinion, sanctioned the decree which ordered Monsieur to return, under penalty of losing his right to the regency; but he affixed his veto to the law against the emigrants. The ministers were ordered to repair in a body to the assembly, with the announcement of the king's resolves.* They first read over various decrees to which the sanction was given. When that upon the emigrants came in its turn, a marked silence pervaded the assembly; and upon the keeper of the seals pronouncing the official formula, "the king will examine," great discontent was manifested on all sides. He desired to detail the reasons of the rejection, but several voices rose against this course, exclaiming to the minister, that the constitution granted the king the right of opposing, but not that of assigning motives. The minister was accordingly obliged to desist, leaving behind him a rankling feeling of irritation. This first resistance on the king's part to the measures of the assembly was a definitive rupture; for, although he had sanctioned the decree which deprived his brother of the regency, his refusal of the second was deemed an incontestible proof of his partiality towards the insurgents of Coblentz. None forgot at such a moment that he was their relative, their friend, and, in some sort, their copartner in interest; and it was held impossible for him to abstain from making common cause with them against the nation.

On the following day, Louis XVI. gave publication to a proclamation against the emigrants, and two individual letters to his brothers. The reasons which he urged upon both the one and the other of these parties were excellent, and apparently advanced in good faith. He solicited them to put an end, by their return, to the suspicions which the malevolent took such pains to disseminate; he entreated them not to reduce him to the necessity of employing harsh measures against them; and as to his want of liberty, upon which such stress was laid to disregard his injunctions, he adduced as a proof of the contrary, the veto he had just exercised in their favour.† However cogent these reasons might be, they produced neither at Coblentz nor at Paris the effect they were calculated, or appeared calculated, to have wrought. The emigrants did not return; and in the assembly the tone of the proclamation was judged too mild, and even the power of the executive to issue one at all was contested. It, in fact, was too deeply irritated to be contented with a proclamation, and especially to suffer a useless measure to be substituted by the king for the energetic measures it had resolved to adopt.

Another trial of a similar description was imposed on Louis XVI. at the same period, and led to an equally unfortunate result. The first religious troubles had broken loose in the west, and the Constituent Assembly had sent thither two commissioners, one of whom was Gensonné, subsequently so celebrated in the Girondist party. Their report had been made to the Legislative Assembly, and, though drawn up with great moderation, had filled it with indignation. It will be remembered that the Constituent Assembly, when suspending from their functions the priests who refused to take the oath, had nevertheless left them a pension, and liberty to celebrate divine worship apart. Since then they had never ceased to excite the people against their conforming brethren, and to uphold them as impious persons, whose ministry was null and dangerous. They dragged the peasants after them for long distances to hear the ritual of mass. These latter were

* Sitting of the 12th November.

† LETTER OF THE KING TO LOUIS-STANISLAUS-XAVIER, FRENCH PRINCE, BROTHER OF THE KING.

"Paris, 11*th November* 1791.

I wrote to you, my brother, on the 16th of October last, and you could have no reason to doubt my real sentiments. I am astonished that my letter has not produced the effect I was justified in anticipating. To recall you to your duties, I have urged all the motives which must most nearly touch you. Your absence is a pretext for all the malevolent, a sort of excuse for all the misguided French, who think they are serving me by keeping all France in a disquiet and agitation which form the torments of my life. The revolution is finished, the constitution consummated, France eager for it, and I determined to maintain it; the safety of the monarchy depends at this moment upon its stability. The constitution has given you rights; it has imposed a condition upon their enjoyment which you ought to hasten to fulfil. Believe me, my brother, and discard the doubts that are sought to be impressed upon you regarding my liberty. I am about to prove, by a very solemn act, and in a matter affecting you, that I may act freely. Prove you to me that you are my brother and a Frenchman, by yielding to my wishes. Your proper place is by my side; your interest, your feelings, equally move you to return and resume it. I invite you to do so, and, if necessary, I order you.

(Signed) LOUIS."

MONSIEUR'S REPLY TO THE KING.

"Coblentz, 3*d December* 1791.

SIRE, MY BROTHER AND LORD—The Count de Vergennes has delivered to me, on the part of your majesty, a letter, the superscription on which, notwithstanding it contained my baptismal names, was so different from my address, that I thought of returning it to him unopened. However, upon his positive assurance that it was for me, I opened it, and the name of brother, which I there found, having removed from my mind all doubt, I read it with the respect I owe to the writing and signature of your majesty. The order which it contains for me to repair to your majesty's side is not the free expression of your will, and my honour, my duty, my affection even, equally debar me from obeying it. If your majesty seeks to know all my motives more in detail, I entreat you to refer to my letter of the 10th of last September. I likewise entreat your majesty to graciously receive the expression of those sentiments, as affectionate as respectful, with which I am," &c. &c.

LETTER FROM THE KING TO CHARLES-PHILIP, FRENCH PRINCE, BROTHER OF THE KING.

"Paris, 11*th November* 1791.

You are undoubtedly aware of the decree which the National Assembly has passed relative to Frenchmen out of the country; I do not think it incumbent on me to give my consent thereto, fondly persuading myself that gentle means will more effectually attain the object that is proposed, and which the interest of the state demands. The various overtures I have made to you, must remove all doubt from your mind as to my intentions and desires. Public tranquillity and my personal comfort are dependent on your return. You cannot continue a line of conduct which distracts France and afflicts me, without disregarding your most essential duties. Spare me the pain of sanctioning severe measures against you; consult your true interests; allow yourself to be guided by the attachment you owe to your country; in a word, yield to the wish of the French nation and to that of your king. Such a resolve on your part will be a proof of your sentiments towards me, and will assure you the continuance of those I have always entertained towards you. (Signed) LOUIS."

ANSWER OF THE COUNT D'ARTOIS TO THE KING.

"Coblentz, 3*d December* 1791.

SIRE, MY BROTHER AND LORD—The Count de Vergennes delivered me yesterday a letter which he assured me had been addressed to me by your majesty. The superscription giving me a title which I cannot admit, led me to believe that this letter was not intended for me; but, having recognised your majesty's seal, I opened it, and I respected the writing and the signature of my king; but the total omission of the name of brother, and more than all, the decisions referred to in that letter, have given me an additional proof of the moral and physical captivity in which our enemies dare to retain your majesty. After this avowal, your majesty will expect that, faithful to my duty and the laws of honour, I should pay no obedience to orders evidently wrested by violence.

Furthermore, the letter which I had the honour of transmitting to your majesty, in conjunction with Monsieur, on the 10th of last September, contains the sentiments, principles, and determinations from which I shall never swerve; to it, therefore, I unreservedly refer; it will be the basis of my conduct, and I here repeat the oath it sets forth. I humbly entreat your majesty to receive the homage of those feelings, as tender as respectful, with which I am, sire, &c. &c."

exasperated at seeing their church occupied by a worship which they believed evil, and at being obliged to seek, so far from their homes, the one they believed good. They frequently even attacked the conforming priests and their followers. Civil war thus became imminent.* Additional information was gathered by the assembly, which exhibited the danger in a yet more alarming light. It thereupon resolved to adopt, against these fresh enemies of the constitution, mea-

* The report of Messrs Gallois and Gensonné is, without contradiction, the best historical evidence of the beginning of the troubles in La Vendée. The origin of those troubles is its most interesting part, because it demonstrates their causes. I have, therefore, deemed it necessary to give that report. It appears to me to illustrate one of the most curious portions in that disastrous history.

Report of Messrs Gallois and Gensonné, Civil Commissioners, dispatched into the departments of La Vendée and of the Deux-Sevres, by virtue of decrees of the Constituent Assembly, rendered to the Legislative Assembly on the 9th October 1791.

Gentlemen—The National Assembly decreed on the 16th of last July, on the Report of its Committee of Inquiry, that civil commissioners should be dispatched into the department of La Vendée, to obtain all the information they could procure as to the causes of the late troubles in that quarter; and to assist the administrative bodies in the re-establishment of public tranquillity.

On the 23d July we were intrusted with this mission, and we departed two days afterwards for Fontenoy-le-Comte, the chief town of that department.

After a few days spent in conferences with the administrators of the Directory upon the situation of affairs and the state of public feeling, and after agreeing with the three administrative bodies upon certain preliminary measures for the maintenance of public order, we determined to proceed into the different districts which composed that department, in order to examine how much of truth or falsehood, how much of reality or exaggeration, there existed in the complaints which had already reached us; in short, to enable us to ascertain, with the greatest possible precision, the situation of that department.

We have traversed it in almost its whole extent, sometimes for the purpose of gaining information which was necessary to us, at other times for the purpose of maintaining peace, suppressing public disturbances, or preventing violences to which certain citizens believed themselves exposed.

We have heard in several district-directories all the municipalities of which each of them is composed; we have paid the greatest attention to all the citizens who had either facts to communicate or views to suggest; we have carefully collected and compared all the details which have come to our knowledge; but as our information has been more bulky than varied—as throughout, the facts, complaints, and observations have been similar—we shall present to you, under a general point of view, and in an abridged but exact form, the result of this mass of particular facts.

We consider it unnecessary to lay before you the details which we gleaned concerning anterior troubles; they do not, in our judgment, appear to have any very direct influence upon the actual condition of that department; besides, the law of amnesty having stayed the different proceedings to which those troubles had given rise, we could only present you with vague conjectures and uncertain deductions upon those matters.

The period for administering the ecclesiastical oath was in the department of La Vendée the first era of its troubles; previously, the people had enjoyed profound tranquillity. At a distance from the great centre of action and strife, disposed by their natural character to a love of peace, to a disposition for order, and to respect for the law, they reaped the benefits of the revolution without undergoing any of its storms.

In rural districts, the difficulty of intercourse, the simplicity of a life purely agricultural, the lessons of infancy, and the inculcation of religious emblems calculated to keep regard alive, have disposed their minds to a multitude of superstitious impressions, which, in the present state of things, no species of instruction can either destroy or modify.

Their religion, that is to say, such as they conceive religion, is become the most powerful, and, so to speak, the only moral observance of their lives. The most essential object it presents to them is the worship of images; and the minister of that worship, he whom the inhabitants of the country regard as the dispenser of celestial favours, as able, by the power of his prayers, to mitigate the severity of seasons, and as disposing of happiness in a future state of existence, has centred upon his own person all the most tender as well as the most energetic affections of their souls.

The constancy of the people of this department in the established order of their religious actions, and the unlimited confidence enjoyed by the priests to whom they are accustomed, form one of the principal elements of the troubles which have agitated, and may still continue to agitate, it.

It is easy to conceive with what activity mistaken or factious priests have brought these dispositions of the people into play for their own advantage; they have neglected nothing to stimulate zeal, alarm consciences, strengthen irresolute characters, and sustain those of a more decided cast; into some have been instilled feelings of disquietude and remorse, into others hopes of happiness and salvation; upon almost all has been tried successfully the influence of seduction or fear.

Several amongst these ecclesiastics are themselves sincere; they seem deeply imbued both with the ideas they disseminate and the sentiments they inspire; others are accused of covering with zeal for religion interests much more dear to their hearts. These last assume a political activity which increases or moderates according to circumstances.

A formidable coalition has been formed between the late Bishop of Luçon and a part of the old clergy of his diocese; a plan of opposition has been arranged to the execution of decrees intended to be put in force in any of their parishes; charges and inflammatory writings sent from Paris, have been addressed to all the priests to strengthen them in their resolutions, or to urge them into a confederation which is represented as general. A circular letter from M. Bauregard, grand-vicar to M. de Merci, late Bishop of Luçon, deposited at the register of the tribunal of Fontenay, and which that ecclesiastic has since acknowledged in his interrogatory, will enable you to form an exact opinion, both upon the secret of that coalition and upon the skilfully combined movements of those composing it. We consequently include it:—

Letter dated from Luçon, the 31st May 1791, under cover to the address of the Incumbent of La Réorthe.

"A decree of the National Assembly, sir, under date of the 7th May, grants to the ecclesiastics whom it has pretended to supersede for refusing the oath, the use of the parish churches merely to say mass within. The same decree authorises Roman Catholics, as well as all dissenters, to assemble together for the exercise of their religious services in any place they may select for such purpose, upon condition that in public discourses nothing shall be said against the civil constitution of the clergy.

The privilege granted to the legitimate pastors by the first article of this decree, must be regarded as a snare, the more dangerous, inasmuch as the faithful will not meet in the churches upon which the intruders have seized, with other instructions than those of their false pastors; inasmuch as they will not be able to receive the sacraments from any but their hands, and thus they must have with these schismatic pastors a communication which the laws of the church forbid. In order to obviate so great an evil, the incumbents will perceive the necessity of securing, with all possible haste, a place in which they may, by virtue of the second article in this decree, exercise their functions and gather into one fold their faithful parishioners, after their pretended successors have seized upon their churches; without this precaution, the Catholics will be drawn, by the fear of losing the celebration of mass and the divine offices, and by listening to the voice of false pastors, into communication with them, and exposed to the almost inevitable perils of seduction.

In parishes where there are few wealthy proprietors, it will be, doubtless, difficult to find a suitable locality, and to procure sacred vases and ornaments; but a simple granary, a portable altar, a vesture of calico, or some other common stuff, and pewter vases, will suffice, in such cases of necessity, to celebrate the holy mysteries and the divine offices.

Such simplicity and poverty, by recalling to us the first ages of the church, and the dawn of our holy religion, may be a powerful means of exciting zeal in ministers, and fervour in the faithful. The first Christians had no other temples than their houses; there were gathered together the shepherds and the flock to celebrate the holy mysteries, to hear the word of God, and to sing the praises of the Lord. During the persecutions wherewith the church was afflicted, forced to abandon their temples, they were seen retiring into caverns, and even into tombs; and these times of trial were the eras of greatest fervour to the true faithful. There must be very few parishes in which the incumbents will be unable to procure a place and ornaments such as I have just described; and, until they are provided with the necessary articles, those of their neighbours, who shall not be superseded, will be able to assist them with what they have at disposal in their sures similar in character to those it had taken against the armed enemies beyond the Rhine, and also to make a further trial of the king's real dispositions.

The Constituent Assembly had enjoined all priests to take the civic oath. Those who refused to take it, although deprived of their character as ministers of own churches. We shall be provided with a continual supply of sacred stones for all who may need them, and, from the present time, we are enabled to authorise the cups or vases to be consecrated which may be used in lieu of them.

The Bishop of Luçon, in a separate communication which he has transmitted to us as supplementary to the charge of the Bishop of Langres, and which will be distributed in like manner through the different dioceses, proposes to the incumbents:—

1st, To keep a two-fold register, in which shall be inscribed the baptisms, marriages, and burials of the Catholics in the parish; one of these registers will remain with themselves, the other will be deposited every year in the hands of a trustworthy person.

2d, Independently of this register, the incumbents will keep another, likewise two-fold, in which shall be recorded the acts of dispensation concerning marriages, which they may have granted by virtue of the powers which are given them by the 18th article of the charge; these acts shall be signed by two sure and faithful witnesses; and to give them greater authenticity, the registers intended to record them shall be approved, indorsed, and signed by the bishop, or, in his absence, by one of his vicars-general. A counterpart of this register shall be placed, as is said above, in the hands of a trustworthy person.

3d, The incumbents will delay, if it be possible, retiring from their churches and manses, until their pretended successors have notified to them the certificate of their nomination and institution, and let them protest against all that may be done in consequence.

4th, They will draw up in secret a report of the installation of the pretended incumbent, and of the invasion by him effected of the parochial church and manse. In this report, of which I subjoin a model, they will formally protest against all acts performed under the jurisdiction which he claims to exercise as incumbent of the parish; and to give this document all possible authenticity, it shall be signed by the incumbent, his curate, if he have one, and a neighbouring priest, and even by two or three pious and discreet laymen, using all precautions, nevertheless, not to betray the secret.

5th, Those of the incumbents, whose parishes may be declared suppressed without the intervention of the legitimate bishop, will put in use the same means; they will always consider themselves as the only legitimate pastors of their parishes; and if it were absolutely impossible to remain therein, they shall endeavour to procure a residence in the vicinity, and within reach of administering to the spiritual wants of their parishioners; and they will take great care to forewarn and impress upon the faithful their duties in that respect.

6th, If the civil power opposes the faithful Catholics having a common cemetery, or if the relatives of deceased persons evince too great a repugnance to their being buried in a separate place, though specially blessed, as is mentioned in the 19th article of the charge, after the legitimate pastor, or one of his representatives, shall have repeated at the house the prayers prescribed by the ritual, and shall have drawn up the mortuary certificate, which is to be signed by the relatives, the body of the deceased shall be borne to the door of the church, and the relatives may accompany it so far, but they shall be warned to retire the moment the intrusive incumbent or his curates come to lift the body, so that they may not participate in the ceremonies and prayers of those schismatic priests.

7th, In all documents, when their title of incumbent shall be denied, the superseded incumbents will sign with their christian and surnames, without adding any quality.

I beg you, sir, and those of your brethren to whom you may deem it fitting to communicate my letter, to have the goodness to inform us the instant of your displacement, if it take place, of the installation of your pretended successor, and of the most remarkable circumstances, of the dispositions of your parishioners upon the event, of the measures you think it proper to take for the service of your parish, and of your residence, if you are absolutely forced to quit it. You can have no doubt that all these details will greatly interest us; your troubles are ours; and our most ardent wish is to be able, by participating them, to alleviate their weight.

I have the honour to be, with respectful and inviolable attachment, your very humble and very obedient servant."

These manœuvres have been powerfully assisted by certain missionaries established in the town of Saint Laurent, district of Montaigu; it is, indeed, to the activity of their zeal, to their furtive intrigues, to their indefatigable and secret exhortations, that we are led principally to attribute the dispositions of a considerable portion of the people throughout the department of La Vendée, and in the district of Châtillon, department of the Deux-Sevres. It is of essential importance to fix the attention of the National Assembly upon the conduct of these missionaries, and the spirit of their institution.

This establishment was founded about sixty years ago, for a society of secular priests living on alms, and intended, in the capacity of missionaries, to preach. These missionaries, who have gained the confidence of the people by artfully distributing chaplets, medals, and indulgences, and by planting on the roads of all this part of France Calvaries of all forms, have since become sufficiently numerous to form new establishments in other parts of the kingdom. They are found in the late provinces of Poitou, Anjou, Bretagne, and Aunis, devoted with the same energy to the success, and to the in some sort perpetual duration, of this species of religious practices, rendered by their assiduous labours the only religion of the people. The town of Saint-Laurent is their chief seat; they have recently built there a large and handsome convent, and have acquired, it is said, other territorial property.

This congregation is connected, by the nature and spirit of the institution, with an establishment of grey sisters, founded in the same town, and known under the name of "Daughters of Wisdom." Devoted in this department, and in several others, to the service of the poor, and particularly of hospitals, they form a highly active medium of correspondence for these missionaries with almost the whole kingdom. The house at Saint-Laurent has become the place of their retreat, where the intolerant fury of their zeal, or other circumstances, have compelled the administrators of hospitals which they attended, to dispense with their aid.

To enable you to form an opinion upon the conduct of these hot headed missionaries, and upon the moral tendency of the religion they profess, it will be sufficient to lay before you an abridged summary of the maxims contained in different manuscripts, seized upon them by the national guards of Angers and Chollet.

These manuscripts, drawn up in the form of a catechism for the country people, establish as axioms that constitutional priests, stigmatised as intruders, cannot be applied to for the administration of the sacraments; that all those who participate in such celebration, even by presence alone, are guilty of a mortal crime, and that only ignorance or weakness of intellect can be pleaded in forgiveness; that those who shall have the audacity to get married by the intruders, will not be married, but will draw down upon themselves and their children the divine curse; that matters will be so arranged as to ensure the validity of marriages performed by the old incumbents, but that, in the mean time, they must submit to all extremities; that if the children are not deemed legitimate, they shall be so nevertheless; that, on the contrary, the children of those who shall have been married before the intruders, will be truly bastards, because God will not have ratified their union, and that it is better a marriage should be held null before men than before God; that they must not apply to the new incumbents for burials; and that if the former incumbent cannot perform them without endangering his life and liberty, the relatives or friends of the deceased must themselves inter them secretly.

It is furthermore observed that the old incumbent will take care to keep an exact register for recording these different ceremonies; that it is certainly possible the civil tribunals will pay no regard to them, but such an evil is one which must be endured; that the civil registration is a precious advantage which must nevertheless be dispensed with, because it is better to be deprived of it than to apostatise by applying to an intruder.

Finally, all the faithful are exhorted to hold no communication with the intruder, or take any part in his intrusion. It is declared that the municipal officers who shall instal him will be apostates like himself, and that, at the same moment, the sacristans, choristers, and bell-ringers, are bound to throw up their employments.

Such, gentlemen, is the absurd and seditious doctrine which these manuscripts embody, and of which the public voice accuses the missionaries of Saint-Laurent of having rendered themselves the most zealous propagators.

They were denounced at the time to the Committee of Inquiry of the National Assembly; and the silence which was observed regarding them has but added to the activity of their efforts and augmented their fatal influence.

We have deemed it indispensable thus to bring under your con-the national religion, and of their stipends as paid by the state, preserved their pensions as simple ecclesiastics, and the liberty of privately exercising their ministry. Nothing could be more mild and moderate than such a system of repression. The Legislative Assembly now again required the oath, and deprived sideration the abridged analysis of the principles contained in these writings, such as is promulgated in a resolution of the department of Maine-and-Loire, of the 5th June 1791, because it is sufficient to compare them with the circular letter of the grand vicar of the late Bishop of Luçon, to be convinced that they belong to a general system of opposition to the decrees respecting the civil organisation of the clergy; and the actual state of a majority of the parishes in that department, is simply the result of the developement of that system, and the principles of that doctrine put almost universally into action.

The too tardy displacement of the incumbents has greatly contributed to the success of this coalition. This delay was at first rendered unavoidable by the refusal of M. Servant, who, after being named to the bishopric of the department, and accepting the office, declared, on the 10th April, that he withdrew his acceptance. M. Rodrigue, the present bishop of the department, whose moderation and firmness are almost his sole supports in a position surrounded by turmoil and alarm, could not be nominated earlier than the first days in May. By that time, measures of resistance had been calculated and determined according to an uniform plan; the opposition was avowed, and in full activity; the grand-vicars and incumbents had come together and were firmly united by a common tie; the jealousies, rivalries, and quarrels of the old ecclesiastical hierarchy had had time to disappear, and all interests were merged in one common interest.

The displacement could only be effected in part; the great majority of the old ecclesiastical functionaries still continue in the parishes, invested with their ancient functions; the later nominations have scarcely any where been successful; and the newly-elected persons, alarmed at the prospect of the numberless disputes and annoyances which their nomination holds out to them, answer only by refusals.

This division into juring and non-juring priests has established a veritable schism amongst the people of their parishes; families are divided, women have been seen, and in fact are seen daily, separating from their husbands, and children abandoning their fathers. The state of the citizens is only transmitted, generally speaking, upon loose sheets, and the person who receives them, not being invested with any public character, is unable to give to such a description of proof a legal authenticity.

The municipalities have fallen into disorganisation, and the greatest number of them purposely avoid taking part in the displacement of the non-juring incumbents.

A considerable portion of the citizens have renounced the service of the national guard, and that which remains could not be employed without risk, in any movements which should have for principle or object acts concerning religion, because the people would then look upon the national guards, not as the impassible instruments of the law, but as the agents of a party opposed to their own.

In several districts of the department, an administrator, a judge, a member of the electoral body, are viewed with aversion by the people, because they concur in the execution of the law relative to ecclesiastical functionaries.

This disposition of the popular mind is the more to be deplored, since the means of enlightenment become every day more difficult. The people, confounding the general laws of the state with the particular laws for the civil organisation of the clergy, render both the reading and the publication useless.

The malcontents, those who are disinclined to the new order of things, and those who, in the new order, are indisposed to the laws relative to the clergy, studiously encourage this aversion on the part of the people; strengthen, by all the means in their power, the credit of the non-juring priests, and weaken the credit of the others; the indigent obtains no relief, the artisan can hope for no employment of his talents and industry, but as he engages not to attend the mass of the constitutional priest; and it is by this general confidence in the old incumbents on the one hand, and the threats and seduction at work on the other, that the churches served by the conforming priests are deserted, and crowds resort to those where, from want of substitutes, the displacements have not as yet been effected.

Nothing is more common than to see in parishes of five to six hundred persons, ten or twelve only going to the mass of the conforming priest; the proportion is the same in all the districts of the department; on Sundays and holidays the inhabitants of whole villages and hamlets are seen deserting their hearths, to go one, and sometimes two, leagues to hear the mass of a non-juring priest. These habitual peregrinations have appeared to us the most powerful cause of the fermentation, sometimes secret, sometimes palpable, which exists in nearly the whole of the parishes ministered to by conforming priests. It is easily to be imagined, that a multitude of individuals, believing themselves obliged for conscience' sake to travel a great distance in quest of the spiritual consolation desired by them, will regard with aversion, when they return home exhausted with fatigue, the five or six persons who find at their threshold the priest of their choice; they look with envy, and treat with sullenness, often with violence, men who seem in their eyes to have an exclusive privilege in the affair of religion. The comparisons which they make between the facility which they formerly enjoyed of seeking at home priests who possessed their confidence, and the difficulty, the fatigue, and the loss of time, consequent upon these repeated expeditions, greatly diminish their attachment to the constitution, upon which they charge all the annoyances of their new position.

To this general cause, more influential at this moment, perhaps, than the secret provocations of the non-juring priests, we are inclined to believe may be mainly attributed the state of internal discord, in which we have found the majority of the parishes where conforming priests are installed.

Several parishes have presented to us, as also to the administrative bodies, petitions praying for authority to hire particular edifices for the celebration of their religious service; but as these petitions, which we knew to be stimulated with great activity by persons who did not sign them, appeared to us as part of a more generalised and secret system, we thought ourselves not warranted in sanctioning a religious separation, which, according to our opinion at that period, and under the circumstances of the department, was fraught with all the characteristics of a civil schism amongst the citizens. We thought, and openly stated, that it was for you, gentlemen, to determine, in a distinct manner, how, and under what union of moral influences, laws, and modes of execution, the exercise of liberty in religious opinions might in this case, under actual circumstances, be made consistent with the maintenance of public tranquillity.

It is, doubtless, matter of surprise that the non-juring priests who remain in their old parishes, do not take advantage of the privilege the law gives them of saying mass in the church served by the new incumbent, and do not exhibit alacrity in the use of this liberty so as to spare their old parishioners, all who remain attached to them, the loss of time and annoyances of so many and such tedious journeys. To explain this conduct, apparently so extraordinary, it behoves us to remark, that one of the things which has been most strongly recommended to the non-juring priests, by the able men who are in the direction of this great religious movement, is to abstain from all communication with the priests, whom they call intruders and usurpers, for fear the people, who are affected only by sensible signs, should become ultimately impressed with the idea that there is in reality no difference between priests performing in the same church the ceremonies of the same worship.

Unfortunately, this religious division has produced a political division amongst the citizens, and this separation is rendered more marked by the denomination bestowed on each of the two parties; the small number of persons who go into the church of the conforming priests, call themselves, and are called, patriots; those who go into the church of the non-juring priests, are called, and call themselves, aristocrats. Thus, to these poor country people, love or hatred of their country consists at the present day, not in obeying the laws, or respecting the legitimate authorities, but in going or not going to the mass of the conforming priest; design, ignorance, and prejudice, have thrown out such deep-seated misconceptions on this subject, that we had the greatest difficulty in making them understand that the political constitution of the state was not the civil constitution of the clergy; that the law did not tyrannise over consciences; that each was at liberty to attend the mass which was most agreeable to himself, and the priest who enjoyed his confidence; that they were all equal in the eye of the law, and that it imposed upon them no other obligation, in a religious point of view, than to live in peace, and mutually tolerate the differences of their opinions. We neglected no means of effacing from the minds, and banishing from the discourses, of the country people, those absurd denominations; and we directed our attention thereto with the more energy, since it was no difficult matter to estimate the deplorable consequences of such distinctions, in a department where those pretended aristocrats form more than two-thirds of the entire population.

Such, gentlemen, is the summary of the facts which have come those who refused it of all allowances. As they abused the liberty allowed them by exciting civil war, it ordered that, according to particular circumstances they should be transported from one place to another, and even subjected to a detention if they refused to obey. Finally, it prohibited them from the free exerto our knowledge, as existing in the department of La Vendée, and of the reflections to which those facts have given rise.

We have pursued in this matter such measures as we found practicable, both for the purpose of maintaining the public tranquillity, and obviating or repressing attempts against public order; as organs of the law, we have made its language every where heard. At the same time that we instituted safeguards for order and tranquillity, we directed our attention to the explaining or illustrating before the administrative bodies, the tribunals and individuals, the difficulties springing from the misunderstanding of the decrees, and from the mode of their execution we exhorted the administrative bodies and tribunals to redouble their vigilance and zeal in the execution of the laws which protect personal safety and the rights of property; in a word, to put in force, with the firmness which is one of their duties, the authority the law has conferred upon them. We distributed a part of the public force at our disposal, into localities where serious and imminent dangers were announced to us; we proceeded in person into all such localities, upon the first rumour of disturbances; we ascertained the state of affairs with calmness and deliberation; and after having, either by words of peace and conciliation, or by the firm and just vindication of the law, subdued this momentary disorder of individual passions, we considered that the mere presence of the public force would thenceforth suffice. It is for you, gentlemen, since you are alone competent, to take really efficacious measures in a matter which, from the relations it holds with the constitution of the state, exercises upon that constitution at this moment an influence incomparably greater than might be surmised from the simple assumptions of reason apart from the experience of facts.

In all our operations relative to the distribution of the public force, we have been signally and most actively aided by a general officer well known for his patriotism and talents. No sooner was he apprised of our arrival in the department, than M. Dumouriez came to share our labours, and take part with us in the maintenance of public peace; we were on the point of being totally deprived of troops of the line, at a moment when we had good grounds for believing they were more than ever necessary; in such conjuncture, it was to the zeal and activity of M. Dumouriez that we were indebted for an immediate succour, which, from the backward organisation of the national guards, was in some sort the only safeguard for the tranquillity of the country.

We had concluded our mission in the department of La Vendée, when the decree of the National Assembly of 8th August, which empowered us, upon the requisition of the administrators of the department of the Deux-Sevres, to proceed into the district of Châtillon, was transmitted to us, as also to the directory of that department.

It had been announced to us, on our arrival at Fontenay-le-Comte, that this district was in the same state of religious disturbance as the department of La Vendée. A few days before our receipt of the decree last mentioned, several citizens, electors, and public functionaries of that district, had lodged with the directory of the department of the Deux-Sevres a written denunciation upon the troubles which they stated to exist in various parishes; they asserted that an insurrection was on the eve of breaking out; the mode of prevention which seemed to them the most certain and prompt, and which they supported with great force, was to expel from the district, within three days, all the non-juring and displaced incumbents, and all the non-juring curates. The directory, after long hesitating to adopt a measure which appeared to it contrary to the principles of strict justice, at last concluded that the public character of the denouncers was sufficient to authenticate both the reality of the evil, and the pressing necessity for a remedy. An order was resolved upon in consequence, on the 5th September, and the directory, commanding all the ecclesiastics to leave the district in three days, invited them to repair within that period to Niort, the chief town of the department, assuring them that they would there find every protection and safety for their persons.

The order was already printed, and about to be put into execution, when the directory received a copy of the decree of commission which it had solicited; it immediately passed a resolution whereby it suspended the execution of the first, and left to our prudence the task of confirming, modifying, or suppressing it.

Two administrators of the directory were, by the same resolution, named commissioners to make us acquainted with all that had passed, to proceed to Châtillon, and there take, in concert with us, all the measures that might be deemed necessary.

Upon our arrival at Châtillon, we assembled the fifty-six municipalities of which that district is composed, and called them successively into the hall of the directory. We consulted each of them upon the state of its parish; all the municipalities expressed an uniform desire: those in which the incumbents had been replaced, demanded the restoration of those priests; those in which the non-juring incumbents were still in possession, demanded their conservation. There was also another point on which all this rural population insisted unanimously, namely, liberty of religious opinions, which, it alleged, had been granted to it, and which it was anxious to enjoy. The same and the following day, the neighbouring parishes sent us numerous deputations of their inhabitants reiterating the same prayer. "We ask no other favour," said they to us with one accord, "than to have priests in whom we put our trust." Several of them, indeed, attached so great a value to this concession, that they assured us they would willingly pay, in order to obtain it, a double contribution.

A very great majority of the ecclesiastical functionaries in that district have not taken the oath; and whilst their churches scarcely suffice to contain the throng of citizens, the churches of the conforming priests are almost deserted. In this respect, the state of the district appeared to us the same as that of the department of La Vendée; there, as in other parts, we found the designations of patriot and aristocrat completely established amongst the people, with the same meanings, and, if possible, in a yet more general manner. The public feeling in favour of the non-juring priests, appeared to us even more decided than in the department of La Vendée; the attachment evinced towards them, the confidence reposed in them, have all the characteristics of the most energetic and profound sentiment; in some of these parishes, the conforming priests, and citizens friendly to them, have been exposed to threats and insults; and although there, as elsewhere, these violent manifestations appeared occasionally exaggerated, we are convinced (and the simple statement of the public feeling is sufficient to found the conviction) that the greater part of the complaints were based on substantial grounds.

At the same time that we recommended to the judges and administrators the greatest vigilance upon this subject, we omitted no expedient calculated to inspire the people with ideas and sentiments more conformable to respect for the law and to the rights of individual liberty.

We are bound to state, gentlemen, that these same men, who had been represented to us as such furious characters—as deaf to every appeal of reason—left us with minds full of peace and satisfaction, when we made them understand that it was the essence of the principles of the new constitution to respect liberty of conscience: they were moved with grief and remorse for the faults that some amongst them had been induced to commit; they promised us, with much emotion, to follow the counsels we gave them, to live in peace, notwithstanding the difference of their religious opinions, and to respect the public functionary established by the law. They were heard, as they went out, congratulating each other upon having seen us, repeating, amongst themselves, all that we had said to them, and fortifying each other in their resolutions of peace and good-will.

On the same day it was announced to us that several of these country people, on returning home, had affixed placards, in which they declared, that each of them bound himself to denounce and to apprehend the first person who should do injury to another, and especially to the constitutional priests.

We ought to draw attention to the fact, that in this same district, so long distracted with religious differences, the taxes in arrear for 1789 and 1790, amounting to 700,000 livres, have been almost entirely discharged. We have proved it by reference to the directory of the district.

After having carefully studied the tone of public feeling, and the situation of affairs, we were of opinion that the order of the directory ought not to be put in execution, and the commissioners of the department, as well as the administrators of the directory of Châtillon, were of the same opinion.

Setting aside all the determining motives to be drawn from things and persons, we deliberated whether the measure adopted by the directory was just in its nature, and whether it would be efficacious in execution.

We judged that those priests who have been displaced cannot be considered in a state of revolt against the law, because they continue to reside in the place of their abrogated functions, the more especially as amongst these priests there are some who notoriously confine themselves to a life such as befits charitable and peaceable men, far removed from all public and private discussions; we judged that, in the eye of the law, none could be cise of their separate worship, and directed that the administrative bodies should cause to be transmitted to it a list, with notes upon the conduct of each of them.*

This measure, as well as that which had recently been adopted against the emigrants, was evidence of the fear which possesses governments violently menaced, and which induces them to resort to measures of extreme precaution. It is no longer the realised attempt they punish, it is the apprehended attack they would repel; and their proceedings often become as arbitrary and cruel as suspicion itself.

The bishops and priests who had remained at Paris and preserved relations with the king, immediately addressed a memorial to him against the decree. He, already somewhat conscience-striken for having sanctioned the earlier decree of the Constituent Assembly, did not need encouragement to withhold his consent. "As to this one," said he, speaking of the new law, "they shall rather take my life than oblige me to sanction it." The ministers coincided to a great extent in this opinion. Barnave and Lameth, whom the king consulted occasionally, advised him to refuse his sanction; but to this counsel they added another, which the king could not bring himself to follow, namely, that whilst opposing the decree, he should obviate all doubt as to his own dispositions, and for that purpose remove from his person all priests who had not taken the oath, and compose his chapel of constitutional ecclesiastics alone. But of all the counsels that were given him, the king adopted merely that part which comported with his own weakness or devout tendency. Duport-Dutertre, the keeper of the seals, and the organ of the constitutionalists in the ministry, successfully upheld the course they recommended with his colleagues; and when the council had decided, to the great satisfaction of Louis XVI., that the veto should be affixed, he added as a suggestion, that it would be advisable to surround the person of the king with priests who were not suspected. Against this proposition, Louis XVI., generally so yielding, manifested an invincible repugnance, and said, that religious liberty being decreed for all, it should be extended to him as well as his subjects, and that he ought to be allowed to call such priests around him as were agreeable to his own feelings. The matter was not pressed; and without giving the assembly any intimation of the intention, the veto was decided upon.

The constitutional party, to which the king seemed at this moment to surrender himself, brought him an additional support—it was that of the directory of the department. This directory was composed of some of the most distinguished members of the late assembly, such as the Duke of Larochefoucault, the Bishop of Autun, Baumetz, Desmeuniers, Ansons, &c. It sent a petition to the king, not as an administrative body, but as a meeting of petitioners, and prayed for the affixing of the veto to the decree against the priests. "The National Assembly," said the petition, "has unquestionably acted with the best intentions; we desire here to vindicate it from its base detractors; but its laudable designs have urged it to the adoption of measures which the constitution, justice, and prudence, alike disclaim. It makes the payment of the pensions to all superseded ecclesiastics dependent on their taking the civic oath, whereas the constitution has expressly and literally placed those pensions in the list of national obligations. Now, can the refusal to take any oath whatsoever destroy the validity of an acknowledged debt? The Constituent Assembly enacted all that was expedient with regard to the non-juring priests: they refused the prescribed oath, and it deprived them of their functions; upon dispossessing them, it assigned to them a pension. The Legislative Assembly desires that the ecclesiastics who have not taken the oath, or have retracted it, should be liable, in the event of religious troubles, to be provisionally removed, and then imprisoned, if they refuse obedience to the orders that may be intimated to them. Is this not to renew the system of arbitrary orders, inasmuch as it would allow to be punished with exile, and shortly after with imprisonment, individuals who are not convicted of being refractory to any law? The National Assembly refuses to all those who shall not take the civic oath the free profession of their faith. Now, this liberty can be taken away from no one; it is consecrated for ever in the declaration of rights."

These were, doubtless, very excellent reasons; but it is not with arguments that the irritation or apprehensions of parties are appeased. By what logic could the assembly be persuaded that it ought to leave unmolested a body of stubborn priests, actually exciting discord and civil war? The directory was assailed with reproaches, and its petition to the king met by a multitude of counter-addresses to the legislative body. Camille-Desmoulins presented one of singular hardihood in its expressions, at the head of a section. An increasing violence of language, and a repu-deemed in a state of revolt, unless opposing it by precise, ascertained, and verified facts; finally, we judged that acts of resistance to the laws relative to the clergy, and to all the laws of the kingdom, ought, like all other offences, to be punished by legal forms.

Upon the second question as to the efficacy of such a measure, we held, that if the faithful have no confidence in the conforming priests, it is not the mode for inspiring them with more to remove in this manner those of their choice; we held, that in the districts where the great majority of the non-juring priests continue the exercise of their functions, according to the sanction of the law, until they are replaced, it would certainly not, in such a system of repression, diminish the evil to remove so small a number of individuals, when it is necessary to leave in the same localities a greater number imbued with identical opinions.

Such, gentlemen, are some of the reasons which influenced our conduct upon this occasion, independently of all those derived from local circumstances, which would alone have induced us to pursue a similar course; such, in fact, was the general feeling that the execution of that order in those parts would infallibly have become the signal of civil war.

The directory of the department of the Deux-Sevres, informed, first by its own commissioners, and subsequently by us, of all that we had done upon this subject, did us the honour to offer us an expression of its gratitude, by a resolution of the 19th of last month.

We will add, with respect to that measure for the removal of the non-juring priests who have been displaced, that it was constantly recommended to us by almost all of the citizens in the department of La Vendée who are attached to the constitutional priests, and who form, as we have already stated, but a small fraction of the inhabitants. In laying this wish before you, we do but acquit ourselves of a commission that has been intrusted to us.

Nor will we on the other hand conceal from you that some of the conforming priests whom we have seen were of a contrary opinion; one of them, in a letter which be addressed to us on the 12th September, after pointing out the causes of the troubles, and mentioning the annoyances to which he was every day exposed, observes, that the only means of remedying all these evils is (we quote his expressions) "to conciliate the opinion of the people, whose prejudices should be removed with patience and prudence; for we must avoid all war on account of religion, the wounds from which are still bleeding. It is to be feared that rigorous measures, needful under the circumstances against the disturbers of the public repose, might appear more as a persecution than a punishment inflicted by the law. What prudence will it not be necessary to observe! Mildness, exhortation, are the weapons of truth."

Such, gentlemen, is the general result of the details we have gathered, and of the observations we have made, in the course of the mission which has been confided to us. The sweetest recompense of our labours would be to have facilitated the means of establishing upon solid foundations the tranquillity of those departments, and to have proved worthy, by the activity of our zeal, of the confidence with which we have been honoured.

* Decree of the 29th November.

diation of all the accustomed terms of respect towards the authorities and the king, were already distinctly visible. Desmoulins said to the assembly that a great example was required; that the directory ought to be put under impeachment; that the leaders were those whom it was necessary to attack; that it was at the head the blow should be struck, and the thunderbolt hurled at all conspirators; that the power of the royal veto had its limits; and that the capture of the Bastille had not been prevented by a veto.

Louis XVI., although determined to refuse his sanction, delayed, nevertheless, his announcement to the assembly. He wished in the mean time to conciliate opinion by some popular acts. He selected his ministers from the constitutional party. Montmorin, wearied by his laborious career under the constituent body, and by his irksome negotiations with all parties, had resolved not to brave the storms of a new legislature, and had consequently retired, in spite of the king's entreaties. The ministry for foreign affairs, refused by divers persons, was ultimately accepted by Delessart, who quitted that of the home department. Delessart, a man of integrity and ability, was under the influence of the constitutionalists or Feuillants; but he was too feeble to fix the mind of the king, to have weight with foreign powers, or awe internal factions. Cahier de Gerville, a decided patriot, somewhat more rough than engaging in his eloquence, was placed in the home-office, as an additional bait for public confidence. Narbonne, a young man of great activity and ardour, a zealous constitutionalist, and skilful in gaining popularity, was intrusted with the ministry at war by the party then predominant in the cabinet. He might have exercised a beneficial influence upon its determinations, and reconciled the assembly with the king, if he had not had as an adversary Bertrand de Molleville, a counter-revolutionary minister, and possessing the ear of the court in preference to all his colleagues. Bertrand de Molleville detesting the constitution, and artfully clinging to its text for the purpose of marring its spirit, was really desirous, nevertheless, that the king should attempt to execute it—"but in order," as he said, "that its impracticability might be demonstrated." The king could not resolve to dismiss him; and it was with this mixed ministry he once more set forward on his course. After thus striving to win opinion by his ministerial selections, he essayed other means to gain it still more decidedly; appearing at this time cordially disposed to second all the diplomatic and military measures proposed against the armed assemblages on the Rhine.

The last repressive laws had been defeated by the veto, and yet every day fresh denunciations apprised the assembly of the preparations and threats of the emigrants. The records of the municipalities and departments bordering on the frontier, and the accounts of commercial travellers coming from beyond the Rhine, bore testimony that the Viscount de Mirabeau, brother of the celebrated Constituent, was at the head of six hundred men in the bishopric of Strasburg; that in the territory of the Elector of Mayence, and close to Worms, were numerous corps of deserters, under the orders of the Prince of Condé; that the same state of things existed at Coblentz and in the whole electorate of Treves; that excesses and injuries had been perpetrated on French subjects; and, finally, that a proposition had been made to General Wimpfen for delivering up Neuf-Brisach. These reports, coming in confirmation of all that was known from public rumour, drove the assembly to the highest pitch of exasperation. A project for a decree was instantly proposed, embodying a demand upon the electors to disband the emigrants. The question was prorogued for two days, in order that the assembly might not appear too precipitate. That term expired, and the debate was opened.

The deputy Isnard ushered in the discussion. He expatiated on the necessity of securing the tranquillity of the kingdom, not in a loose and fleeting manner, but upon durable foundations, and of commanding it by prompt and vigorous measures, which should attest to all Europe the patriotic resolutions of France. "Fear not," said he, "to provoke the great powers to declare war against you; interest has already decided their intentions; your measures will not alter them, but they will oblige them to explain themselves. The conduct of France must respond to its new destiny. Enslaved under Louis XIV., it was nevertheless valorous and great; to-day free, shall it be timid and weak? It is a mistake, says Montesquieu, when it is imagined that a nation in a revolution is prone to be conquered; it is ready, on the contrary, to conquer others." Loud applause followed these words. He continued:

"Capitulations are proposed to you! You are asked to augment the royal prerogative, to augment the power of the king—of a man whose fiat can paralyse the energies of a whole nation—of a man with a revenue of thirty millions, whilst tens of thousands of our citizens perish in distress! You are asked to restore the nobility! Let all the nobles of the earth assail us, and we, the French, dispensing our gold with one hand and grasping our steel with the other, will meet this haughty caste face to face, and compel it to undergo the torture of equality!

Speak to the ministers, to the king, and to Europe, the language which befits the representatives of France! Tell the ministers that hitherto you have been dissatisfied with their conduct, and that by responsibility you mean death!" Loud and long-continued applause interrupted the speaker. "Tell Europe that you will respect the institutions of all kingdoms, but that if her cabinets stir up a war of kings against France, we will stir up a war of nations against kings!" Here the cheers of the auditors were renewed. "Interrupt not my enthusiasm," exclaimed Isnard, "for it is that of liberty! Tell Europe, then, that the battles fought by nations on the mandate of despots resemble the blows which two friends may deal each other in the dark, when stimulated by some perfidious villain! Let the light but appear, they instantly embrace, and take vengeance on him who has deceived them. So also, if at the moment the armies of enemies contend with ours, the light of philosophy should strike their eyes, the nations would embrace in the face of dethroned tyrants, of a comforted world, and of an applauding Heaven!"*

The enthusiasm excited by these words was such, that all thronged around the orator to press him in their arms. The decree which he supported was adopted upon the moment. M. de Vaublanc was charged to carry it to the king, at the head of a deputation of twenty-four members. By this decree, the assembly declared that it was imperative upon the executive to require the electors of Mayence and Treves, and other princes of the empire, to disperse the assemblages formed on the frontier. It besought the king, at the same time, to expedite the negotiations set on foot for settling the indemnities exigible by the princes holding possessions in Alsace.

M. de Vaublanc presented this decree in a firm and respectful address, much applauded by the assembly. "Sire," said he, "if the French, expelled from their country by the edict of Nantes, had assembled in arms on the frontiers—if they had been protected by the princes of Germany, we ask you, sire, what would have been the conduct of Louis XIV.? Would he have permitted such assemblages? What he would have doubtless done for his authority, may your majesty do for the maintenance of the constitution!"

Louis XVI. having resolved, as we have previously stated, to correct the ill effects of the veto by acts soothing to public opinion, determined to proceed in person to the assembly, and reply to its message by a speech calculated to give it satisfaction.

* Sitting of the 29th November.

On the evening of the 14th December, the king repaired to the hall, in accordance with a notification he had transmitted that morning by a simple note. He was received with profound silence. He said that the message of the assembly demanded high consideration; and that upon an occasion in which the honour of France was at stake, he deemed it expedient to come amongst them in person; that participating the sentiments of the assembly, but wishful to avoid the scourge of war, he had endeavoured to lure back the deluded emigrants; that friendly solicitations having been unavailing, he had anticipated the message of the representatives, and already notified to the electors, that if before the 15th January all warlike preparations had not ceased, they would be considered enemies of France; that he had written to the emperor claiming his intervention as head of the empire; and that, in case satisfaction should not be obtained, he would propose a declaration of war. He concluded by observing, that all attempts to render the exercise of his authority displeasing to his mind would be fruitless; that he would faithfully guard the integrity of the constitution; and that he was deeply sensible how glorious it was to be the king of a free people.

Applauses succeeded the silence, and indemnified the king for the sombre reception that had marked his entrance. The assembly, having resolved in the morning sitting that he should be answered by message, could not immediately express its satisfaction, but it decided that his discourse should be sent to the eighty-three departments. Narbonne shortly afterwards entered, to communicate the measures that had been taken to ensure the effect of the notifications addressed to the empire. One hundred and fifty thousand men were intended to be assembled on the Rhine, which, he added, was by no means impossible. Three generals were named to command them—Luckner, Rochambeau, and Lafayette. Great applause greeted the last name. Narbonne furthermore stated, that he purposed leaving Paris to visit the frontiers, to inquire into the state of the fortified places, and to impart activity to the preparations for defence; that the assembly would doubtless grant the necessary supplies, and that it would not be niggardly in defence of liberty. "No! no!" responded from all sides. In conclusion, he asked if the assembly, although the legal number of marshals was complete, would not permit the king to confer that distinction on the two generals, Luckner and Rochambeau, thus intrusted with the preservation of liberty. Acclamations testified the consent of the assembly, and the high satisfaction the energy of the young minister gave it. It was by such conduct Louis XVI. might have gained popularity, and conciliated the republicans, who desired a republic only because they believed a monarch incapable of loving and defending freedom.

Advantage was taken of the satisfaction produced by these measures to notify the veto affixed to the decree against the priests. In the morning, care had been taken to publish in the journals the dismissal of the former diplomatic agents accused of aristocracy, and the nomination of successors. Owing to these precautions, the communication was heard without a murmur. The assembly had already expected it, and the effect was not so unfavourable as might have been apprehended. We see how many manœuvres the king was obliged to adopt in making use of his prerogative, and what dangers he incurred in employing it. Had, then, the Constituent Assembly, which was accused of having annihilated him by its limitation, granted him the absolute veto, would it have been more efficient on that account? Did not the suspensive veto produce all the effect of the absolute veto? What was it that failed the king?—legal power, or the power of opinion? We perceive which by the result; it was not a deficiency in effectual prerogatives that ruined Louis XVI., but the indiscreet use of those which he still wielded.

The activity promised to the assembly was manifested in acts. The propositions for the expenses of war, and for the nomination of the two marshals, Luckner and Rochambeau, were brought forward without delay. Lafayette, called from the privacy into which he had retired, after his three years of turmoil, presented himself at the bar of the assembly, and was most favourably received. Battalions of the national guard accompanied him on his exit from Paris; and all proved to him that the name of Lafayette had not fallen into oblivion, and that he was still regarded as one of the founders of liberty.

However, Leopold, naturally of a pacific temperament, was not anxious for war, as he was well aware it would be detrimental to his interests; but he desired a congress, backed by an imposing force, as a means of leading to an accommodation, and enforcing some modifications in the constitution. The emigrants, indeed, were eager, not for its modification, but for its destruction; the emperor, more sagacious and enlightened, felt that great concessions were needful to the new opinions; and that the utmost that could be desired was the restoration to the king of certain prerogatives, and an amendment in the composition of the legislative body, by its being established in two chambers instead of one.* This last project was the one most

* I have already had occasion to refer, upon several occasions, to the intentions of Leopold, Louis XVI., and the emigrants. I shall here present several extracts, which will show them in the clearest manner. Bouillé, who had gone abroad, and whose reputation and talents caused him to be much sought after by the sovereigns, had better opportunities than any one else of ascertaining the sentiments of the various courts, and his testimony cannot be at all suspected. The following are the terms in which he expresses himself in different parts of his Memoirs:—

"It may be judged from this letter, that the King of Sweden was in great uncertainty touching the real designs of the emperor and his allies, who then seemed indisposed to interfere any further in the affairs of France. The Empress (Catherine), no doubt, was aware of them, but she had not communicated them to him. I knew that, at this moment, she was employing all her influence with the emperor and the King of Prussia, to induce them to declare war against France. She had even written a very strong letter to the first of those sovereigns, in which she represented to him that the King of Prussia, on account of a simple breach of politeness towards his sister, had caused an army to enter Holland, whilst he calmly suffered the insults and affronts that were heaped on the Queen of France, the degradation of her rank and dignity, and the annihilation of the throne of a king, his brother-in law and ally. The empress spoke with the same energy to Spain, which had adopted pacific sentiments. However, the emperor, after the king's acceptance of the constitution, had again received the French ambassador, whom he had previously forbidden to appear at his court. He was even the first to admit the national flag into his ports. The courts of Madrid, Petersburg, and Stockholm, were the only ones which, at this period, withdrew their ambassadors from Paris. All these circumstances tend to prove, therefore, that the views of Leopold were inclined to peace, and that they resulted from the influence of Louis XVI. and the queen."—Memoirs of Bouillé, p. 314.

Again, Bouillé says:—

"Several months elapsed, in the mean time, without my perceiving any issue to the projects entertained by the emperor of assembling armies on the frontier, of holding a congress, and of entering upon a negotiation with the French government. I presumed, that the king had formed hopes that his acceptance of the constitution would restore to him his personal freedom, which an armed negotiation might have endangered, and that he had consequently urged the emperor, and the other sovereigns his allies, to take no step which might provoke those hostilities he had constantly laboured to avoid. I was confirmed in this opinion by the reserve of the court of Spain, as to the proposition for furnishing the King of Sweden with fifteen millions of livres tournois, which it had engaged to pay him in aid of the expenses of his expedition. That prince had instructed me to write on his behalf to the Spanish ministry, from whom I received only vague answers. I then advised the King of Sweden to open a loan in Holland, under the guarantee of Spain, the dispositions of which deprecated, and that with which the Feuillant or constitutional party was most frequently reproached. It is certain, that if this party had, in the early times of the Constituent Assembly, repudiated an upper chamber, from its rational apprehensions that the nobility would take up an offensive attitude in it, its fears were now no longer the same; on the contrary, it had well-grounded hopes of itself almost solely composing such a chamber. Numbers of the old Constituents, at present fallen into complete nullity, would have found it an opportunity for re-entering on the political stage. If, therefore, this upper chamber was not precisely in their plans, it was perfectly consistent with their interests. It is certain, also, that the journals frequently spoke of it, and that it was an universal topic of discourse. How rapid had been the march of the revolution! The right side of this era was composed of adherents of the old left side; and the feared and stigmatised views of the day tended no longer to a return to the old system, but merely to the establishment of an upper chamber. What a difference from 1789! and how an insane resistance had precipitated events!

Leopold saw, then, but this measure of mitigation possible for Louis XVI. In the interim, his object was to spin out the negotiations, and without coming to a rupture with France, to awe her by a show of firmness. But he defeated his purpose by the reply he made. This reply consisted in notifying the resolutions of the diet of Ratisbon, refusing to accept any indemnity for the princes holding possessions in Alsace. Nothing could be more preposterous than such a decision, for surely all the territory comprised under one domination ought to be subject to the same laws: if princes of the empire had estates in France, they were bound to submit to the abolition of feudal customs, and the Constituent Assembly had fully met the justice of the case by granting them indemnities. Several of them having already entered into treaties on the subject, the diet annulled their agreements, and prohibited them from accepting any compromise. The empire thus disclaimed a recognition of the revolution so far as its members were concerned. With regard to the assemblages of emigrants, Leopold, without vouchsafing any explanation touching their dispersion, intimated to Louis XVI. that the Elector of Treves being exposed, according to the menaces of the French government, to immediate hostilities, General Bender had been ordered to afford him prompt succour.

It was impossible for this reply to have been more imprudent. It compelled Louis XVI., to avoid compromising himself, to take vigorous measures, and to propose a declaration of war. Delessart was forthwith dispatched to the assembly for the purpose of communicating this answer, and of expressing the amazement wherewith the conduct of Leopold had struck the king. The minister suggested that the emperor had probably been deceived, and that he had been most erroneously persuaded the elector had acquitted himself of the imperative duties of good neighbourhood. He furthermore laid before the assembly the rejoinder addressed to Leopold. He was therein given to understand that, notwithstanding his reply and the orders given to Marshal Bender, if the electors had not, by the prescribed term, that is to say, by the 15th January, satisfied the demands of France, force of arms would be used against them. "If this declaration," said Louis XVI., in his message of the 31st December, to the assembly, "does not produce the effect I am justified in hoping—if it be the destiny of France to be driven into combat with her sons and allies, I will make known to Europe the justice of our cause; the French people will sustain it by their heroism, and the nation will perceive that I have no other interest than such as it participates, and that I will always regard the maintenance of its dignity and security as the most essential of my duties."

These expressions, in which the king seemed to unite with the nation in their common danger, were vehemently applauded. The documents were referred to the diplomatic committee, with instructions to render a speedy report thereon to the assembly.

The queen was once again applauded at the opera as in the days of her splendour and power, and she returned all joyous to her husband, to tell him she had been hailed with the transports of more happy times. But it was the last testimony of regard she received from a people formerly so enraptured with her royal charms. The sentiment of equality which remains so long dormant in mankind, and rises so fierce when power appeared to me nevertheless greatly changed with respect to France.

I learnt that anarchy was increasing every day in France, which was but too well proved by the crowds of emigrants from all parts, who were taking refuge on the foreign frontiers. Arms were given them, they were formed into regiments on the banks of the Rhine, and a small army was thus composed, which threatened the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine. These proceedings aroused the fury of the people, and promoted the destructive projects of the Jacobins and anarchists. The emigrants had even determined to make an attempt on Strasburg, in which they relied on having sure intelligence, and partisans who were prepared to open them the gates. The king, who was apprised of this scheme, employed commands, and even entreaties, to stop them; and to prevent them from performing any act of hostility, he dispatched for this purpose, to the princes his brothers, the Baron de Vioménil and the Chevalier de Cogny, who testified to them, in his name, his disapprobation of the arming of the French nobility, to which the emperor opposed all possible obstacles, but which continued nevertheless."—Ibid. p. 309.

Finally, Bouillé relates, after Leopold himself, his plan of a congress:—

"On the 12th September, at length, the Emperor Leopold desired me to wait upon him and to bring him the plan of military dispositions he had previously requested from me. He made me enter his cabinet, and told me he had not been able to speak with me sooner upon the subject for which he had summoned me, because he was waiting for the answers of Russia, Spain, England and the Italian principalities; that he had now received them; that they were conformable to his plans and wishes; that he was assured of their assistance in the execution, and of their conjunction, with the exception of the cabinet of St James's, which had declared a determination to observe the most scrupulous neutrality. He had taken the resolution of assembling a congress to treat with the French government, not only touching the redress of grievances on the part of the Germanic body, whose rights in Alsace, and in other parts of the frontier provinces, had been violated, but also touching the means of re-establishing order in the kingdom of France, whose anarchy disturbed the tranquillity of all Europe. He added, that this negotiation would be supported by formidable armies with which France would be encompassed; that he hoped this expedient would be successful and prevent a bloody war, the last resource to which he would apply. I took the liberty of asking the emperor whether he were informed of the veritable desires of the king. He was acquainted with them; he knew that prince's repugnance to the adoption of violent measures. He told me he was likewise informed that the charter of the new constitution was to be presented to him within a few days, and that he supposed the king could not avoid accepting it without reservation, from the danger he ran of losing his own life and the lives of his family, if he evinced the least hesitation, or permitted himself the smallest observation; but that his sanction, forced upon the occasion, was of no consequence—it being possible to rescind all that might be done, and to bestow on France a good government, which would at once satisfy the nation, and leave to the royal authority an extent of power sufficient to maintain tranquillity within, and ensure peace without. He then asked me for the plan of disposition for the armies, assuring me that he would examine it at leisure. He added that I might return to Mayence, where the Count de Brown, who was to command his troops, and who was then in the Low Countries, would send to apprise me, as also the Prince de Hohenlohe, who was proceeding to Franconia, so that we might confer together when the proper time should arrive.

I concluded that the emperor had only resolved upon this pacific and extremely moderate plan, since the conferences at Pilnitz, after consulting Louis XVI., whose voice was constantly for an arrangement, and for employing the medium of negotiations rather than the violent expedient of arms."—Ibid. p. 299.

once awakened, now became the predominant manifestation. The year 1791 was on the point of expiring; the assembly abolished the ancient ceremonial observed on the first day of the new year, and decided that the compliments paid the king on that solemn era should not be repeated for the future. About this time, also, a deputation lodged a complaint that the door of the council-chamber had not been thrown widely open to it. A disgraceful discussion ensued, and the assembly, in addressing Louis XVI., suppressed the titles of sire and majesty. On another occasion, a deputy entered the presence of the king with his hat on, and otherwise in very unsuitable apparel. Such conduct was, however, frequently provoked by the repulsive demeanour of the court officials towards the deputies, and the pride of both parties was piqued into retaliation.

Narbonne, meanwhile, pursued his tour of inspection with rare activity. Three armies were established on the menaced frontier. Rochambeau, a veteran general, who had in former times often conducted a war with skill, but was now diseased, morose, and captious, commanded the army located in Flanders, and called the army of the north. Lafayette had the army of the centre, and was encamped towards Metz. Luckner, an old warrior, an indifferent general, a brave soldier, and very popular in camps from his truly military manners, commanded the corps which occupied Alsace. These were all the generals a long peace and a general desertion had left to France.

Rochambeau, discontented with the new order of things, and irritated at the want of discipline prevalent in the army, was incessant in his complaints and forebodings to the minister. Lafayette, young, buoyant, and eager to distinguish himself in defending his country, established discipline amongst his troops, and overcame all the difficulties thrown in his way by the refractory dispositions of the officers, who were the aristocrats of the army. He called them together, and speaking to them in the language of honour, told them they ought to quit the camp if they were not inclined to serve with loyalty; that if there were any who wished to retire, he pledged himself to procure for all such either retirements in France, or passports for abroad; but that if they determined to remain, he expected from them zeal and fidelity. He had by such means succeeded in infusing a higher degree of order into his army than was manifest in the others. As to Luckner, without political bias, and consequently indifferent to systems of government, he held out great expectations to the assembly, and had certainly succeeded in securing the attachment of the soldiers.

Narbonne travelled with the greatest celerity, and came on the 11th of January to give an account to the assembly of his rapid expedition. He announced that the repairs of all the fortifications were already in a very advanced state; that the army, from Dunkirk to Besançon, presented a mass of two hundred and forty battalions and one hundred and sixty squadrons, with artillery necessary for two hundred thousand men, and supplies for six months. He bestowed the highest eulogiums on the volunteer national guards, and gave assurances that in a short period their equipment would be complete. The young minister yielded, doubtless, to the illusions of a zealous mind; but his views were so noble, his labours so prompt and indefatigable, that the assembly loaded him with applause, recommended his report to the public gratitude, and sent it to all the departments, the ordinary mode of testifying its approbation of all who gave it satisfaction.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE EMIGRANT PRINCES IMPEACHED.—FORMATION OF A GIRONDIST MINISTRY.—DECLARATION OF WAR AGAINST AUSTRIA.—FLIGHTS OF QUIEORAIN AND TOURNAY.

At the commencement of the year 1792, the question of war had become that of greatest moment; upon it, indeed, the very existence of the revolution depended. Its enemies having transferred themselves into foreign countries, it was there they were to be sought and conquered. But would the king act with sincerity against his own relatives and former courtiers? Such was the doubt upon which the national fears needed assurance. This subject of war was debated at the Jacobin Club, which allowed no topic to pass without pronouncing a sovereign judgment. It will be deemed singular that the ultra Jacobins, with Robespierre at their head, were disposed towards peace; and the moderate Jacobins or Girondists, with Brissot and Louvet as their leaders, were inclined for war. Brissot supported the cause of war with all his talents and influence. He thought, with Louvet and the whole of the Girondists, that war was essential to the nation, because it would terminate a dangerous uncertainty, and test the real intentions of the king. Judging of the result from the dictates of their own enthusiasm, they deemed it out of the question that the nation could be vanquished, and held it certain that, if by the king's connivance it should suffer any partial check, it would immediately appreciate the cause, and depose a faithless chief. How was it that Robespierre and the other Jacobins were unfavourable to a course which promised so prompt and decisive an issue? We can clear up this point only by conjecture. The timid Robespierre might be afraid of war, or he might oppose it simply because Brissot, his rival at the Jacobins', advocated it, and because the young Louvet had argued for it with great applause. Whatever might be the reason, it is undoubted he strove for peace with extreme obstinacy. Those members of the Cordelier Club who belonged also to the Jacobin, attended the debate, and supported Robespierre. Their principal apprehension seemed to be that war would confer too many advantages on Lafayette, and speedily elevate him to a military dictatorship: this was the constant dread of Camille-Desmoulins, who was perpetually haunted with the idea of that general, at the head of a victorious army, overwhelming, as on the Champ de Mars, all Jacobins and Cordeliers. Louvet and the Girondists attributed a different motive to the Cordeliers, thinking that they were actuated against Lafayette only as the enemy of the Duke of Orleans, with whom it was understood they were closely allied.

The Duke of Orleans, whom we perceive once more appearing rather in the suspicions of his enemies than in the revolution, was almost entirely eclipsed at this period. In the beginning, his name may have been used with advantage, and he himself may have placed expectations on those to whom he lent it; but all was now much changed. Becoming himself sensible how incongruous his position was in the popular party, he had attempted to obtain pardon from the court during the latter days of the Constituent Assembly, but had been repulsed. Under the Legislative Assembly, he was retained in the list of admirals, and he renewed his overtures to the king. Upon this occasion, he was admitted to the king's presence, had an interview of some duration, and met, upon the whole, a somewhat favourable reception. It was agreed that he should revisit the palace, and he consequently, upon a particular day, repaired thither. The queen's table was laid out, and the courtiers were assembled in great number. Scarcely was the duke perceived, than the most insulting expressions were repeated. "Look to the dishes!" they cried from all sides, as if they feared he would throw poison upon them. They hustled him, trod upon his toes, and compelled him to retire. Whilst descending the staircase, he was exposed to fresh injuries, and he left the palace highly exaspe rated, concluding that the king and queen had purposely arranged this humiliating scene for him. But they were, on the contrary, deeply concerned at the imprudence of their courtiers, of which they had not the slightest previous cognisance.* The duke was naturally more irritated than ever, although he certainly became neither a more active nor a more able party-leader than formerly. Such of his friends as belonged to the Jacobin Club and the assembly unquestionably made a little more stir, whence his faction was thought to be again rearing its head, and many concluded that his pretensions and hopes were reviving with the perils of the throne.

The Girondists considered that the Cordeliers and ultra Jacobins advocated peace merely to deprive Lafayette, the rival of the Duke of Orleans, of the renown it might procure him. Whether their conjecture were right or not, the war party was sure to prevail in the assembly, where they had the predominance. That body commenced by placing under impeachment, on the 1st of January, Monsieur, the king's eldest brother, the Count d'Artois, the Prince of Condé, Calonne, Mirabeau the younger, and Laqueuille, as guilty of hostility against France. A decree of impeachment not being dependent on the royal sanction, the veto was not to be apprehended upon this occasion. The sequestration of the possessions of emigrants, and the collection of their revenues for the good of the state, already enacted by the un sanctioned decree, were prescribed anew by a fresl decree, to which the king offered no opposition. Th assembly confiscated the revenues as indemnities for th charges of war. Monsieur was deprived of the regency by virtue of the decision previously pronounced.

The report upon the last official note of the emperoı was presented to the assembly, on the 14th January by Gensonné. In it he insisted that France had con stantly lavished her treasures and her blood in behal of Austria, without ever receiving any return; that the treaty of alliance, concluded in 1756, had been violated by the declaration of Pilnitz and those that followed it, the object of which had been to compass an armed coalition of sovereigns; that it had beer again broken by the arming of the emigrants, allowed, and even aided, by the princes of the empire. Gensonné furthermore alleged, that although orders had been recently given for the dispersion of the emigrant assemblages, those apparent orders had not been executed; that the white cockade had not ceased to be worn beyond the Rhine, the national cockade to be outraged, and French travellers to be ill-treated; and that, in consequence, it was necessary to demand from the emperor a final explanation with reference to the treaty of 1756. The printing of this report, and the postponement of its consideration, were ordered.

On the same day, Guadet mounted the tribune. "Of all the circumstances," said he, "which have been communicated to the assembly, that which has caused the greatest sensation is the pla 'a congress, with the design of obtaining a modification in the French constitution—a plan lon, suspected to be in agitation, and finally denounced as probable by th committees and ministers. If it be true that this intrigue is conducted by en who see in it a means c escaping from the political nullity into which they have recently sunk; if it be true that certain agents of the executive power are abetting with all the influence of their stations, this abominable plot; if it be true that hopes are entertained we shall be drawn by procrastination and discouragement to accept this disgraceful mediation, ought the national assembly to close its eyes to such dangers? Let us all swear to die here, rather" - He was not allowed to finish the sentence; the whole assembly rose, with the unanimous cry, "Yes, yes—we swear!" And it enthusiastically declared every Frenchman infamous, and a traitor to his country, who should concur in a congress assembled with the design of modifying the constitution. This decree was principally levelled against the old constitutionalists and the minister Delessart. The latter was especially obnoxious, being accused of purposely lengthening out the negotiations. On the 17th, the debate upon Gensonné's report was resumed; and it was decreed that the king should no longer treat but in the name of the French nation, and that he should require the emperor to give a definitive explanation before the 1st of March ensuing. The king replied that he had already, a fortnight before, de manded positive explications from Leopold.

In the mean time, it was communicated that the Elector of Treves, alarmed at the resolute tone of the French cabinet, had given fresh orders for the disbanding of the armed bodies, for the sale of the magazines collected in his territory, and for the prohibition of recruiting and disciplining; and that these ord rs were actually enforced. In the prevailing disposition of men's minds, such intelligence was coldly received. It was held to convey mere vain and abortive demonstrations; and the definitive reply of Leopold was not the less strenuously called for.

Divisions existed in the ministry between Bertrand de Molleville and Narbonne. Bertrand was envious of the popularity enjoyed by the minister at war, and censured his ingratiating demeanour towards the assembly. Narbonne complained of the conduct and unconstitutional tendencies of Bertrand de Molleville, and demanded that the king should dismiss him from the administration. Cahier de Gerville held the balance between them, but unavailingly. It was alleged that the constitutional party desired to raise Narbonne to the post of prime minister; and it seems certain that the king was misled, that the popularity and ambition of Narbonne were represented to him in alarming colours, and that he was brought to consider him as a presumptuous young man, scheming to govern the cabinet. These divisions were soon known to the journalists: Brissot and the Gironde zealously defended the minister threatened with disgrace, and fiercely attacked his colleagues and the king. A letter, written by the three generals of the northern armies to Narbonne, in which they expressed

* Bertrand de Molleville relates this circumstance in the following manner:—

"I gave an account at the council the same day of the visit which the Duke of Orleans had paid me, and of our conversation The king determined to receive him, and had an interview with him on the following day, which lasted more than half an hour, with which his majesty appeared to have been well satisfied. 'I think with you,' said he, addressing me, 'that he sincerely repents, and will do all he can to repair the mischief he has effected, in which it is possible he has not had so great a share as we believed.'

The succeeding Sunday he came to the king's levee, where he met with the most insulting reception from the courtiers, who were ignorant of what had passed, and from the royalists, who were accustomed to attend in crowds at the palace that day, to pay their court to the royal family. They pressed around him, affecting to tread upon his feet, and to drive him towards the door, with the view of preventing him from entering. He proceeded to the queen's apartment, where the table was already spread: as soon as he was perceived, cries arose from all sides, 'Gentlemen, take care of the dishes!' as if all present had been firmly persuaded he had his pockets full of poison.

The abusive murmurs his presence excited forced him to retire without seeing the royal family. He was followed to the queen's staircase, and as he descended, he received a discharge of spittle on his head, and several on his coat. Rage and vexation were depicted on his countenance. He left the palace, with the conviction that the instigators of the outrages he had received were the king and queen, who had no knowledge of them, and were indeed much annoyed at them. He swore an implacable hatred to them, and he showed himself only too faithful to that horrible oath. I was at the palace that day, and witnessed all the facts I have just mentioned."—Bertrand de Molleville, vol. vi. p. 289.

to him the apprehension they felt respecting his dismissal, which they understood to be imminent, was published. The king immediately superseded him; but, as a counterpoise to the effect of this step, he announced the dismissal of Bertrand de Molleville also. Nevertheless, the sensation excited by Narbonne's displacement was not thereby lessened; an extraordinary agitation forthwith broke out, and the assembly was moved to declare, according to the formula previously employed towards Necker, that Narbonne possessed the confidence of the nation, and that the whole ministry had lost it. It was intended, however, to except from this sweeping condemnation Cahier de Gerville, a steady opponent of Bertrand de Molleville, and who had very recently had with him a violent dispute. After much confusion, Brissot undertook to prove that Delessart had betrayed the confidence of the nation. That minister h communicated to the diplomatic committee his correspondence with Kaunitz. It was undignifi it even gave Kaunitz an unfavourable idea of the state of Fra e, and seemed to have authorised the conduct and language of Leopold. We must b in mind that Delessart, and his colleague Duport-Dutertre, were the two ministers who belonged to the Feuillants, and who had become the more obnoxious from the belief that they favoured the project of a congress.

During one of the most stormy sittings of the assembly, the unfortunate Delessart was formally accused by Brissot of having compromised the dignity of the nation; of not having apprised the assembly of the concert amongst the powers, or notified the declaration of Pilnitz; of having professed in his dispatches unconstitutional doctrines; of having given to Kaunitz a false idea of the state of France; of having protracted the negotiations, and conducted them in a manner opposed to the interests of the country. Vergniaud supported Brissot, and added fresh complaints to those already charged against Delessart. He reproached him for having, when minister of the interior, kept too long in his portfolio the decree which united the Comtat to France, and being thus the cause of the massacres at Avignon. He then subjoined: "From this tribune in which I speak, I perceive the palace where perverse counsellors mislead and deceive the king whom the constitution has given us; I see the windows of the palace where the counter-revolution is plotting—where the means are canvassing to replunge us into slavery. Terror has often stalked from that famous palace in times of old, and in the name of despotism; now let it enter in the name of the law, let it penetrate all hearts within its walls—let all who dwell there know that our constitution grants inviolability to the king alone."

The motion for impeachment was immediately put to the vote, and adopted.* Delessart was sent to the high national court established at Orleans, and empowered, in terms of the constitution, to judge state-criminals. The king experienced profound sorrow at his departure. He had possessed his entire confidence, and gained his esteem by the moderate and pacific views he advocated. Duport-Dutertre, the minister of the constitutional party, was likewise threatened with impeachment; but he anticipated it; demanded to be heard in justification; was absolved by passing to the order of the day, and immediately afterwards tendered his resignation. Cahier de Gerville also gave in his; and in this manner the king found himself deprived of the only one of his ministers who had any reputation for patriotism with the assembly.

Severed from the ministers whom the Feuillants had given him, and at a loss where to seek support amidst the storm, Louis XVI., who had dismissed Narbonne because he was too popular, resolved to unite himself with the Gironde, which was republican. It is true, it was only so from distrust of the king, who might, by placing himself in its hands, have succeeded in attaching it to his person; but it was necessary that his surrender should be cordial and sincere, and the eternal question of his good faith arose in this instance as upon all previous occasions. Doubtless, Louis XVI. was honest when he yielded himself to a party, but he did so with chagrin and reluctance. Consequently, so soon as the party proposed some unpalatable but indispensable condition, he rejected it; distrust was immediately generated, alienation ensued, and a speedy rupture was the issue of those misplaced alliances between minds too exclusively occupied by opposing interests. It was thus that Louis XVI., after admitting to his council the Feuillant party, had splenetically repudiated Narbonne, who was its most decided leader, and found himself compelled, as the only means of composing the storm, to give himself up to the mercy of the Gironde. The example of England, where the sovereign often selects his ministers from the opposition, weighed with the king in inducing his present course. The court thereupon conceived a hope, for human ingenuity always discovers one even in the most dismal conjunctures. It flattered itself, then, that Louis XVI., by taking incapable and ridiculous demagogues into the cabinet, would destroy the reputation of the party from which he had chosen them. However, the result was far different, and the new ministry belied the malevolent prophecies of the courtiers.

Upwards of a month previously, Delessart and Narbonne had called to them a man whose talents they judged most precious, and placed him near them, to be rendered serviceable as emergencies might arise. This man was Dumouriez, who, alternately commanding in Normandy and in La Vendée, had every where distinguished himself for firmness and ability. He had offered himself first to the court, then to the Constituent Assembly; for every party was to him the same, so long as he was allowed to exercise his active spirit and his extraordinary powers. Dumouriez, repressed as it were by the age, had passed his early years in diplomatic intrigues. With all his enterprise, his military and political genius, and his half century of years, at the commencement of the revolution he was still nothing but a brilliant adventurer. He had preserved, however, the fire and vigour of youth. So soon as a war or a revolution broke out, he formed his plans, laid them before all parties, ready to act for all, provided only action was accorded him. He had thus accustomed himself to make light of the nature of a cause; but although too deficient in conviction, he was generous, feeling, and capable of attachment, if not to principles, at least to persons. But with a mind thus dazzling, prompt, and capacious, with a courage by turns calm and impetuous, he was admirable as an instrument, but incapable of swaying. He possessed neither the dignity of a profound conviction, nor the stubborn pride of an arbitrary disposition, and he was capable of commanding none but soldiers. If to his genius had been joined the passions of Mirabeau, the determination of a Cromwell, or even the dogmatism of a Robespierre, he would have domineered over the revolution and France.

Dumouriez, on taking his place by the side of Narbonne, forthwith formed a vast military plan. He embraced at once an offensive and defensive war. Where France stretched to her natural limits, the Rhine, the Alps, the Pyrenees, and the ocean, he advised she should stand on the defensive. But on the side of the Low Countries, where the French territory did not reach the Rhine, and on that of Savoy, where it fell short of the Alps, he maintained that sudden attacks should be made until the natural boundaries were attained, when the defensive should be resumed. This plan consulted both interest and principles, framed as it was to take advantage of a war which France had not provoked, to return, with respect, to boundaries, to the simple landmarks of nature. He furthermore proposed the formation of a fourth army, destined to occupy the south, and craved the command of it, which was promised him.

* Sitting of the 10th March.

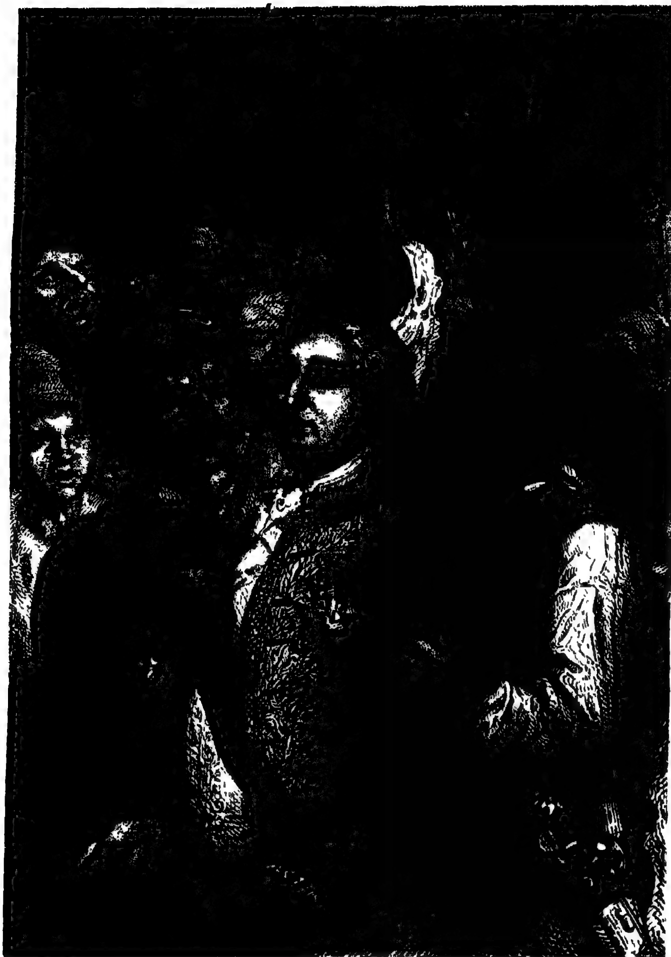
Dumouriez had ingratiated himself with Gensonné, one of the civil commissioners sent into La Vendée by the Constituent Assembly, since a deputy in the Legislative, and one of the most influential members of the Gironde. Having remarked, also, that the Jacobins were the predominant faction, he had appeared in their club, read divers memorials amidst great applause, and not the less continued his ancient friendship with Delaporte, intendant of the civil list, and a devoted adherent of Louis XVI. Thus connected with the different parties upon the point of coalescing, Dumouriez could not fail to rise, and to be called to the ministry. Louis XVI. offered him the portfolio of foreign affairs, left on his hands by the decree of impeachment against Delessart; but still attached to the impeached minister, the king tendered it to him only ad interim. Dumouriez, feeling himself powerfully supported, and unwilling to appear as if keeping the office for a Feuillant minister, refused the portfolio upon those terms, and obtained it unconditionally. He found in the administration only Cahier de Gerville and Degraves. Cahier de Gerville, although he had given in his resignation, had not yet relinquished office. Degraves had replaced Narbonne; he was young, flexible, and inexperienced; Dumouriez understood how to win him over, and he thus held in his own hands the foreign relations and the military administration—that is to say, the provocatives and the organisation of war. Less would have scarcely satisfied his enterprising genius. No sooner was he installed in the ministry, than Dumouriez assumed the red cap in the Jacobin Club, a new head-dress borrowed from the Phrygians, and now become the emblem of liberty. He promised its members that he would govern for and by them. When presented to the king, he contrived to satisfy him as to his conduct at the Jacobins'; he removed the ill impressions that conduct had naturally inspired; he had the art to excite his feelings by protestations of devotedness, and to dissipate his sombre sadness by dint of humour. He persuaded him that he sought popularity only for the good of the monarchy, and to ensure its stability. In spite of all his deference, however, he took care to impress upon the monarch that the constitution was not to be avoided, endeavouring to console him at the same time by demonstrating that a king might still be very powerful even with its restrictions. His first dispatches to the powers, distinguished for their strength of argument and their firmness of tone, changed the nature of the negotiations, and placed France in a perfectly new attitude, but rendered war imminent. It was natural that Dumouriez should desire war, since he had all its genius, and had meditated upon that great art for thirty-six years; but it must be allowed, likewise, that the conduct of the cabinet of Vienna and the irritation of the assembly had already rendered it inevitable.

Dumouriez, by his behaviour at the Jacobins, and by his known alliance with the Gironde, was sure, even without any peculiar animosity against the Feuillants, to become embroiled with them; but he had, in addition, displaced them. He was, consequently, in constant opposition with the leaders of that party. Braving, however, the sarcastic and scornful epigrams they launched against the Jacobins and the assembly, he determined to pursue his own course with the assurance that was usual to him.



It was necessary to fill up the vacancies in the cabinet. Pétion, Gensonné, and Brissot, were consulted upon the selections to be made. According to the existing law, the ministers could not be taken from the present or preceding assembly, therefore the range of choice was extremely limited. For the marine, Dumouriez proposed Lacoste, an old official in that department, experienced, industrious, and an ardent patriot, but nevertheless attached to the king, esteemed by him, and remaining longer in his councils than all the others. The ministry of justice was designed for that young Louvet who had recently distinguished himself at the Jacobins, and obtained the good opinion of the Girondists since he had so ably supported the opinion of Brissot in favour of war; but the bilious Robespierre caused him to be immediately denounced. Louvet justified himself with perfect success; but it was judged inexpedient to select a man whose popularity was doubtful, and Duranthon was chosen. He was an advocate from Bordeaux, an enlightened and upright man, but too feeble in character. The finance and home departments remained open to candidates. The Gironde proposed Clavière, known by some highly esteemed works on subjects of finance. Clavière had abundance of ideas, all the obstinacy of a meditative theorist, and great alacrity in business. The minister intrusted with the home department was Roland, formerly inspector of manufactures, and known by excellent publications on the industrial and mechanical arts. This man, with austere manners, inflexible principles, and a cold, harsh exterior, yielded, without being aware of it, to the superior ascendancy of his wife. Madame Roland was young and handsome. Educated in deep seclusion, in philosophical and republican ideas, she had become imbued with sentiments superior to her sex, and, from the principles then paramount, had formed for herself a stern political creed. Living in the closest confidence with her husband, she lent him her pen, imparted to him some of her own vivacity, and communicated her enthusiasm not alone to her husband, but to all the Girondists, who, passionately attached to liberty and philosophy, admired her for her beauty, her wit, and for her principles, which were identical with their own.*

The new ministry comprised men of qualifications sufficiently eminent to succeed; but it needed to be guarded, lest it should too far displease Louis XVI., and to take care that it maintained its alliance with the Gironde. It was therefore quite capable of fulfilling its task; but it might reasonably be apprehended that all would be at an end whenever, to the

* As Madame Roland fills an important part in the revolution, it may be interesting to give an account of her from the pen of one of the most striking writers on that event.

"Roland was a man of ordinary capacity, but he obtained the reputation of genius by means of his wife, who thought, wrote, and spoke for him. She was a woman of most superior mind; with as much virtue as pride, as much ambition as domestic virtue. Daughter of an engraver, she commenced her career by wishing to contend with a queen; and no sooner had Marie Antoinette fallen, than she seemed resolute to maintain the combat, no longer against a person of her own sex, but with the men who pretended to rival the reputation of her husband.

Madame Roland had great talent, but she wanted tact and moderation. She belonged to that class in the middling ranks that scarcely knows what good breeding is; her manners were too brusque; she trusted implicitly to her good intentions, and was quite indifferent in regard to external appearances, which, after all, are almost every thing in this world. Like Marie Antoinette, she was master in her own family; the former was king, the latter was minister; her husband, whom she constantly put forward, as often disappeared in her presence, which gave rise to the bon mot of Condorcet—'When I wish to see the minister of the interior, I never can see any thing but the petticoat of his wife.' This was strictly true: persons on business uniformly applied to Madame Roland instead of the minister; and whatever she may have said in her Memoirs, it is certain that unconsciously she opened the portfolio with her own hand. She was to the last degree impatient under the attacks of the tribune, to which she had no means of reply, and took her revenge by means of pamphlets and articles in the public journals. In these she kept up an incessant warfare, which Roland sanctioned with his name, but in which it was easy to discover the warm and brilliant style of his wife."—Graphic History of National Convention, by M. L. Vol. 1. p. 38; French edition.

The People at the Tuileries
20th June 1792

inherent incompatibility of distinct parties, the faults of individuals should be superadded; and this could scarcely fail to happen very speedily. Louis XVI., struck with the activity of his ministers, with their honest zeal, and with their aptitude for affairs, was charmed for the instant; their economical reforms especially delighted him, for he had always been attached to that species of improvement which required no sacrifice of power or principle. If he could have been always satisfied as he was at first, and have separated himself from the parasites of the court, he would have easily brought himself to endure the constitution. He reiterated his resolution in that respect with pure sincerity to the ministers, and succeeded in convincing the most incredulous, Roland and Clavière. A perfect persuasion prevailed on both sides. The Gironde, which was republican only from distrust of the king, ceased at that time to be so, and Vergniaud, Gensonné, and Guadet, entered into communication with Louis XVI., which afterwards formed a head of accusation against them. The inflexible spouse of Roland was alone in doubt, and restrained her too easy friends, as she thought them, from committing themselves too far. The cause of her distrust is obvious; she was not accustomed to see the king. The ministers, on the contrary, conversed with him every day, and honest men often meeting together soon feel at ease as to each other's intentions; but this confidence could not last long, because unavoidable questions were coming on, certain to evoke all the discrepancies in their sentiments.

The courtiers sought to cast ridicule upon the somewhat republican simplicity of the new administration, and upon the uncouth rudeness of Roland, who presented himself at the palace without buckles in his shoes.* Dumouriez retorted their sarcasms; and mingling gaiety of humour with assiduous devotion to business, he pleased the king, won upon him by his superior mind, and perhaps, also, was more agreeable than the others from the flexibility of his opinions. The queen, finding that of all the ministers he had the most influence over the mind of her consort, desired to see him. He has presented us in his Memoirs with an account of that singular interview, which painfully depicts the agitated state of that unfortunate princess, worthy of a more auspicious reign, of better friends, and of a less dismal fate.

Introduced, says he, into the queen's apartment, he found her alone, greatly flushed, walking rapidly to and fro, with an agitation that presaged a somewhat warm explanation. He leaned upon the corner of the mantelpiece, sorrowfully affected at the destiny of the princess, and at the fearful sensations under which she seemed labouring. She advanced to him with an air of majesty and anger, and said to him—"Sir, you are omnipotent at this moment, but you are so by the favour of the people, who soon break their idols. Your life depends upon your conduct. They say you have great talent. You ought to know that neither the king nor I can endure all these encroachments—nor the constitution. I tell you so frankly; take your own part."

He answered her, "Madam, I am much grieved at the painful avowal which your majesty has just made to me. I will not betray your confidence; but I stand between the king and the nation, and I belong to my country. Permit me to assure you that the safety of the king, your own, that of your august offspring, are linked with the constitution, as well as the re-establishment of the king's authority. I should fail in my duty to you and to him likewise, if I held a different language. You are both encompassed by enemies, who sacrifice you to their own interest. Were the constitution once in full activity, so far from rendering the king miserable, it would form his felicity and glory. It behoves him to concur unreservedly in its prompt and solid establishment." The unfortunate queen, offended that Dumouriez thus frankly combated her ideas, said to him, raising her voice into an acrimonious tone, "It will not last—take care of yourself."

Dumouriez replied with an unassuming firmness—"Madam, I am more than fifty years old; my life has been beset by many perils; and on taking the ministry, I was well aware that responsibility was not the greatest of my dangers." "There wanted nothing more," she cried, with anguish, "but to calumniate me! You seem to think, then, I am capable of having you assassinated!" And tears flowed from her eyes.

Equally agitated with herself, he said, "God preserve me from doing you so cruel an injustice! The character of your majesty is great and noble; you have given heroic proofs of it, which I have admired, and which have attached me to you." She became calm at these words, and drew near him. He continued—"Believe me, madam, I have no interest in deceiving you: I abhor as much as you anarchy and crimes. I am fortified by experience. I am better able than your majesty to judge of events. This is not a transitory popular movement, as you seem to imagine. It is an almost universal insurrection of a great nation against inveterate abuses. Factions heighten the conflagration: in all of them there are wretches and madmen. I consider in the revolution only the king and the entire nation; all that tends to separate them leads to their mutual ruin; I am striving with all my power to unite them—it is for you to assist me. If I be an obstacle to your designs, if you persist in adhering to them, tell me so; I will instantly bear my resignation to the king, and retire to some corner to lament over my country's and your fate."

The conclusion of these remarks completely established the queen's confidence. They passed in review together the different factions; he pointed out faults and crimes on all parts; he proved to her that she was betrayed in her privacy; he quoted to her certain words uttered in the most intimate confidence. The princess appeared to him in the end to be perfectly convinced, and she dismissed him with a serene and affable air. She was quite sincere; but those around her, and the horrible excesses of Marat's journal, and of the Jacobins, soon drove her back into her fatal resolutions.

Another day she said to him before the king, "You see me in deep affliction: I dare not look out of a window fronting the garden. Last evening, wishing to breathe the air, I went to a window of the court: an artilleryman on guard apostrophised me with a gross expression, adding, 'How I should like to have your head on the point of my bayonet!' In that frightful garden, on one side we see a man mounted on a chair, reading in a loud voice horrible calumnies against us; on another side is an abbé whom they are dragging in a pond, bestowing on him blows and execrations. At the same time, others are playing at foot-ball, or promenading in perfect tranquillity. What a residence! What a nation!"*

* ["The court called this ministry, which was formed in the month of March, 'the sans-culotte (breechless) ministry.' The first time Roland appeared at the palace with strings in his shoes and a round hat, contrary to the rules of etiquette, the master of the ceremonies refused to admit him. But obliged to give him entrance, he said to Dumouriez, pointing at Roland, 'Ah! sir, no buckles on his shoes!' 'Ah! sir, all is lost!' replied Dumouriez, with the greatest gravity. Such were still the objects of court solicitude!"—Mignet, vol. i. p. 196.]

* Dumouriez's Memoirs, book iii. chap. 6. Madame Campan gives a different account of this interview:—

"All parties were on the alert," she says, "to ruin the king or to save him. One day I found the queen extremely uneasy; she told me she no longer knew where she was; that the Jacobin leaders offered themselves to her through the medium of Dumouriez, or that Dumouriez, abandoning the Jacobin party, had offered himself to her; that she had granted him an audience; that when alone with her, he had thrown himself at her feet,

Thus, by a sort of fatality, the presumed intentions of the palace aroused the suspicion and fury of the people, and the vociferations of the multitude augmented the sorrows and the imprudence of the palace. Despair consequently reigned within and without. But why, it may be asked, did not a frank explanation put an end to so many evils? Why did not the palace comprehend the real apprehensions of the people? Why were not the people made to understand the actual misery of the palace?—But why are men but mortals? At this last query we must stop, bowing with a sigh to human nature, and proceed with our mournful tale.

Leopold II. was dead. The pacific dispositions of that prince rendered the event a subject of regret with regard to the peace of Europe, for the same moderation could not be anticipated from his nephew and successor, Francis, King of Bohemia and Hungary. Gustavus, King of Sweden, had been recently assassinated at a ball. The enemies of the Jacobins charged them with the murder; but it was sufficiently proved to be the crime of the nobility, humbled by Gustavus in the last Swedish revolution. Thus nobility, which denounced the revolutionary fury of the people in France, gave in the north an example of what it had formerly been itself, and of what it still was in countries where civilisation was less advanced. What an example, what a lesson, for Louis XVI., if he could have dispassionately surveyed it! The death of Gustavus frustrated the enterprise he had projected against France, for which Catherine was to have furnished soldiers, and Spain subsidies. It is, however, very doubtful whether the faithless Catherine would have fulfilled what she had undertaken; and the death of Gustavus, so exaggerated as to its consequences, was in reality an occurrence of but slight importance.†

Delessart had been impeached for the imbecility of his dispatches: it was consistent neither with the taste nor the interests of Dumouriez to negotiate feebly with foreign powers. His latter dispatches had appeared to satisfy Louis XVI., from their appropriate and firm tenor. M. de Noailles, French ambassador at Vienna, and an agent of doubtful sincerity, forwarded his resignation to Dumouriez, alleging that he despaired of inducing the head of the house of Austria to listen to the language he had been instructed to employ. Dumouriez hastened to lay the communication before the assembly, which, moved to exasperation at the circumstance, instantly voted an impeachment against M. de Noailles. Another ambassador was dispatched with fresh instructions. Two days subsequently, Noailles recalled his resignation, and sent the categorical answer he had demanded from the cabinet of Vienna. The note of M. de Cobentzel, containing this answer, is, amid all the signal faults of the powers, one of the most impolitic they ever committed. Cobentzel required, in the name of his court, the re-establishment of the French monarchy upon the foundations laid down in the royal declaration of the 23d June 1789. This went to impose the re-institution of the three orders, the restitution of the church lands, and the restoration of the Comtat-Venaissin to the pope. This Austrian minister likewise demanded the restoration of their lands in Alsace to the princes of the empire, with all their feudal rights. France must have been judged through the passions of Coblentz, to induce the proposition of such conditions. It was requiring at once the annihilation of a constitution sworn to by the king and the nation, the revocation of a solemn resolution touching Avignon, and national bankruptcy, by restoring the church possessions already alienated. And besides, by what authority was so abject a submission asked? By what right was any interference hazarded in the internal affairs of France? What just complaint could be proffered on behalf of the princes in Alsace, since their estates were comprehended within the circuit of French sovereignty, and were necessarily subject to its laws?

The first impulse of the king and of Dumouriez was to repair to the assembly and apprise it of this note. That body received it with a burst of indignation, and deservedly so; a general cry for war rung through the hall. There was a circumstance, however, which Dumouriez did not impart to the assembly, namely, that Austria, which he had threatened with a fresh insurrection at Liege, had dispatched an agent to treat with him upon that subject; that the language of this agent was completely at variance with that of the Austrian minister, and that the last note was very evidently the result of some sudden and suggested resolution. The assembly revoked the decree of impeachment passed against Noailles, and gave instructions for a prompt report. The king was now unable to recede; the fatal war was at last about to be declared; and in no possible case could it be favourable to his interests. If victors, the French would become yet more urgent and inexorable as to the observation of the new law; if vanquished, they would be incensed against the government, and accuse it of having inadequately supported the war. Louis XVI. was perfectly sensible of this alternative peril; and the determination for war was one of those which cost him the severest pangs.*

assuring her that though he had drawn the red cap over his ears, he neither was nor could be a Jacobin; that the revolution had been allowed to progress until the mob of disorganisers, who were eager only for pillage, were capable of any extremity, and could give the assembly a formidable army prepared to undermine the remnants of a throne already too shattered. Speaking with great warmth, he had seized the queen's hand, and, kissing it with transport, exclaimed, 'Allow yourself to be saved!' The queen told me that no reliance could be placed on the protestations of a traitor; that his whole conduct was so well known, that the wisest course, unquestionably, was to put no trust in him; besides, that the princes emphatically recommended no confidence to be put in any proposition emanating at home—et cetera."—Vol. ii. p. 202.

The account of this interview is here, as we see, different in many particulars; but the groundwork is the same; only, passing through the mouth of the queen and that of Madame Campan, it of course assumed a tone unfavourable to Dumouriez. That of Dumouriez depicts in a very natural manner the agitation of the unfortunate Marie Antoinette; and as he relates nothing derogatory to that princess, and nothing incompatible with her character, I have preferred it. It is possible, nevertheless, that the vanity of Dumouriez has led him to select with partiality such details as were most flattering to himself.

† Bouillé, whose Memoirs I have previously cited, and who was in a position to form a correct opinion upon the real intentions of the powers, put no trust whatever in the zeal and sincerity of Catherine. Upon this subject he thus expresses himself:—

"We see that this prince (Gustavus) reckoned greatly upon the dispositions of the Empress of Russia, and upon the active part she was prepared to take in the confederation, she having hitherto restricted herself to demonstrations. The King of Sweden was in error, and I doubt that Catherine would have ever intrusted him with the 16,000 Russians she had promised. I am persuaded, besides, that the emperor and King of Prussia had not communicated to him either their projects or views. Personally, both entertained more than repugnance towards him; and they desired that he should not assume any active part in the affairs of France."—Bouillé, p. 319.

* Madame Campan informs us, in one and the same passage, of the construction of the iron-chest and of the existence of a secret protest framed by the king against the declaration of war. The terror of the king for war partook of the extraordinary, and he strove by all means to throw its odium upon the popular party.

"The king had a prodigious quantity of papers, and, unfortunately, conceived the idea of having secretly constructed, by a locksmith whom he had employed for more than ten years, a safe in an interior corridor of his apartment. This safe, but for the denunciation of that man, would have been long unknown. At the spot where it was placed, the wall was painted to resemble large stones, and the aperture was perfectly concealed in the dark grooves which formed the shaded part of those painted stones. But before the locksmith had denounced to the assembly what has since been called the iron-chest, the queen was aware that he had

Dumouriez drew up the report with his accustomed celerity, and carried it to the king, who kept it for three days. It was a question whether the king, upon whom was thrown the initiative with regard to the assembly, should urge it to declare war, or whether he should content himself with consulting it upon the subject, by the announcement that France, in accordance with the prescribed emergencies, was in a state of war. The ministers, Roland and Clavière, declared for the first course. The orators of the Gironde likewise supported that opinion, and desired to dictate the speech from the throne. It was a sad task for Louis XVI. to declare war, and he desired rather to declare a state of war. The distinction was of little importance; but it was more consonant to his feelings. So slight a deference to his peculiar position could do no injury. Dumouriez, more easily moved, paid no attention to the two ministers, and, supported by Degraves, Lacoste, and Duranthon, secured the adoption of the king's opinion. This was his first difference with the Gironde. The king himself composed his speech, and repaired in person to the assembly, accompanied by all his ministers. A vast concourse of spectators added to the effect of that day's sitting, which was to decide the fate of France and of Europe. The countenance of the monarch was agitated, and bespoke profound solicitude. Dumouriez read a detailed report of the negotiations of France with the empire; he demonstrated that the treaty of 1756 was de facto broken, and that, according to the last ultimatum, France was in a state of war. He added, that the king having no other legal mode of consulting the assembly than by a formal proposition of war, he was content to consult it in that form.

Louis XVI. then spoke with much dignity, but in a nervous voice:—"Gentlemen," said he, "you have heard the result of the negotiations which I have pursued with the court of Vienna. The conclusions of the report express the unanimous opinion of my council, and I have myself adopted them. They are conformable to the wishes often manifested by the National Assembly, and to the sentiments conveyed to me by numerous citizens in different parts of the kingdom. All prefer war to longer beholding the dignity of the French people outraged, and the national safety menaced. I have felt it incumbent on me previously to use all possible means to preserve peace. I now come, according to the constitution, to propose to the National Assembly war against the King of Hungary and Bohemia."

The most favourable reception was given to this proposition, and cries of "Long live the king!" resounded from all sides. The assembly answered the king that it would forthwith enter upon deliberation, and would communicate the result to him by message. A very stormy debate then commenced, and was continued into the dead of night. The reasons already stated were repeated for and against; but at last the decree was passed, and war resolved on by a great majority.

"Considering," ran the assembly's decree, "that the court of Vienna, in contempt of treaties, has not ceased to grant avowed protection to French rebels; that it has urged and formed an alliance with several European powers against the independence and safety of the French nation:

That Francis the First, King of Hungary and Bohemia,* has, by his notes of the 18th March and 7th April last, refused to renounce this alliance:

That, notwithstanding the proposal made to him by the note of the 11th March last, to reduce on either side the troops upon the frontiers to the peace establishment, he has persisted in and increased his hostile preparations:

That he has formally outraged the sovereignty of the French nation, by declaring his determination to support the pretensions of the German princes holding possessions in France, to whom the French nation has constantly offered indemnities:

That he has endeavoured to sow discord amongst French citizens, and to arm them against each other, by offering to malecontents a support in the union of the powers:

Considering, lastly, that the refusal to answer the last dispatches of the King of the French destroys all hope of obtaining, by the course of an amicable negotiation, any redress for these multifarious grievances, and is equivalent to a declaration of war,—

The assembly declares there is the requisite urgency."†

It must be granted that this cruel war, which so long desolated Europe, was not provoked by France, but by the foreign powers. France, in declaring it, did but record by a decree the state in which they had placed her. Condorcet was selected to compose an exposition of the motives of the French nation. History ought to cherish this document, so exquisite a model is it of clear and temperate reasoning.‡

spoken of it to some of his companions, and that this man, in whom the king from habit placed too much confidence, was a Jacobin. She apprised the king of what had thus come to her knowledge, and induced him to fill a very large portfolio with all the documents he was most interested in preserving, and to intrust it to my care. She urged him, in my presence, to leave nothing in that safe, and the king, to tranquillise her, assured her that he had left nothing in it. I wished to take the portfolio, and carry it into my apartment; but it was too heavy for me to lift. The king told me he would carry it himself; I went before him to open the doors. When he had deposited the portfolio in my inner cabinet, he merely said to me, 'The queen will tell you what this contains.' Upon returning to the queen, I questioned her respecting it, judging from the king's words that it was expedient I should be let into the secret. 'They are,' the queen replied, 'documents which would be most fatal to the king, if they should proceed to the extremity of putting him on his trial. But what he desires especially that I should tell you is, that the portfolio contains the minutes of a privy-council, in which the king pronounced an opinion against the war. He caused them to be signed by all the ministers, and, in the event of such a process, he is confident that this document will be very useful.' I asked to whom she thought I ought to intrust the portfolio. 'To whom you please,' answered the queen; 'you are alone responsible for it. Do not remove from the palace, even in your relief months; there are circumstances in which it may be of great consequence to have it forthcoming upon the instant.'"—Madame Campan, vol. ii. p. 222.

* Francis I. was not yet elected emperor.

† [M. Thiers has omitted the concluding and main terms of this momentous decree. It proceeds: "The National Assembly —— deliberating on the king's formal proposition, and having declared that there is urgency, DECREES war against the King of Hungary and Bohemia."]

‡ Exposition of the motives which have determined the National Assembly to declare, upon the formal proposition of the King, that there are grounds for declaring war against the King of Hungary and Bohemia; by M. Condorcet.—(Sitting of the 20th April 1792.)

"Impelled to consent to war by the most imperious necessity, the National Assembly is aware that it will be accused of having hastened or provoked it.

It feels that the insidious course of the court of Vienna has been framed solely with a view to give a shadow of foundation to this imputation, which is precious to the foreign powers as a blind to their people upon the real motives of their unjust attack against France; it knows that this reproach will be repeated by the internal enemies of our constitution and our laws, in the criminal hope of wresting from the representatives of the nation the public confidence.

A simple exposition of their policy is their sole vindication, and they address it with equal composure to aliens and Frenchmen, since nature has planted the same sentiments of justice in the hearts of all men.

Every nation has the sole power to frame laws for itself, and the inalienable right to alter them. This right belongs to none, or it belongs to all in perfect equality; to attack it in one, is to declare that it is recognised in none other; a design to ravish it by force from a foreign nation, is an announcement that the intervener does not respect it in that of which he is a citizen or the chief; it is to betray his own country, to proclaim himself

The proclamation of war caused general joy. The patriots saw in it an end to the fears which the emigration and the uncertain conduct of the king caused them. The moderates, chiefly alarmed at the danger of intestine divisions, hoped that the common peril would stifle them, and that the camps would absorb the enemy of the human race! The French nation might justly conclude, that truths so simple would prevail with all princes and that, in the eighteenth century, none would venture to oppose them with the antiquated maxims of tyranny; but its hopes have been falsified; a league has been formed against its independence, and there is left to it but the alternative of convincing its enemies of the justice of its cause, or of opposing them by force of arms.

Apprised of this threatening league, but anxious to preserve peace, the National Assembly first inquired what object was embraced in this union of powers so long rivals, and an answer was given that its motives were the maintenance of general tranquillity, the security and honour of crowns, the fear of witnessing a renewal of events which certain epochs of the French revolution have brought forth.

But how did France menace the general tranquillity, when it had taken a solemn resolution to attempt no conquest, to attack the liberty of no people—when, during the long and sanguinary strife which raged in the Low Countries and in the states of Liege between governments and citizens, it observed the most rigorous neutrality?

Doubtless, the French nation has openly proclaimed that sovereignty belongs only to the people, who, restricted in the exercise of their will by the rights of posterity, cannot delegate irrevocable power; doubtless, it has distinctly asserted that no usage, no express law, no consent, no convention, is of efficacy to subject a society of men to any authority which they have not the right to recall; but what idea do these princes entertain of the legitimacy of their own power, or of the justice with which they exercise it, if they regard the enunciation of these maxims as an enterprise against the tranquillity of their states?

Will they allege that this tranquillity must be surely troubled by the works and discourses of certain Frenchmen? This would be tantamount, again, to a demand under threat of arms for a law against the liberty of the press, a declaration of war against the progress of reason; and when it is notorious that the French nation has been every where scandalised with impunity, that the presses of neighbouring countries have never ceased from pouring into our departments works designed to stimulate treason, to counsel revolt; and when the evidences of protection and favour to their authors are remembered—will it be believed that a sincere love of peace, and not a hatred of liberty, has inspired these hypocritical reproaches?

Objections have been made to endeavours, on the part of the French, to excite neighbouring nations to break their fetters, to reclaim their rights. But the ministers who have dilated on these imputations, without daring to cite a single fact in support of them, knew well how groundless they were; and had they even been real, powers which have permitted the assemblages of our emigrants, have afforded them succours, have received their envoys, have publicly admitted them to their conferences, and have not blushed to exhort the French to civil war, would have no right to complain; otherwise, it has become an axiom, that to extend servitude is allowable, to propagate liberty is criminal; that all expedients are legitimate against nations; and that kings alone have actual rights. Never, surely, did the pride of monarchs so audaciously insult the majesty of nations!

The French people, free to settle the form of their own constitution, could not endanger, by using that prerogative, either the security or the honour of foreign crowns. Do the chiefs of other countries rank amongst their attributes the power to compel the French nation to confer on the chief of its government an authority equal to what themselves exercise in their states? Would they, because they have subjects, interdict free men from elsewhere existing? And do they not perceive, that, by permitting all means for ensuring what they denominate the security of crowns, they declared legitimate all that a nation may undertake in favour of universal liberty?

If violences, if crimes, have tarnished certain epochs of the French revolution, to the depositaries of the national will alone belonged the power to punish them or bury them in oblivion; every citizen, every magistrate, whatever may be his title, ought to claim justice only from the laws of his country, and can expect it from them alone. Foreign powers, inasmuch as their subjects have been uninjured by such events, can have no just ground either for remonstrating, or for taking hostile measures to prevent their recurrence. The relationship or personal alliance between kings is nothing in the sight of nations; enslaved or free, common interests unite them; nature has placed their happiness in peace, in the mutual succours of an amiable fraternity; she would be outraged should any presume to weigh in the same balance the destiny of twenty millions of men, and the affections or pride of a few individuals. Are we, then, again doomed to witness the voluntary serfage of populations—heap with human victims the altars of the earth's false deities?

Thus, all these alleged motives for a league against France, were but fresh assaults on her independence. She was justified in demanding a renunciation of injurious projects, and in regarding the refusal as an act of hostility; such are the principles which have actuated the proceedings of the National Assembly. It has continued to desire peace, but it must prefer war to a patience perilous to liberty; it could not conceal from itself, that changes in the constitution, subversive of the equality upon which it is based, were the sole design of the enemies of France—that they purposed to chastise her for having recognised, in their full extent, the rights common to all mankind; and it was then that it took the oath, reverberated throughout France, to perish rather than suffer the least infringement upon the liberty of citizens, upon the sovereignty of the nation, and, above all, upon that equality without which there is neither justice nor happiness for societies.

Are the French reproached for not sufficiently respecting the rights of others, by offering only pecuniary indemnities to the German princes, proprietors in Alsace, and to the pope?

Treaties had recognised the sovereignty of France over Alsace, and, for more than a century, it has been peaceably exercised. The rights which those treaties had reserved, were simply privileges; the meaning of that reservation, therefore, was, that the holders of fiefs in Alsace should retain them with the ancient prerogatives, so long as the general laws of France should permit the various forms of feudalism; that reservation also signified, that if the feudal rights were included in one common abrogation, the nation would owe a satisfaction to the possessors, for the substantial advantages resulting therefrom; for such is all that the right of property can demand, when it is in opposition to the law, in contradiction to the public weal. The citizens of Alsace are Frenchmen, and the nation could not, without disgrace and injustice, allow them to be deprived of the smallest portion of rights common to all whom that appellation ought equally to shelter. Will it be said, that, in order to indemnify the princes, part of the territory should be abandoned to them? No; a free and generous nation traffics not with men; it condemns not to slavery, nor delivers up to masters those whom it has once admitted to a participation of its liberty.

The citizens of the Comtats were in a position to give themselves a constitution; they might have declared themselves independent—they preferred being Frenchmen; and France will not abandon them after having adopted them. Had she refused to grant their request, their district is enclosed by her territory, and she could not have permitted their oppressors to traverse a land of liberty when bent upon punishing men for daring to render themselves independent, and to resume their rights. All the pope possessed in that country was a revenue for gubernatorial functions; the people, when they relieved him from those functions, made use of a privilege which long servitude had suspended but could not take away; and the indemnity proposed by France was not even exigible in justice.

Thus, what is arrogantly demanded in the name of the pope and the princes holding possessions in Alsace, involves further violations of natural right. It is still for the pretensions of a few men that the blood of nations is to flow! And if the ministers of the house of Austria had resolved to declare war against reason in the name of prejudices, against populations in the name of kings, they could have held no other language!

It has been asserted that the voice of the French people for the maintenance of its equality and its independence, is that of a faction. But the French nation has a constitution; that constitution has been acknowledged and adopted by the general body of the citizens; it cannot be altered but by the will of the people, and according to forms which itself has prescribed; so long as it subsists, the powers established under it have alone the right to promulgate the national determination, and it is through them that such determination has been made known to foreign states. It is the king, who, at the request of the National Assembly, and fulfilment of the functions conferred on him by the constitution, has complained of the protection afforded to the emigrants, and has fruitlessly demanded that it should be withheld; it is he who has asked for explanations concerning the league formed against France; it is he who has insisted that this league should be dissolved; and it is a just matter of astonishment to hear the solemn resolve of a nation, publicly expressed by its legitimate all those turbulent spirits hatched by the revolution. A few Feuillants alone, well-inclined to impute faults to the assembly, reproached it with having violated the constitution, according to which France was debarred from ever being in a state of aggression. But it was too palpable that, in the present instance, France did not attack. Consequently, putting aside the king and certain malecontents, war was the general desire.

Lafayette prepared courageously to serve his country in this new career. It was he who was principally charged with the execution of the plan laid down by Dumouriez and apparently ordered by Degraves. Dumouriez had reasonably flattered himself, and had led the patriots confidently to anticipate, that the invasion of Belgium would be an easy operation. That country, recently agitated by a revolution which Austria had suppressed, was naturally judged disposed to rise at the first appearance of the French; and then would be realised that warning of the assembly to sovereigns, "If you send us war, we will return you liberty." Furthermore, such an expedition was in execution of Dumouriez's great plan, which consisted in extending France to her natural boundaries. Rochambeau commanded the army nearest the intended scene of action, but it was impossible to intrust him with the enterprise, on account of his peevish and sickly temperament, and above all, because he was less suitable than Lafayette for an invasion half-military and half-popular. It was desired that Lafayette should have the command-in-chief, but Dumouriez refused to consent, doubtless from envy. He alleged in excuse that the supreme command in this expedition could not be conferred upon a simple general in presence of a field-marshal. He likewise asserted, and this motive was better founded, that Lafayette was distrusted by the Jacobins and the assembly. It is quite certain that he, young, active, and the only one of the generals who was beloved by his army, alarmed the heated imaginations of the time, and gave, by his great influence, an air of probability to the calumnies of the malignant. However, he frankly and freely offered to execute the joint diplomatic and military plan of the minister; he demanded fifty thousand men, with whom he proposed to proceed by Namur and the Meuse to Liege, where he would become master of the Low Countries. This well-conceived project was approved by Dumouriez; war in fact not having been declared beyond a few days, Austria had not had time to cover her possessions in Belgium, and success seemed inevitable. Accordingly, Lafayette had orders to march at once with ten thousand men from Givet to Namur, and from Namur upon Liege or Brussels; he was to be immediately followed by all his army. Whilst he executed this movement, Lieutenant-General Biron was to set off from Valenciennes with ten thousand men, and proceed in the direction of Mons. Another officer was ordered to march upon Tournay, and occupy it by surprise. These movements, to be effected by officers of Rochambeau, were merely intended to support and mask the real attack intrusted to Lafayette.

The period fixed for the execution of the plan was between the 20th April and the 2d May. Biron commenced his march, passed through Valenciennes, seized upon Quiévrain, and fell in with some hostile detachments near Mons. All at once, two dragoon regiments, without even having the enemy in sight, cried out, "We are betrayed!" took to flight, and carried the whole army in their train. The officers attempted in vain to stop them; they threatened to shoot them, and continued to fly. The camp was abandoned, and all the military stores became the prey of the Imperialists.

Whilst this event was passing at Mons, Theobald Dillon, in pursuance of the arrangement, left Lille with two thousand infantry and one thousand horse. In the very hour of Biron's disaster, this cavalry, at sight of some Austrian troops, retreated, shouting that it was betrayed; it drew the infantry after it, and all the baggage was again abandoned to the enemy. Theobald Dillon, and an officer of engineers, named Berthois, were massacred by the soldiers and the people of Lille, who accused them of treachery. In the mean time, Lafayette, apprised too late, had passed representatives, stigmatised as the cry of a petty faction. What title equally worthy of respect can those kings invoke who coerce deluded nations to combat against the interests of their own freedom, and to take up arms against rights which are their's also—to choke, under the ruins of the French constitution, the germs of their own felicity and the common hopes of the human race?

And, again, is it but a faction they would accuse of conspiring for the universal liberty of mankind? It is, then, all humanity these cringing ministers presume to brand with that odious term!

But, say they, the king of the French is not free. What! is it inconsistent with freedom to respect the laws of a country? Liberty to counteract or evade them, to oppose to them an alien force, is not a right, but a criminal usurpation.

Hence, in repudiating all these insidious propositions, in contemning these flagrant declamations, the National Assembly has manifested, with reference to external relations, equal love of peace and care of popular liberty; hence, the continuance of a hostile toleration towards the emigrants, the open violation of promises to disperse their gatherings, the refusal to renounce a league palpably offensive, the insulting motives of such refusal, indicating a desire to annihilate the French constitution, are sufficient to authorise hostilities which would have always been but acts of legitimate defence; for it is not so much to attack, as to deprive our enemies of leisure to exhaust our resources by continuous preparations, to plant all their snares, to assemble all their forces, to tighten their present alliances, to contract others, to form further relations in the very midst of us, and to multiply conspiracies and intrigues in our provinces. Does he deserve the name of aggressor, who, threatened, outraged, by an unjust and perfidious foe, forestals him in the advantage of striking the first blow! So far from provoking war, the National Assembly has done every thing to avert it. By seeking fresh explanations upon intentions which could not be dubious, it has shown that it reluctantly departed from the hope of a return to a sense of justice, and that if kings in their pride are reckless of their subjects' blood, the representatives of a free nation, in their humanity, are careful even of enemies' blood. Indifferent to all provocations, to all slanders, to the disregard of long-standing engagements, to the violations of recent pledges, to the dastardly duplicity concerning plots hatching against France, to the perfidious complaisance designed to shroud the succours and encouragement lavished on Frenchmen who have betrayed their country, it would still have accepted peace, had that which was offered been compatible with the maintenance of the constitution, the independence of the national sovereignty, and the safety of the commonwealth.

But the veil which concealed the intentions of our enemy is at length torn! Citizens! which of you would subscribe to these disgraceful propositions? Feudal servitude and a humiliating inequality, bankruptcy and imposts payable by you alone, tithes and the inquisition, properties, purchased upon the public faith, wrested from you and given to their old usurpers, wild beasts restored to the right of ravaging your fields, your blood wasted for the ambitious views of a hostile dynasty—such are the conditions of the treaty between the King of Hungary and faithless Frenchmen!

Such is the peace that is offered to you! No; you will never accept it! The cowards are at Coblentz, and France no longer contains in her bosom any but men worthy of liberty!

He announces in his own name, in the name of his allies, the purpose of exacting from the French nation an abandonment of its rights; he gives notice that he will wring from it sacrifices, which the fear of its extermination could alone obtain from it. So be it!—it will never succumb! This insulting pride, far from intimidating it, will but stimulate its courage. Time is needed to discipline the slaves of despotism; but every man is a soldier when he combats tyranny; gold will leave its dark retreats at mention of the country in danger; those vile and ambitious men, those veterans in corruption and intrigue, those base calumniators of the people, from whom our enemies scruple not to promise themselves a despicable aid, will lose the support of those short-sighted or pusillanimous citizens whom they may have deceived by their hypocritical declamations; and the French empire, in its vast extent, will present to our enemies but one single determination—to conquer or to perish together with the constitution and the laws!"

from Metz to Givet, after incredible toil, and by roads almost impassable. He was solely indebted to the ardour of his troops for clearing in so short a time the considerable distance he had to traverse. There learning the misfortunes of Rochambeau's officers, he judged it prudent to halt. These fatal events occurred in the latter part of the month of April 1792.

CHAPTER IX.

FROM APRIL TO THE EVENTS OF THE 20TH JUNE.

The intelligence of the unfortunate issue that had marked the skirmishes of Quiévrain and Tournay, and of the murder of General Dillon, created an universal sensation. It was but natural to surmise that the two events had been concerted, when their simultaneousness and identity of character were considered. Recriminations passed on all sides. The Jacobins and ardent patriots asserted that a design had been formed to betray liberty. Dumouriez, not accusing Lafayette, but suspecting the Feuillants, conceived that his plan had been made to miscarry with the view of injuring his popularity. Lafayette complained, but less acrimoniously than his party, that he had been apprised too tardily to get under march, and that he had not been furnished with the means necessary to convey his army. The Feuillants exclaimed, furthermore, that Dumouriez had purposed ruining Rochambeau and Lafayette in public opinion, by imposing upon them a plan without giving them the means to execute it. Such an intention was out of the question, for Dumouriez, thus drawing up plans of campaign, and to this extent exceeding his functions as minister for foreign affairs, was gravely compromised in case of ill success. Besides, the project of securing Belgium for France and liberty, formed part of a plan he had long meditated, and it was not to be supposed that he should desire it to fail in execution. It was evident that neither the generals nor the ministers could possibly have been actuated by bad faith, because they were all interested in success. But parties always judge men instead of circumstances, so that they may fasten upon some one such disasters as occur.

Degraves, dismayed at the outcry raised on account of these military events, determined to resign a charge which had long been burdensome to him; and Dumouriez had the weakness to shun it. Louis XVI., still under the sway of the Gironde, gave the department to Servan, an old soldier, distinguished for his patriotic sentiments. This appointment gave additional strength to the Gironde, which had now almost a majority in the council, having Servan, Clavière, and Roland in its interest. From this period, disunion began to creep into the ministry. The Gironde became daily more distrustful, and consequently more importunate for evidences of sincerity on the part of Louis XVI. Dumouriez, whom opinions little swayed, and whom the confidence of Louis XVI. had moved, always supported his views; and Lacoste, who was strongly attached to the monarch, did the same. Duranthon remained neutral, and evinced no marked preference except for the weakest counsels. Servan, Clavière, and Roland, were inflexible; fully impressed with the apprehensions of their friends, they became day by day more stubborn and inexorable in the cabinet.

An additional circumstance tended to embroil Dumouriez with the principal members of the Gironde. When taking office as minister for foreign affairs, he had demanded six millions of francs for secret expenses, for which he should not be held liable to account. The Feuillants had opposed the request; but the Gironde had exerted their weight in its support, and the six millions were voted. Pétion having solicited funds for the Parisian police, Dumouriez had assigned him 30,000 francs a-month; but, ceasing to be a Girondist, he refused to pay them more than once. On the other hand, it was learnt or suspected that he had appropriated 100,000 francs to his own pleasures. Roland, at whose residence the Girondists were wont to assemble, joined his friends in their indignation at this conduct. The ministers were accustomed to dine by turns with each other, to converse upon public affairs. When they met at Roland's, it was in presence of his wife and of all his friends; and it might be truly said, that upon those occasions the council was held by the Gironde alone. At one of these meetings remonstrances were made to Dumouriez upon the nature of his secret disbursements. At first he replied in a sprightly and careless mood, then became soured and irritated, and ultimately had a decided altercation with Roland and the Girondists. He discontinued attending the usual meetings, giving as his motive that he was unwilling to treat of public affairs either before a woman or before the friends of Roland. However, he occasionally returned to the latter's house, but without entering upon matters of business, or at least very partially. Another discussion completed his alienation from the Girondists. Guadet, the most petulant of all his party, read a letter which he desired the ministers to adopt, urging the king to take a constitutional priest as his spiritual director. Dumouriez maintained that the ministers were not justified in interfering with the religious services of the king. He was supported, it is true, by Vergniaud and Gensonné; but the dispute was not the less warm, and the rupture became definitive.

The journals forthwith commenced attacks upon Dumouriez. The Feuillants, who were already incensed against him, now found themselves aided by the Jacobins and Girondists. Dumouriez, assailed on all sides, opposed an undaunted front to the storm, and took vengeance on some of the journalists.

A decree of impeachment had been previously directed against Marat, editor of "The Friend of the People"—a detestable production, in which he openly demanded slaughter, and heaped the most villanous accusations on the royal family, and on all men who, to his delirious imagination, seemed open to suspicion. As a counterpoise to this step, Royou, editor of "The Friend of the King," who inveighed against the republicans with the same violence that Marat exhibited against the royalists, was also impeached.

For some time the existence of a certain "Austrian committee" had been universally mooted. The patriots spoke of it in the city, as the Orleans faction formed the staple conversation at court. To this committee was attributed a secret and blighting influence, which was exercised through the agency of the queen. If something resembling an Austrian committee had existed during the Constituent Assembly, certainly nothing of the sort prevailed under the Legislative. At that time a high personage, stationed in the Low Countries, communicated to the queen, in the name of her family, very prudent counsels, to the effect of which the French intermediary added by discreet commentaries. But under the legislative body these private communications had ceased; the family of the queen still continued to correspond with her; but she was always exhorted to patience and resignation. However, Bertrand de Molleville and Montmorin often visited the palace after their dismissal from the ministry. Upon them all suspicions were centred; and there is no doubt they were the agents of all secret commissions. They were publicly denounced by the journalist Carra. Having resolved to prosecute him for calumny, they summoned him to produce the documents upon which he founded his denunciation. The journalist appealed to three deputies, naming Chabot, Merlin, and Bazire, as authors of the information he had published. The justice-of-peace Larivière, who, being zealously attached to the cause of the king, prosecuted this affair with extraordinary courage, had the boldness to issue a warrant against the three designated deputies. The assembly, exasperated at this daring attempt to infringe the inviolability of its members, answered the judge by a decree of impeachment, and sent the unfortunate Larivière to Orleans.

This abortive endeavour was only instrumental in augmenting the general agitation, as well as the detestation with which the court was viewed. The Girondists no longer looked upon themselves as directors of Louis XVI., since Dumouriez had so completely gained his confidence, and they returned to their part as violent oppositionists.

The new constitutional guard of the king had been recently formed. According to the law, the civil household ought likewise to have been composed: but the nobility refused to enter it, in order to avoid recognising the constitution, by accepting employments created under it. On the other hand, a repugnance was felt to constitute it of plebeians; and it was given up altogether. "Why do you desire, madam," wrote Barnave to the queen, "to give the least doubt to these people as to your sentiments? When they decree you a military and a civil household, like Achilles amongst the daughters of Lycomedes, you eagerly grasp the sword to repel simple ornaments."* The ministers, and even Bertrand, urged the same course as Barnave; but their endeavours were in vain; and the composition of the civil household was abandoned.

The military household, arranged according to a plan originating with Delessart, had been formed in the proportion of a third by troops of the line, and the remaining two-thirds by young citizens chosen from the ranks of the national guard. This composition was calculated to ensure satisfaction. But the officers and soldiers of the line had been selected in a manner tending to alarm the patriots. Coalescing against the young men taken from the national guard, they heaped infinite insults upon them, and compelled most of them to retire. The vacancies thus created were instantly filled up with men more surely to be relied upon. Besides, the number of these guards had been singularly augmented, for instead of eighteen hundred, as fixed by the law, it rose, as was stated, to nearly six thousand. Dumouriez had acquainted the king with these circumstances; but he always replied that the old Duke de Brissac, the commander of this corps, could not be looked upon in the light of a conspirator. However, the conduct of this new guard at the palace and elsewhere was such, that suspicions were universally engendered, and the clubs at length took up the subject. At the same period, twelve Swiss mounted the white cockade at Neuilly; divers heaps of paper were burnt at Sèvres,† and gave rise to weighty suspicions. The alarm then became general; the assembly declared itself permanent, as if the days had returned when thirty thousand men threatened Paris. But in truth, multifarious grounds of apprehension existed: the non-juring priests were exciting the people in the southern provinces, and abusing the secrecy of the confessional to stimulate fanaticism; the union of the powers was made manifest; Prussia was on the point of joining Austria, the hostile armies were swelling into most formidable hosts, and the inscrutable disasters of Lille and Mons haunted all minds. And, furthermore, the efficacy of popular force is little trusted, and is never indeed believed in until actually tested; for an irregular multitude, howsoever numerous it may be, is but a weak counterpoise to six thousand men armed and disciplined. The assembly consequently declared itself permanent (sitting of the 28th May), and called for an exact report upon the composition of the king's military household, upon the number, character, and conduct of those who constituted it. After having incontestibly demonstrated that the constitution had been violated, it passed a decree of disembodiment against the guard, another of impeachment against the Duke de Brissac, and sent both for the royal sanction. The king was at first disposed to affix the veto, but Dumouriez reminded him of the dismissal of his body-guards, who were much older in his service than his new military household, and entreated him to repeat a sacrifice much less painful. He likewise convinced him of the infractions involved in the composition of his guard; and finally prevailed upon him to sanction the decree. Dumouriez, however, insisted upon its immediate re-formation; but the king, whether he had relapsed into his former policy of appearing under oppression, or placed reliance upon this disbanded guard, to which he secretly continued its pay, refused to have it replaced, and thus left himself without protection against popular outrage.

The Gironde, meanwhile, giving up all hope of his good faith, pursued its attacks with perseverance. Already it had carried a decree against the priests, in lieu of that which the king had refused to sanction. Reports upon their factious conduct being incessantly forwarded to the assembly, it had fulminated against them a decree of exile. The exact description of the culpable being difficult, and the measure, like all those of safety, being based on suspicion, it was in some sort upon notoriety that the priests were to be arraigned and driven forth. Upon the denunciation of twenty active citizens, backed by the approval of the district directory, the departmental directory was to pronounce banishment; the condemned priest was to leave the canton in twenty-four hours, the depart-

* Memoirs of Madame Campan, vol. ii. p. 154.

† Madame Campan gives the following explanation upon the secret of the papers burnt at Sèvres:—

"At the commencement of 1792, a highly esteemed clergyman solicited a private interview with me. He knew in whose hands was the manuscript of a new libel of Madame Lamotte. He told me that the people who had come from London to get it printed at Paris were perfectly venal, and ready to surrender him the manuscript for a thousand louis, if he could find any friend of the queen disposed to make such a sacrifice for her tranquillity; that he had thought of me, and that if her majesty would give him the 24,000 francs, he would deliver me the manuscript upon receiving them.

I imparted this communication to the queen, who refused to entertain it, and ordered me to reply that, even at the time when it was possible to punish the hawkers of these libels, she had deemed them so atrocious and despicable as to disdain the use of measures to stop their circulation; that, if she were imprudent and weak enough to buy up one of them, the active espionnage of the Jacobins might discover it; that the purchased libel would not be the less printed, and would become more dangerous when the public was informed of the expedient that had been adopted to suppress it.

The Baron d'Aubier, gentleman in ordinary to the king, and my particular friend, had a capacious memory, and an accurate and condensed manner of imparting to me the tenor of the deliberations, debates, and decrees of the National Assembly. I entered the queen's apartment every day, to give an account of them to the king, who used to say on seeing me, 'Ah! here is the Calais courier!'

One day, M. d'Aubier said to me, 'The assembly has been much engaged with a denunciation made by the workmen in the manufactory at Sèvres. They have carried to the president's desk a bundle of pamphlets which they describe as the life of Marie-Antoinette. The director of the manufactory was summoned to the bar, and he has declared that orders were given him to burn these printed sheets in the stoves used for hardening the moulds of his porcelain.'

Whilst I was giving this account to the queen, the king reddened and drooped his head over his plate. The queen said to him, 'Have you any knowledge of this, sir?' The king gave no reply. Madame Elizabeth requested him to explain what this might mean; he kept the same silence. I immediately retired. A few moments afterwards, the queen came into my room, and informed me that the king, from regard to her, had caused the whole edition printed from the manuscript I had offered her, to be bought up; and that M. de Laporte had thought of no more mysterious mode of destroying the entire work than getting it consumed at Sèvres amongst two hundred workmen, nine-tenths of whom were known to be Jacobins. She told me she had dissembled her distress whilst with the king, for he was greatly alarmed; and she could say nothing when his tenderness and concern for her were the causes of the accident."—Madame Campan, vol. ii. p. 196.

ment in three days, and the kingdom in a month. If he were poor, three livres (half-a-crown) a-day were granted him until he reached the frontiers. This severe law gave token of the increasing exasperation of the assembly.* Another decree speedily followed it. The minister Servan, without being ordered by the king, and without consulting his colleagues, proposed to form, on occasion of the approaching federation of the 14th July, a camp of 20,000 federalists, for the purpose of protecting the assembly and the capital. It is easy to conceive with what joy this project was received by the majority of the assembly, composed as it was of Girondists. At this moment their power was at its height. They completely governed the assembly, where the constitutionalists and republicans were in a minority, and where the pretended "impartials" were, as in all times, simply waverers, submissive in proportion as the majority waxed in strength. Besides, they ruled in Paris through Pétion, the mayor, who was entirely devoted to them. Their design, with reference to the proposed camp, was, (not from any personal ambition, but as a means of securing preponderance to their party and opinions,) to render themselves masters of the king, and provide against his suspected intentions.

So soon as Servan's proposition was known, Dumouriez questioned him in full council, with much acrimony, under what character he had brought forward such a proposal. He answered, "Under that of an individual." "In that case," exclaimed Dumouriez, "the title of minister of war should not be attached to the name of Servan." So warm a dispute ensued, that, but for the king's presence, blood might have stained the council-board. Servan offered to withdraw his proposition; but that would have been of no avail, since the assembly had eagerly adopted it; and the only gain to the king would have been the belief that he had violently coerced his minister. Dumouriez consequently opposed that course; the motion stood, and was deprecated in a petition signed by eight thousand national guards, who expressed indignation that their services were held insufficient to protect the assembly. It was nevertheless carried, and the decree embodying it dispatched to the king. There were thus two important decrees awaiting the sanction, and already doubts were entertained that the king would refuse it. If so, a decisive resolution was intended to be passed against him.

Dumouriez maintained at the council-board that the encampment would be fatal to the throne, and even to the Girondists, because the new army would be formed under the influence of the most violent Jacobins. He argued, nevertheless, that it must be adopted by the king; because, if he refused to convoke 20,000 men regularly chosen, 40,000 would rise spontaneously, and overrun the capital. He furthermore gave it to be understood, that he knew of an expedient for rendering the measure abortive, which he would bring forward at a suitable time. With regard to the decree for the banishment of the priests, he was likewise of opinion it should be sanctioned, inasmuch as they were culpable, and as their exile would shelter them from the outrages of their enemies. Louis XVI. still hesitated, alleging that he needed further reflection. At the same council, Roland insisted upon reading, in the king's presence, a letter he had already forwarded to him, which was certainly a work of supererogation, since the king was acquainted with its contents. This letter had been resolved upon at the instigation of Madame Roland, and composed by her. It had been previously mooted whether one should not be written to the king in the name of all the ministers. They having refused, Madame Roland had exercised her influence over her husband, and induced him to adopt the step in his own name. Duranthon, who was a weak, but nevertheless a sagacious man, vainly and rationally objected that the tone of his letter, far from winning over the king, would embitter him against ministers who enjoyed the public confidence, and that it would produce a fatal rupture between the throne and the popular party. Roland obstinately persisted, in obedience to the counsels of his wife and his friends. The Gironde, in fact, was desirous of coming to an explanation, and preferred a quarrel to longer uncertainty.

Accordingly, Roland read his letter to the king, and inflicted upon him, in full council, a category of the most severe remonstrances.

This famous letter ran as follows:—

"Sire—The present state of France cannot long continue; it is a state of crisis, the violence whereof is at its height; it must terminate in a convulsion calculated to interest your majesty as deeply as it concerns the whole empire.

Honoured by your confidence, and invested with duties which impose truth on me as an obligation to you, I will venture to give it unrestricted utterance, for you yourself have laid the injunction on me.

The French have given themselves a constitution, which has generated malecontents and rebels; but the majority of the nation is resolute for its maintenance; it has sworn to defend it at the cost of its blood; and it has joyfully hailed war, for it presented an efficacious means of securing it. The minority, however, sustained by hopes, has left no expedient untried to regain the ascendancy. Hence, this intestine struggle against the laws, this anarchy whereat good citizens lament, and which the malignant fail not to use in calumnious deprecation of the new system; hence this disunion every where prevailing and every where excited, for in no quarter is there indifference or neutrality; the triumph or the revocation of the constitution is imperiously desired, and all action is for its support or its overthrow. I will abstain from an examination of its tenor and spirit, in order to consider solely what circumstances require; and, divesting myself of partiality as much as possible, I will inquire what it is rational to anticipate, and what it is expedient to encourage.

Your majesty enjoyed high prerogatives, which you believed appurtenant to royalty: reared in the idea of preserving them, you could not behold them torn from you with complacency; the desire of recovering them was as natural as the regret at their loss. These feelings, which are natural to the human heart, have been estimated by the enemies of the revolution, and they have consequently relied upon a secret approval, until circumstances should permit an avowed protection. Nor could these tendencies be unappreciated by the nation itself; and they have necessarily tended to keep it in a state of distrust.

Your majesty has, therefore, been continually exposed to the alternative of yielding to first impressions, to private feelings, or of making sacrifices dictated by philosophy, and urged by necessity; hence, either to embolden rebels whilst keeping up alarm in the nation, or to calm the latter by cordially uniting with it. All things have their term, and that of uncertainty is at length arrived.

Is your majesty disposed at the present moment to form an open alliance with those who aim at remodelling the constitution, or will you nobly and unreservedly devote yourself to ensure its final triumph? Such is the veritable question which the present state of things irresistibly drives to a solution. As to the metaphysical inquiry whether the French are ripe for liberty, its discussion may be deferred, for we are not called upon to determine what we shall be a century hence, but of what the actual generation is capable.

What has come to pass amidst all the agitations in which we have had our being for the last four years? Privileges onerous to the people have been abolished; ideas of justice and equality have been universally disseminated, have penetrated every bosom; the theory of the rights of the people has justified the consciousness of those rights, and their recognition, solemnly pronounced, has become a sacred doctrine; hatred of the nobility, long ago inspired by feudalism, has been rendered more inveterate by the undisguised opposition of the majority of the nobles to the constitution which levels their order.

* This decree bears date the 27th May; the subsequent one, relative to the camp of 20,000 men, the 8th June.

During the first year of the revolution, the people beheld in these nobles men odious from the oppressive privileges they enjoyed, but whom they would have ceased to abhor after the destruction of those privileges, if the conduct of the order of nobility since that period had not quickened all the reasons for dreading and combating it as an irreconcilable enemy.

In like progression has attachment to the constitution grown: not only do the people owe to it many evident benefits, but they deem it has many greater in store for them, since those who were wont to throw all burdens upon them strive so vehemently to destroy or modify it.

The declaration of rights is consecrated as a political gospel, and the French constitution as a religious code, for which the people are prepared to die.

Thus zeal has already sometimes aided the execution of the law; and when its restraints were insufficient to curb the refractory, the citizens have been impelled to inflict chastisement of themselves.

Thus have the estates of emigrants been exposed to ravages in the spirit of vengeance, and thus have so many departments been compelled to treat priests with rigour whom public opinion had proscribed, and to which they would have fallen victims.

In this clash of interests, all sentiments have taken the accent of passion. The country is not a word upon which the imagination has simply delighted to dwell; it is a thing for which all have made sacrifices, to which all are daily more closely bound by the very solicitude it causes, which has been created by prodigious efforts, which has arisen amidst mortal disquietudes, and which is beloved as much for the sufferings it costs as for the hopes it gives. All attacks made upon it but tend to inflame enthusiasm in its behalf. To what a height must this feeling rise at a moment when confederated foes without are conspiring with internal traitors to inflict the most fatal injuries! In all parts of the empire, the agitation is extreme; it will assuredly burst forth in some terrible shape, unless a reasonable confidence in the intentions of your majesty should definitively calm it. But the confidence needed in the emergency will not be established by promises; it must have its basis on facts.

It is evident to the French nation that its constitution can progress, that the government will possess all the strength that is needful for it, so soon as your majesty, truly disposed to give efficacy to that constitution, shall support the legislative body with all the influence of the executive, and shall remove all grounds for uneasiness to the people and for hope to the disaffected.

For example, two important decrees have been passed: both essentially interest the public tranquillity and the safety of the state; the delay in sanctioning them creates distrust; if it be prolonged, it will provoke irritation; and I am bound to state, that, in the present ferment of the nation, irritation may lead to all extremities.

The time for receding is past; even the means of temporising are at an end. The revolution is accomplished in the public mind; it will be worked out in blood, and cemented by it, if prudence does not prevent misfortunes which it is still possible to obviate.

I am aware it may be suggested that extreme measures will suffice to effect all purposes, to repress all dangers; but should force be displayed to overawe the assembly, terror be spread through Paris, discord and dismay through its environs, all France would rise with indignation, and plunging into the horrors of civil war, develope that gloomy energy, the parent of virtues and of crimes, which is always fatal to those who provoke it.

The safety of the state and the happiness of your majesty are intimately connected; no power can separate them; pangs and calamities will assuredly beset your throne, if it be not made to rest by your own determination upon the foundations of the constitution, and consolidated by the tranquillity which its maintenance will ultimately ensure us.

Thus the state of public opinion, the course of events, the reasons of good policy, the very interests of your majesty, all render it obligatory upon you to unite with the legislative body, and comply with the wish of the nation; they convert into a necessity what principle enjoins as a duty. But the sensibility natural to this affectionate people is disposed to find in this obligation a cause of gratitude. You were cruelly deceived, sire, when your mind was alienated from and inspired with distrust of a people so easily affected; it was, doubtless, by perpetual instigations that you were betrayed into a conduct calculated to excite its alarm. Let it see that you are resolved to give efficacy to that constitution upon which it builds its happiness, and you will speedily become the object of its benedictions!

The conduct of the priests in various parts, and the pretexts which fanaticism furnishes to the disaffected, have led to the enactment of a wise law against the disturbers of the public peace; let your majesty give it the necessary sanction; the public tranquillity demands it, and the welfare of the priests themselves urges it. If this law be not put in force, the departments will be compelled to substitute violent expedients, as indeed they are universally doing, and the exasperated people will supply its want by unbridled excesses.

The schemes of our enemies, the disturbances that have been manifested in the capital, the deadly disquietude occasioned by the conduct of your guard, and still kept up by the testimonies of satisfaction conferred upon it by your majesty in a proclamation singularly impolitic under the circumstances, and the position of Paris in its proximity to the frontiers—all have demonstrated the necessity of a camp in the vicinity. This measure, the wisdom and exigency of which have struck all discerning minds, simply awaits your majesty's sanction. Why should delay give an aspect of regret to your determination, when dispatch would make all hearts your own?

Already have the attempts of the staff of the Parisian national guard evoked suspicions that it was impelled by a superior influence; already the declamations of certain extravagant demagogues are arousing a belief in their connexion with parties interested in the overthrow of the constitution; already the intentions of your majesty are called in question by public opinion. A little more delay, and the reluctant nation will deem its king the friend and accomplice of the conspirators!

Just Heaven! have you then struck the great ones of the earth with blindness, and are they never to have other counsel than such as drags them to ruin?

I know that the austere language of truth is rarely welcome near a throne; I know, also, that it is because it scarcely ever is heard there, that revolutions become necessary; I know, furthermore, that I am bound to speak it to your majesty, not only as a citizen submissive to the laws, but as a minister honoured with your confidence, or invested with functions which imply it; and I am not aware of any thing which forbids me to fulfil a duty my conscience dictates.

In the same spirit I will reiterate my representations to your majesty on the duty and expediency of executing the law which enjoins the appointment of a secretary to the council. The mere existence of the law speaks so authoritatively, that the execution ought apparently to follow without delay; but it is, moreover, of importance to adopt all means for ensuring the requisite gravity, knowledge, and preparation, to the deliberations; and for responsible ministers, especially, there ought to be a mode of authenticating their counsels. If any such had existed, I should not now be addressing your majesty in writing.

Life is of no moment to a man who holds his duty as superior to all concerns; but, next to the happiness of fulfilling it, is the gratification of feeling that he has acted with fidelity, and that also is an obligation upon public characters.

Paris, 10th June 1792, the 4th year of liberty.

(Signed) ROLAND."

The king listened to this lecture with wonderful equanimity, and left the council saying he would make known his intentions.

Dumouriez was summoned to the palace. The king and queen were together. "Ought we," said they, "to endure the insolence of these three ministers any longer?" "No," replied Dumouriez. "Will you take it upon yourself to get us rid of them?" asked the king. "Yes, sire," responded the undaunted minister; "but in order to succeed, your majesty must yield to one condition. I am unpopular, and will become more so by dismissing three colleagues, leaders of a powerful party. There is only one mode of persuading the public that they are not displaced on account of their patriotism." "What is that?" inquired the king. "To sanction the two decrees," replied Dumouriez. And he reiterated the arguments that he had already advanced at the council-board. The queen exclaimed that the condition was too severe; but Dumouriez proceeded to show her that the twenty thousand men were not to be feared; that the decree did not designate the place where they were to encamp; that they might be sent, for example, to Soissons, where they would be occupied with military exercises, and gradually drafted off to the armies as the necessity for reinforcements became manifest. "But in that case," said the king "you must be minister at war." "Notwithstanding the responsibility, I consent," replied Dumouriez; "but it is indispensable that your majesty sanction the decree against the priests; I can fill it only on those terms. That decree, far from injuring the ecclesiastics, will save them from popular fury; besides, your majesty should have opposed the first decree of the Constituent Assembly ordaining the oath; now you cannot recede." "I was wrong then," exclaimed Louis XVI.; "I must take care not to do wrong a second time." The queen, who did not participate in the religious scruples of her consort, joined with Dumouriez, and for the moment the king seemed to give his consent.

Dumouriez suggested to the king the new ministers to be nominated in lieu of Servan, Clavière, and Roland. Mourgues had the home, Beaulieu the finance department. That of war was confided to Dumouriez, who temporarily held two ministries, until that of foreign affairs was filled. The ordinance was forthwith published; and on the 13th June, Roland, Clavière, and Servan, received their official dismissal. Roland, who had all the self-possession requisite for executing what the bold spirit of his wife might plan, immediately repaired to the assembly, and read the letter he had written to the king, and on account of which he was displaced. This proceeding was certainly allowable, now that hostilities were declared; but after the promise given to the king to keep the letter secret, it displayed a sad want of generosity to give it a public reading.

The assembly showered enthusiastic plaudits upon Roland's letter, and ordered that it should be printed and sent to the eighty-three departments. It declared, moreover, that the three disgraced ministers carried with them the esteem of the nation. It was at this very moment that Dumouriez dauntlessly appeared in the tribune, under his new character of minister-at-war. He had expeditiously prepared a circumstantial report upon the state of the army, and upon the errors of the administration and of the assembly. In this document he was not sparing in severity upon those whom he well knew were disposed to give him the most unfavourable reception. As soon as he was descried, the Jacobins discharged upon him a volley of hisses; the Feuillants observed a profound silence. He gave an account, in the first place, of a slight advantage gained by Lafayette, and of the death of Gouvion, an officer, a deputy, and an estimable personage, whom the calamitous condition of his country had driven to despair, and voluntarily to incur the most imminent perils. The assembly testified its regret at the loss of this generous citizen, but listened coldly to that evinced by Dumouriez, and especially to the desire he expressed of escaping the same sorrows by a like fate. But when he commenced his report as minister-at-war, a refusal to hear him was manifested on all sides. He calmly insisted on his right of speech, and ultimately obtained silence. His remonstrances irritated some of the deputies. "Do you hear him?" exclaimed Guadet; "he is giving us a lecture." "And why not?" retorted the intrepid minister, with perfect coolness. Tranquillity was re-established; he proceeded with his report, and was alternately hooted and applauded. When he had concluded, he folded up his memorial to take away with him. "He is flying!" was loudly vociferated. "No!" he lustily retorted; and he forthwith placed his memorial on the table, confidently affixed his signature, and passed through the assembly with imperturbable composure. As they pressed upon his way, some deputies said to him—"You will be sent to Orleans." "So much the better," answered he; "I will there take baths, and whey, which I much need, and I will get some repose."

His firmness gave assurance to the king, who testified to him his satisfaction; but the unfortunate monarch was already shaken in his resolution, and tormented with scruples. Besieged by false friends, he had reconsidered his determination, and finally resolved not to sanction the decrees.

The four ministers assembled at the council-board entreated the king to give the sanction, as he was understood to have promised. The king answered sharply, that he could only consent to the decree as to the 20,000 men; but with reference to that concerning the priests, he was determined to give it his opposition; that his part was taken, and no threats could scare him from it. He then read the letter in which he purposed to announce his intention to the president of the assembly. "One of you," said he to his ministers, "will countersign it;" and he uttered those words in an accent which he had never been known to use.

Dumouriez hastened to write to the king soliciting leave to resign. "This man," exclaimed the king, "has induced me to dismiss three ministers for insisting upon my adopting the decrees, and he now maintains that I should sanction them!" This reproach was unjust; for it was only on condition of the double sanction that Dumouriez had consented to survive his colleagues. Louis XVI. admitted him to an interview, and inquired whether he persisted. Dumouriez was inflexible. "In that case," said the king, "I accept your resignation." All the ministers had likewise sent in their resignations. However, the king retained Lacoste and Duranthon, whom he constrained to remain. Lajard, Chambonas, and Terrier de Montciel, selected from the Feuillants, filled the vacant ministries.

"The king," says Madame Campan, "fell at this period into a depression of spirits which amounted to a physical torpor. He was for ten days together without articulating a syllable, even in the bosom of his family, unless it were at a game of backgammon, which he played with the Princess Elizabeth after dinner, when he was obliged to utter the words necessary in the game. The queen drew him from this state, so perilous in a critical period, when each minute brought with it a necessity for action, by throwing herself at his feet, and sometimes making use of representations calculated to alarm him, at other times of expressions of her own tenderness for him. She thus recalled him to the duty he owed his family, and went so far as to tell him that, if he must perish, it should be with honour, and without waiting until they came to strangle both himself and her on the floor of their chamber."*

It is easy to surmise what must have been the feelings of Louis XVI. when he threw off this dejection of mind, and resumed attention to affairs. After having once abandoned the Feuillant party to give himself up to the Girondists, it is impossible he could return to the first with much satisfaction or hope. He had tested by a double experience his own incompatibility with both, and, what was more deplorable, he had made them conscious of it. Thenceforth, it was natural he should turn more than ever to foreigners, and put all his hopes in them. This tendency became evident to all, and alarmed those who saw in the invasion of France the fall of liberty, the chastisement of its defenders, and possibly the partition or dismemberment of the kingdom. Louis XVI. saw nothing of this in foreign intervention, for we are always ready to gloss over the ill consequences of what we desire. When under the panic of the commotion excited by the flights of Mons and Tournay, he had dispatched Mallet-du-Pan into Germany, with instructions under his own hand. In them he recommended the sovereigns to advance with caution, to observe the utmost forbearance towards the inhabitants of the provinces they might traverse, and to precede their progress by a manifesto avouching their pacific and conciliatory intentions.†

However moderate the views manifested in this project, it was nevertheless an invitation to advance into the country; and although such might be the spirit actuating the king, what guarantee was there that the designs of foreign monarchs, rivals of France, or those of the infuriated emigrants, were equally temperate? Was Louis XVI. assured he would not be drawn far beyond his intentions? The ministers of Austria and Prussia themselves expressed to Mallet-du-Pan the fears with which the violent tone of the emigrants inspired them; and it would seem he had some difficulty in tranquillising them on that point.*

* See Madame Campan, vol. ii. p. 205.

† The mission given by the king to Mallet-du-Pan is a fact of the utmost importance to verify, and it cannot be subjected to doubt, after the Memoirs of Bertrand de Molleville. Minister at this period, Bertrand de Molleville must have been perfectly cognisant of the fact, and, as a counter-revolutionary minister, his bias would have led him rather to conceal than avow it.* The mission itself attests the moderation of Louis XVI., but also his communications with the enemy.

"The king, far from yielding to this patriotic security, saw, with the deepest sorrow, France engaged in an unjust and sanguinary war, which the disorganisation of her armies seemed to render it impossible to carry on, and which more than ever exposed our frontier provinces to invasion. His majesty dreaded above all a civil war, which he doubted not would break out on the news of the first advantage gained over the French troops by the emigrant corps which formed part of the Austrian army. It was, indeed, but too much to be feared that the Jacobins and populace in their fury would make bloody reprisals on the priests and nobles remaining in France. These apprehensions, which the king expressed in his daily correspondence with me, were the occasion of my proposing to him to send a person of confidence to the emperor and the King of Prussia, to endeavour to prevail on them not to allow their armies to act offensively against France but in the last extremity; and in that case to let the entrance of their armies into France be preceded by a carefully-worded manifesto, in which it should be declared, 'that the emperor and the King of Prussia, forced to take arms by an unjust aggression upon them, did not impute either to the king or to the French nation, but to a criminal faction which oppressed both, the declaration of war which had been notified to them; that, consequently, adhering to the sentiments of amity which united them to the king and to France, their only intention, on the contrary, was to deliver them from the yoke of the most atrocious tyranny on record, and to aid them in re-establishing legitimate authority violently suppressed, order, and tranquillity; that in all this they had no design to interfere with the form of government, but merely to secure the nation liberty to adopt that which should be most suitable for it; that all idea of conquest was foreign to their thoughts; that private property should not be less respected than national property; that their majesties took all peaceable and faithful subjects under their especial protection; that their only enemies were those of France, namely, the factious and their adherents, and these only their majesties desired to combat,' &c. Mallet-du-Pan, whose talents and integrity were favourably known to the king, was intrusted with this mission. He was the more fitted for it from never having been seen at the palace, and from having no intimacy with persons attached to the court; and by taking the route to Geneva, whither he was accustomed to make frequent journeys, his departure would give rise to no suspicion."

The king gave Mallet-du-Pan instructions drawn up in his own handwriting, and published by Bertrand de Molleville.

"1st, The king not only exhorts but beseeches the princes and French emigrants to abstain from giving to the present war, by hostile and offensive demonstrations on their part, any other character than that of a foreign war waged between different powers.

2d, He expressly recommends them to leave to him and the intervening courts the consideration and care of their interests, when the time for entering upon them shall arrive.

3d, It is expedient that they should simply appear as parties, and not as arbiters in the dispute, the award resting of right with his majesty, when restored to liberty, and with the powers who shall insist upon its fulfilment.

4th, Any other conduct would produce a civil war in the interior, endanger the lives of the king and his family, overturn the throne, cause a massacre of the royalists, rally around the Jacobins all the revolutionists who had abandoned, and who are daily abandoning them, rekindle a flame that is dying away, and give greater obstinacy to a resistance which will succumb under the first reverses, when the fate of the revolution shall not appear exclusively at the mercy of those against whom it was directed, and who have been its victims.

5th, To represent to the courts of Vienna and Berlin the utility of a manifesto, issued jointly by them and the other states who have entered into the confederation; the importance of drawing up this manifesto in such a manner as to distinguish the Jacobins from the rest of the nation, to encourage all those who may return from their error, or who, without wishing for the present constitution, desire the suppression of abuses and the establishment of a rational liberty, under a monarch with an authority limited by law.

6th, To give emphatic utterance in the manifesto to the fundamental truth that the war is directed against an anti-social faction, and not against the French nation; that it is undertaken in defence of legitimate governments and of nations against a frenzied anarchy which destroys amongst men all ties of social intercourse, and all the compacts on which depend liberty, peace, and public safety at home and abroad; to give assurances against all fear of dismemberment and the imposition of laws, but energetically to impress upon the assembly, the administrative bodies, the municipalities, and the ministers, that they will be held personally and individually responsible, in life and property, for all outrages committed upon the sacred person of the king, upon that of the queen and her family, and upon the persons and property of all citizens whatsoever.

7th, To express the king's wish, that on entering the kingdom, the powers should declare that they are ready to give peace, but that they neither can nor will treat with any but the king; that, consequently, they require his restoration to the fullest liberty, and, afterwards, the convocation of a congress in which the different interests shall be discussed on the principles already laid down, to which the emigrants shall be admitted as complaining parties, and the general settlement of affairs be negotiated under the auspices and the guarantee of the powers."—Bertrand de Molleville, vol. viii. p. 39.

* [M. Thiers has here slightly erred. Bertrand had ceased to be an ostensible minister, but, as he himself relates, was in daily communication with the king.]

* Bertrand de Molleville, from whom I have borrowed the facts relative to Mallet-du-Pan, gives the following account of the reception he met with, and of the dispositions he encountered:—

The queen was equally suspicious of them; she was especially apprehensive of Calonne, whom she viewed as the most dangerous of her enemies;* but she did not the less conjure her family to act with the greatest promptitude for her deliverance. From this moment the popular party came to regard the court as an enemy the more to be feared from its directing all the forces of the state; and the struggle which ensued became one of life or death. In composing his new ministry, the king selected no man of note. Anticipating a speedy deliverance, he thought only how to get over a few days more, and for that purpose a ministry of the most insignificant character was judged sufficient.

The Feuillants sought to profit by the opportunity to form a coalition with the court, less, it must be granted, from party or personal ambition, than from sympathy for the king. They placed no reliance on the benefits of invasion; on the contrary, they for the most part viewed it as a criminal outrage, and, furthermore, as a measure equally hazardous for the court as for the nation. They wisely foresaw the king would fall before the succours could arrive; and after the invasion was perpetrated, they feared a course of unrelenting vengeance, perhaps the dismemberment of France, and certainly the abolition of all liberty.

Lally-Tolendal, whom we have seen quit France when the establishment of two chambers had become impossible, Malouet, who had made a further attempt to gain that object at the revision, Duport, Lameth, Lafayette, and others, who were anxious to preserve what still remained, coalesced for the purpose of making a last effort. This party, like all others, was not in perfect harmony with itself, but it was held together by a single purpose, that of saving the king from his errors, and with him the constitution. Every party obliged to act in the shade is reduced to adopt steps which are called intrigues when they are not successful. In this meaning the Feuillants intrigued. When they perceived Servan, Clavière, and Roland displaced by means of Dumouriez, they made advances towards him, and offered him their alliance, on condition that he signed the veto to the decree against the priests. Dumouriez, perhaps from pique, perhaps from want of confidence in their means, and certainly likewise from the obligation he had contracted to procure the sanction to that decree, repudiated their alliance, and departed for the army, with the hope, as he wrote to the assembly, that a cannon-ball might unite all opinions concerning him.

Lafayette remained to the Feuillants. He, without taking part in their secret overtures, had shared in their former repugnance to Dumouriez, and was chiefly actuated by anxiety to save the king without infringing the constitution. But their means of action were very trifling. In the first place, the court, which they were striving to rescue, refused to be rescued by them. The queen, who cheerfully trusted Barnave, had always used the greatest precautions in seeing him, and never received him but in secret. The emigrants and the court would not have pardoned her for holding intercourse with the constitutionalists. She was urged, in fact, not to treat with them, but rather to prefer the Jacobins; because, said they, it would be necessary to settle terms with the first, whilst nothing would be binding with the latter.* Let us add to these counsels, perpetually inculcated, the personal hatred of the queen for Lafayette; and we shall be at no loss to understand wherefore the court was little disposed to accept services from the constitutionalists or Feuillants. Besides this court repugnance towards them, we must furthermore consider the feebleness of the means they could bring to bear against the popular party. Lafayette, it is true, was adored by his soldiers, and might reasonably count on his army; but he had the enemy in front, and he could not uncover the frontier to march into the interior. The aged Luckner, upon whom he depended, was irresolute, fickle, and easily intimidated, though of infinite valour on the field of battle. But even allowing them ample military means, the constitutionalists possessed no civil means. The majority of the assembly was swayed by the Gironde. The national guard was partly disposed in their favour, but it was disunited and almost disorganised. The constitutionalists would be consequently compelled, in order to turn their military resources to account, to march from the frontier on Paris, that is to say, attempt an insurrection against the assembly; and insurrections, though advantageous for a violent party assuming the offensive, are but deplorable expedients for a moderate party on the defensive, under invocation of the law.

However, they crowded round Lafayette, and concerted with him the project of a letter to the assembly. This letter, to be written in his name, was intended to convey his sentiments towards the king and the constitution, and his disapprobation of all that tended

"The different letters which Mallet-du-Pan wrote to me at this period (July 1792), were in substance as follows:—On the 15th and 16th July, he had had long conferences with Count Cobentzel Count Haugwitz, and M. Heyman, ministers of the Emperor and the King of Prussia. After examining the proofs of his mission, and listening with profound attention to the reading of his instructions and his memorial, they found that the views he recommended were in perfect accordance with those formerly manifested by the king to the courts of Vienna and Berlin, who had respectively adopted them. They had, in consequence, expressed entire confidence in him, and approved, in every point, the draft of the manifesto he had proposed to them. They had declared to him, in the most positive terms, that there was no view of ambition, of personal interest, or of dismembering the kingdom, in the plan of the war; and that the powers had no other purpose or interest than to restore order in France, because there could be no peace between that country and its neighbours, until it was delivered from the anarchy prevailing in it, and which obliged them to keep up lines of troops on all the frontiers, and to take extraordinary precautions, which were very expensive; but that, far from pretending to impose any form of government whatever on the French, the king would be left at perfect freedom to act on that point in concert with the nation. They had asked from him the most circumstantial information respecting the dispositions prevalent in the interior, respecting public opinion upon the old system, the parliaments, the nobility, &c. They had confided to him that it was intended to form the emigrants into an army, to be given to the king when he was set at liberty. They had spoken to him with displeasure and condemnation of the French princes, whom they supposed to have intentions quite the reverse of the king's, and particularly those of acting independently, and of appointing a regent. (Mallet-du-Pan strongly combated this supposition, and observed, that the intentions of the princes ought not to be gathered from the light or eager language of some of those around them.) In short, after thoroughly discussing the different requests and propositions which Mallet-du Pan was charged to urge, the three ministers had unanimously acknowledged their prudence and propriety, had each solicited a copy or summary of them, and had given the most positive assurances that the king's views, being perfectly in accordance with those of the powers, should be strictly followed."—Bertrand de Molleville, vol. viii, p. 320.

* "The princes' party," says Madame Campan, "having been informed of the good understanding between the queen and the remnants of the constitutional party, was greatly alarmed at it. On her part, the queen always stood in apprehension of the princes' party, and of the pretensions held by the Frenchmen who formed it. She rendered justice to the Count d'Artois, and frequently said that his party would act in a spirit opposed to his own feelings towards the king his brother and herself, but that he would be over-persuaded by persons over whom Calonne exercised the most fatal ascendancy. She upbraided the Count Esterhazy, upon whom she had heaped favours, with having joined Calonne's party, to such an extent as to regard him even in the light of an enemy."—Memoirs of Madame Campan, vol. ii. p. 193.

* "In the mean time, the emigrants evinced great solicitude as to what might be done in the interior by the coalition with the constitutionalists, whom they described as no longer existing but in idea, and utterly devoid of means to repair their faults. The Jacobins were preferable to them, because, said they, there would be no necessity for treating with any one, when the king and his family shall be extricated from the abyss into which they had been plunged."—Memoirs of Madame Campan, vol. ii. p. 194.

to attack either the one or the other. His friends were divided in opinion; some stimulated, others repressed his zeal. But, looking only to what might benefit the king, to whom he had sworn fidelity, he wrote the letter, and braved all the dangers he might incur. The king and queen, although resolved not to be served by him, allowed him to write it, because they saw in such a proceeding nothing but an exchange of reproaches between the partisans of liberty. The letter reached the assembly on the 18th June. After having, at the commencement, censured the conduct of the last ministry, which he intended, as he said, to have denounced at the moment he had learnt its dismissal, Lafayette continued in these terms:—

"It is not enough that this branch of the government be delivered from a disastrous influence; the common weal is in danger. The fate of France depends almost exclusively on her representatives; from them the nation expects its safety; but by bestowing on itself a constitution, it has prescribed to them the only course by which they are entitled to save it."

Then protesting his inviolable attachment to the law consecrated by oath, he proceeded to descant on the state of France, which he held placed between two orders of enemies, those abroad and those at home.

"Both the one and the other must be repressed, but you will possess the power to do so only as you shall be constitutional and just. Look around you: can you dissemble from yourselves that a faction, and, to avoid all vague denominations, that the Jacobin faction has caused all the disorders? It is that faction which I openly accuse of them! Organised as a distinct empire, in its centre and its affiliations, blindly directed by a few ambitious leaders, this sect forms a separate corporation in the midst of the French people, whose powers it usurps by overawing its representatives and mandatories.

There, in public sittings, is respect for the laws stigmatised as aristocracy, and their infraction lauded as patriotism; there the assassins of Desilles are honoured with triumphs, and the crimes of Jourdan find panegyrists; there the recital of the murder that polluted the town of Metz has recently excited fiendish acclamations!

Will these reproaches be averted by pointing to an Austrian manifesto, in which these factionists are named? Are they become sacred because Leopold has mentioned them? And because we are called upon to combat aliens who intrude themselves into our disputes, are we to be prevented from delivering our country from a domestic tyranny?"

Subsequently reminding the assembly of his former services in the cause of liberty, and enumerating the guarantees he had given the country, the general answered for himself and his army, and declared that the French nation, if it were not the vilest in the universe, could and must resist the conspiracy that kings had formed against it. "But," he added, "to enable us, the soldiers of liberty, to combat for her with success, it is necessary that the number of the country's defenders be forthwith proportioned to that of its assailants; that the supplies of all kinds be augmented, and our movements thereby facilitated; that the comfort of the troops, their accoutrements, their pay, the care of their health, be no longer subjected to ruinous delays." Other exhortations followed, of which the following is the principal and concluding one:—

"Let the reign of the clubs, annihilated by you, give place to the reign of the law; their usurpations to the firm and independent action of the constituted authorities; their disorganising maxims to the true principles of liberty; their wild fury to the calm and constant courage of a nation that knows its rights and defends them; in fine, their factious projects to the real interests of the country, which, at this moment of peril, ought to unite all to whom its subjugation and ruin are not grounds for atrocious joy, and objects of infamous speculation!"

This was saying to boiling passion, Be calm; to parties, Voluntarily destroy yourselves; to a torrent, in short, Cease to flow! But although the counsel was fruitless, it was not on that account the less a duty to give it. The letter was greatly applauded by the right side. The left was silent. Scarcely was its perusal finished, than a motion was made for its being printed and sent to the departments.

Vergniaud claimed attention and obtained it. According to him, it was of consequence to the liberty which M. de Lafayette had hitherto so ably defended, that a distinction should be drawn between the petitions of mere citizens volunteering an opinion or invoking a measure of justice, and the castigations of an armed general. The latter ought to express his sentiments only through the medium of the ministry, otherwise liberty was at an end. He maintained, in consequence, that it was expedient for the assembly to pass to the order of the day. Thevenot replied that the assembly ought to welcome truths from the pen of Lafayette which it had not dared to say of itself. This last observation caused considerable agitation. Some members denied the authenticity of the letter. "Even were it not signed," exclaimed M. Coubé, "none but M. de Lafayette is capable of having written it." Guadet demanded leave to speak on a question of fact. He alleged that the letter could not be from M. de Lafayette, because it spoke of Dumouriez's resignation, which was not given in till the 16th, and it bore the date of that very 16th. "It is, therefore, impossible," he added, "that the signer of that letter should speak of a fact which could not be known to him. Either the signature is not his, or it was sent here on a blank sheet, at the disposal of a faction which might use it as it thought proper." Loud murmurs followed these words. Guadet, continuing, furthermore asserted that Lafayette was incapable, from his known sentiments, of having penned such a letter. "He must be aware," said he, "that when Cromwell"—— The deputy Dumas, unable longer to restrain his feelings at this last word, claimed to be heard. A prolonged agitation ensued in the assembly. However, Guadet kept possession of the tribune, and resumed: "I was saying"—— He was again interrupted. "You were at Cromwell," shouted some of the members. "I will return to him," he observed. "I was saying that M. de Lafayette ought to know that when Cromwell held similar language, liberty was prostrated in England. It is incumbent on you either to satisfy yourselves that some coward has sheltered himself under the name of Lafayette, or to prove to the French nation, by a signal example, that you have not taken an idle oath, in swearing to maintain the constitution."

A number of the members proved that they recognised the signature of Lafayette; but his letter, notwithstanding their testimony, was remitted to the committee of twelve to inquire into its authenticity. It was thus prevented from being printed and sent to the departments.

This generous proceeding was therefore utterly fruitless, and was sure to be so in the actual state of men's minds. From this moment, the general was almost as unpopular as the court; and if the leaders of the Gironde, more enlightened than the people, did not believe Lafayette capable of betraying his country because he had attacked the Jacobins, the mass implicitly believed it, from having the denunciation perpetually harped upon in the clubs, the newspapers, and the public thoroughfares.

Thus, to the alarms with which the court had inspired the popular party, were now added those to which Lafayette gave rise by his peculiar acts. Hence that party gave way to all the violence of despair, and resolved to assail the court before it could put in execution the plots with which it was charged.

We have already seen how the popular party was composed. As it took a more decided development, its characteristics grew more violent, and new personages rendered themselves remarkable in it. Robespierre had already made himself renowned at the Jacobins', and Danton at the Cordeliers'. The clubs, the municipality, and the sections, contained many men who, from the ardour of their tempers and opinions, were ready for any enterprise. Of this number were Sergent and Panis, who somewhat later connected their names with a fearful event. In the faubourgs resided several heads of battalions who had rendered themselves formidable, amongst whom the principal was a brewer named Santerre. From his stature, his voice, and a certain readiness of speech, he gained the popular favour, and had acquired a species of supremacy in the Faubourg St Antoine, the battalion of which he commanded. Santerre had already distinguished himself at the assault on Vincennes, repelled by Lafayette in February 1791; and, like all reckless characters, he was capable of becoming dangerous according to the instigations of the moment. He took part in all the meetings held in the distant suburbs. In them were united with him the journalist Carra, prosecuted for having attacked Bertrand de Molleville and Montmorin; a certain Alexandre, commandant of the Faubourg St Marceau; an individual well known under the name of Fournier the American; the butcher Legendre, who was afterwards a deputy in the convention; a journeyman jeweller called Rossignol; and several others, who, by their connexion with the populace, swayed all the faubourgs. Through the more distinguished amongst them, they communicated with the leaders of the popular party, and were thus enabled to direct their movements according to a superior impulse.

It is impossible to designate very precisely those deputies who contributed to give that impulse. The most conspicuous amongst them were strangers in Paris, and possessed no other influence than that gained by their eloquence. Guadet, Isnard, and Vergniaud, all provincials, kept up a closer communication with their departments than with Paris itself. Besides, although very energetic in the tribune, they displayed little activity out of the assembly, and were not fitted for moving a populace. Condorcet and Brissot, representatives of Paris, were not more active than the preceding; and from their conformity of opinion with the deputies of the west and south, they had become Girondists. Roland, since the dismissal of the patriot ministry, had returned to private life, dwelling in a modest and obscure residence in the Rue St Jacques. Convinced that the court had a design to deliver up France and liberty to foreigners, he deplored the calamities of his country with some of his friends, members of the assembly; but it does not appear that an attack upon the court was discussed in his society. He merely assisted the publication of a placarded journal, called The Sentinel, which Louvet, well known at the Jacobins' by his controversy with Robespierre, edited in a truly patriotic spirit. Roland, during his ministry, had allotted funds to enlighten public opinion through the press, and it was with a remnant of these funds that the Sentinel was printed.

At this period there was a young Marseillese at Paris, full of ardour, courage, and republican illusions, who was called the Antinoüs, from his singular comeliness. He had been dispatched by his commune to the Legislative Assembly for the purpose of complaining of the directory of his department; for such divisions between inferior and superior authorities, between municipalities and departmental directories, were general throughout France. The name of this young Marseillese was Barbaroux. Possessed of intelligence and great activity, he was well fitted to become useful to the popular cause. He saw Roland, and lamented with him the catastrophes wherewith the patriots were menaced. They agreed that as the danger was becoming every day more imminent in the north of France, it would be expedient, when reduced to the last extremity, to retire into the south, and there found a republic, which might be one day extended, as Charles VII. had formerly extended his kingdom from the walls of Bourges. They surveyed the map of the ex-minister Servan, and said to each other that, when beaten on the Rhine, liberty could retreat behind the Vosges and the Loire; that, charged in those entrenchments, it would still have in the east, the Doubs, the Ain, and the Rhone; in the west, Vienne and Dordogne; and in the centre, the rocks and streams of the Limousin. "Farther still," adds Barbaroux himself, "we had Auvergne, its rugged precipices, its ravines, and its aged forests, and the mountains of Velay, formerly scorched by fire, now covered with firs—wild localities, where men till in snow, but where they live independent. The Cevennes also offered us an asylum too renowned not to be formidable to tyranny; and at the extremity of the south, we found as barriers the Isère, the Durance, the Rhone from Lyons to the sea, the Alps, and the ramparts of Toulon. Finally, if all these points had been forced, there remained to us Corsica—that Corsica in which neither the Genoese nor the French have been able to naturalise tyranny; which only needs arms to render it fertile, and philosophers to become enlightened."*

It was natural that the inhabitants of the south should resolve upon taking refuge in their provinces if the north were overrun. They did not, however, neglect the north, for they agreed to write to their departments, urging the spontaneous formation of the camp of twenty thousand men, although the decree relative to that camp had not been sanctioned. They relied greatly on Marseilles, a flourishing, populous, and singularly democratic city. It had sent Mirabeau to the states-general, and since then it had disseminated through all the south the spirit with which itself was animated. The mayor of this city was a friend of Barbaroux, and partook all his opinions. Barbaroux wrote to him to collect magazines of corn, to send trusty emissaries into the neighbouring departments, as well as to the armies of the Alps, of Italy, and of the Pyrenees, in order to give opinion its tone in all of them; to sound Montesquiou, general of the army of the Alps, and to render his ambition profitable to the cause of liberty; finally, to concert with Paoli and the Corsicans, so as to secure a last aid and a last asylum. It was, moreover, recommended to this same mayor to retain the produce of the taxes, in order to deprive the executive power of the corresponding benefit, and, in case of need, to use the funds against it. What Barbaroux did with respect to Marseilles, others did with their departments, and took measures to prepare them as places of refuge. Thus distrust, converted into despair, was preparing a general insurrection, and in these insurrectionary preparations, a difference was already perceptible between Paris and the departments.

The mayor Pétion, intimate with all the Girondists, and at a later date ranked and proscribed with them, was, from the nature of his functions, more in connexion with the agitators of Paris. He was a man of infinite coolness, with an appearance of indifference which his enemies mistook for stupidity, and of an honesty which was lauded in exaggerated terms by his partisans, but which his detractors have never called in question. The populace, who give by-names to all who strongly excite their interest, usually called him Virtue Pétion. We have already spoken of him on the occasion of the flight to Varennes, and of the preference which the court gave him over Lafayette for the mayoralty of Paris. The court purposed to bribe him, and certain knaves undertook to effect its design. They demanded a sum of money, and kept it for themselves, without even making any overtures to Pétion, which, indeed, his known character rendered needless. The joy of the court at securing a defender, and its glee at corrupting a popular minister, were of short continuance; it speedily learnt the trick that had been played upon it, and also that the virtues of its adversaries were not so marketable as it had surmised.

* Memoirs of Barbaroux, pp. 38, 39.

Pétion had been amongst the first to hold that the tendencies of a king, born to an absolute throne, can never be modified. He was a republican before a republic was even dreamt of by any; and in the Constituent Assembly, he was, from sincere conviction, what Robespierre was from acerbity of temper. Under the Legislative, he became more convinced than ever of the incorrigible faithlessness of the court; he felt assured it would call in foreigners; and having been originally a republican from principle, he was fortified in his tendency by motives of safety. From that period, consequently, he began to think, as he said, of favouring a new revolution. He arrested movements badly planned, aided those, on the contrary, which were well directed, and strove above all things to keep them in conformity to the laws, of which he was a rigid observer, and which he was determined not to violate but in the last extremity.

Without affirming the participation of Pétion in the movements which were preparing, without knowing whether he consulted his friends of the Gironde as to countenancing them, we are justified in stating, from his conduct, that he did nothing in the way of opposing obstacles to their execution. It is alleged, that towards the middle of June, he visited Santerre at his house, together with Robespierre; Manuel, the official solicitor of the commune; Sillery, an ex-deputy; and Chabot, a deputy and ex-capuchin;—that the latter harangued the section of the Quinze-Vingts, and told it that the assembly expected its assistance. Whatever may be the truth of these particular allegations, it is certain that secret conclaves were held; and it is not probable, from their known opinions and subsequent conduct, that the persons whom we have just named should scruple to attend them.* At this period the faubourgs were rife with the idea of a festival for the 20th June, the anniversary of the tennis-court oath. It was intended, as was bruited abroad, to plant a tree

* Among the depositions given in the process instituted against the conspirators of the 20th June, is one extremely curious from its details, namely, that of the witness Lareynie. It alone contains almost all what the others repeat, on which account it is here quoted. The process itself has been published in quarto.

" Before us —— appeared Sieur Jean-Baptiste-Marie-Louis Lareynie, a volunteer private in the battalion of the Isle St Louis, decorated with the military cross, and residing at Paris, on the Quay Bourbon, No. 1.—

Who, profoundly grieved at the disorders which have recently occurred in the capital, and believing that it is the duty of a good citizen to give to justice the information which it may require under the circumstances, for the purpose of punishing the schemers and instigators of all manœuvres against the public tranquillity and the integrity of the French constitution, declares that, about eight days ago, he was aware, by the relations he has with the Faubourg St Antoine, that the citizens of that faubourg were agitated by the Sieur Santerre, commanding the battalion of the Enfants-Trouvés (Foundlings), and by other persons, amongst whom were the Sieur Fournier, styling himself an American, and an elector of 1791 in the department of Paris; the Sieur Rotondo, styling himself an Italian; the Sieur Legendre, butcher, residing in the Rue des Boucheries (Slaughter-house Street), in the Faubourg St Germaine; and the Sieur Cuirette Verrières, residing above the Café du Rendesvous, Rue du Théâtre-Français—who nightly held meetings at the Sieur Santerre's, and sometimes in the committee-room of the section of the Enfants-Trouvés; that there they deliberated, in presence of a select body of the trusty in the faubourg, such as the Sieur Rossignol, lately a journeyman jeweller; the Sieur Nicolas, a sapper in the aforesaid battalion of the Enfants-Trouvés; the Sieur Brierre, wine merchant; the Sieur Gonor, calling himself a conqueror of the Bastille; and others whom he might name;—that they settled in such meetings the questions intended to be agitated in the mobs of the Tuileries, the Palais-Royal, the Place de Grève, and especially of the Gate St Antoine, Place de la Bastille; that they wrote out the incendiary placards affixed at intervals in the faubourgs, and the petitions intended to be carried by deputations to the patriotic societies of Paris; and, finally, that it was there the famous petition was fabricated, and the plot of the 20th June hatched. That, on the eve of that day, a se ret committee meeting was held at the Sieur Santerre's, which began at midnight, at which witnesses, whom he will be able to adduce when they return from the mission given to them by the Sieur Santerre for the neighbouring districts, asseverate they saw present Messieurs Pétion, Mayor of Paris; Robespierre; Manuel, solicitor of the commune; Alexandre, commander of the battalion of Saint-Michel; and Sillery, ex-deputy of the National Assembly. That, on the day of the 20th, the Sieur Santerre, seeing that several of his people, and especially the leaders of his party, from alarm at the decree of the directory of the department, refused to come forth armed, under pretext they would be fired upon, assured them they had nothing to fear—that the national guard would have no orders, and that M. Pétion would be there. That at eleven in the forenoon of the said day, the crowd did not exceed fifteen hundred persons, including the curious, and that it was only when the Sieur Santerre had put himself at the head of a detachment of invalids, which came out of his house, and with which he marched to the square, and had excited on the way the spectators to join him, that the multitude swelled considerably upon his progress to the passage of the Feuillants; that when there, not daring to attack the post, he retired into the court of the Capuchins, where he caused the Maypole to be planted which he had destined for the palace of the Tuileries; that thereupon he, the witness, asked several people in the train of the said Sieur Santerre, why the Maypole was not erected on the terrace of the palace, as had been fixed; and that those people replied to him, that they would take care how they did so, that such was the snare into which the Feuillantins wished them to fall, because there were cannon pointed in the garden—but that they were not to be trapped. The witness observed that at this moment the crowd was almost entirely scattered, and that it was only when the drums and music were heard in the enclosure of the national assembly, that the rioters, then sprinkled here and there, rallied, joined the other spectators, and quietly defiled three abreast before the legislative body; that he, the witness, remarked that those people, when passing into the Tuileries, gave way to nothing offensive, and did not attempt to enter the palace; that, when even assembled on the Place du Carrousel, which they had reached by making a circuit along the quay of the Louvre, they manifested no intention of penetrating into the courts, until the arrival of the Sieur Santerre, who was at the National Assembly, and did not leave it until the sitting broke up. That then the Sieur Santerre, accompanied by several persons, amongst whom he, the witness, remarked the Sieur de Saint-Hurugues, addressed his troop, hitherto quite tranquil, and demanded of them why they had not entered the palace; that they must go there, and had come out only for that purpose. That he immediately commanded the artillerymen of his battalion to follow him with a piece of ordnance, and said, that if the gate were closed against him, he would break it in with balls; that he subsequently presented himself with this array at the gate of the palace, where he experienced a feeble resistance on the part of the horse gendarmerie, but a firm opposition on the part of the national guard; that this occasioned considerable uproar and confusion, and they were apparently on the point of coming to blows, when two men, wearing scarfs of the national colours, one of whom he, the witness, recognised as the Sieur Boucher-Réné, and the other, who was named by the spectators as the Sieur Sergent, came up through the courts, and ordered them, he must say, in a very imperious if not insolent tone, prostituting the sacred name of the law, to open the gates, adding, that no one had a right to close them, and that every citizen had that of entering; that the gates were in fact opened by the national guard, and that then Santerre and his troop rushed pell-mell into the courts; that the Sieur Santerre, who caused the cannon to be dragged to force the doors of the king's apartments if he found them closed, and to fire upon any of the national guard who should oppose his inroad, was stopped in his progress in an inner court on the left, at the foot of the pavilion staircase, by a group of citizens, who spoke to him in the most reasonable terms, to moderate his fury, and threatened to hold him responsible for every mischief that might happen on that disastrous day, because, they said to him, 'You alone are the author of this unconstitutional assemblage, you alone have misled these honest people, and you are the only malefactor amongst them.' That the tone in which these respectable citizens spoke to the Sieur Santerre made him turn pale, but that, encouraged by a look from the Sieur Legendre, butcher as before men of liberty on the terrace of the Feuillants, and to address a petition to the assembly, as also to the king. This petition was designed to be presented under arms. Hence it is sufficiently clear that the real object of this plan was to scare the palace by an array of forty thousand pikes.

On the 16th June, a formal demand was laid before the council-general of the commune, soliciting authority for the citizens of the Faubourg Saint Antoine to assemble on the 20th in arms, and present a petition to the assembly and the king. The council-general of the commune passed to the order of the day, and directed that its resolution in that respect should be communicated to the directory and the municipal body. The petitioners did not deem themselves interdicted by this course, and openly stated they would assemble notwithstanding. The mayor Pétion only imparted on the 18th the communications ordered on the 16th, and then merely to the department, and not to the municipal body.

On the 19th, the directory of the department, which had upon all occasions signalised itself in opposition to agitators, passed a resolution prohibiting armed assemblages, and charging the commander-in-chief and the mayor to take the necessary steps for dispersing them. This resolution was signified to the assembly by the minister of the interior, and an immediate question arose whether it should be allowed a reading.

Vergniaud opposed its being heard; but he was overruled. The reading was voted, but all ulterior proceedings were thereon stopped by the order of the day.

Two important events had just occurred at the assembly. The king had sent to signify his opposition to the two decrees, the one relative to the nonjuring priests, and the other to the establishment of a camp of twenty thousand men. This communication had been heard in the deepest silence. At the same time some Marseillese had appeared at the bar, to read a petition. We have seen what relations Barbaroux maintained with them. Stimulated by his counsels, they had written to Pétion, offering him all their forces, and adding to this offer a petition intended for the assembly. In it they said amongst other things—

"French liberty is in danger, but the patriotism of the south will save France.—— The day of popular wrath is come.—— Legislators! the strength of the people is in your hands: make use of it: French patriotism asks of you permission to march with more imposing force towards the capital and the frontiers. —You will not refuse a legal sanction to those who are prepared to perish in defence of the law."

The reading of this petition gave rise to long debates in the assembly. The members of the right side argued, that to send a copy of it to each of the departments was to invite insurrection. But the transmission was ordered, in spite of these remarks, doubtless very just, but unavailing under the present firm persuasion that a new revolution alone could save France and liberty.

Such were the events that passed on the 19th. The agitation meanwhile continued in the faubourgs, and Santerre, as is alleged, said to his associates, somewhat intimidated by the decree of the directory, "What do you fear? The national guard will not have orders to fire, and M. Pétion will be there."

At midnight, the mayor, either because he believed the movement irresistible, or because he deemed it fitting to foster it, as he did afterwards on the 10th August, wrote to the directory, and requested it to throw a legal sanction over the rising, by permitting the national guard to receive the citizens of the faubourgs into its ranks. This measure would have perfectly fulfilled the views of those who desired, without resorting to a commotion, to overawe the king; and every thing proves that such were actually the views of Pétion and the popular leaders. The directory answered at five in the morning (20th June), that it persisted in its previous resolutions. Pétion thereupon ordered the general officer on duty to keep the posts at their complement, and to double the guard at the Tuileries; but he did nothing more; and unwilling either to have the scene of the Champ de Mars repeated, or to suppress the gathering, he waited until nine in the morning for the meeting of the municipal body. At this meeting he allowed a decision to be taken contrary to that of the directory, and it was enjoined upon the national guard to open its ranks to the armed petitioners. Pétion, in not opposing a resolution subversive of the legal administrative subordination, laid himself open to a charge of contravention, which did not fail to be subsequently made against him. But whatever might be the character of this resolution, its provisions were useless, for the national guard had not time to form; and the assemblage speedily became so considerable, that it was no longer possible to vary its form or direction.

The hour was eleven in the forenoon. The assembly had just met, in anticipation of some great event. The members of the departmental directory appeared at the bar to inform it of the inutility of their efforts. The attorney-syndic Rœderer obtained leave to speak. He stated that an extraordinary gathering of citizens had taken place, in contravention of the law and of various injunctions issued by the authorities; that this popular concourse seemed to have for object the celebration of the anniversary of the 20th June, and the tender of a fresh tribute of respect to the assembly; but that if such were the purpose of the majority, it was to be apprehended that evil-disposed persons would endeavour to use this multitude in support of an address to the king, who ought not to have any presented to him except under the peaceable form of a petition. Then recapitulating the orders of the directory and the council-general of the commune, the laws decreed against armed gatherings, and those fixing at twenty the number of citizens competent to present a petition, he exhorted the assembly to enforce their execution; "for," he added, "armed petitioners resort hither to-day from a civic impulse, but tomorrow a crowd of malignants may assemble, and I ask you, gentlemen, what you could say to them?"

Amid the applauses of the right, and the murmurs of the left, which, from its disapproval of the alarm and foresight of the department, evidently looked with favour on the insurrection, Vergniaud mounted the tribune, and called to recollection that the abuse at which the attorney-syndic was so alarmed as a future precedent, was an already established custom; that on several occasions armed petitioners had been received, and permitted to defile through the hall; that it was possibly very wrong; but that the petitioners of today would have good reason to complain if they were treated differently from others; that if, as was said, they wished to present an address to the king, they would doubtless delegate to him unarmed petitioners; and that, in sooth, if the assembly were apprehensive of danger to the king, it had but to form a bulwark around him, by sending a deputation of sixty members to the palace.

Dumolard admitted all that Vergniaud had advanced, and acknowledged that the abuse was established; but maintained that it ought to be abolished, especially upon this occasion, unless it were desired that the assembly and the king should appear, in the eyes of Europe, the slaves of a destructive faction.

tioned, he had recourse to a hypocritical subterfuge, turning to his troop, and saying to it, 'Gentlemen, draw up an account of the refusal I make to march at your head into the king's apartments;' that, for answer, the crowd, accustomed to understand the Sieur Santerre, pushed aside the group of honest citizens, entered with their cannon and their commander, Santerre, and penetrated into the apartment by all the inlets, after having broken in the doors and windows."

He recommended, like Vergniaud, that a deputation should be sent, but required, in addition, that the municipality and the department should be held responsible for the measures taken to ensure the maintenance of the laws. The uproar meanwhile increased with every moment. A letter from Santerre was announced; it was read amidst the acclamations of the galleries. The inhabitants of the Faubourg St Antoine, according to the purport of this letter, were celebrating the 20th June; they had been calumniated, and they requested to be admitted to the bar of the assembly to confound their detractors, and to prove that they were still the men of the 14th of July.

Vergniaud replied to Dumolard, that if the law had been violated, the case was not unprecedented; that an attempt to put the present movement down would assuredly renew the sanguinary scene of the Champ de Mars; and that, after all, the sentiments of the petitioners were not reprehensible. "Justly uneasy as to the future," he added, "they wish to demonstrate that, in spite of all the intrigues hatching against liberty, they are ever ready to defend it." In these words, arising from the natural course of a debate, it may be observed, the real motive of the occurrence was proclaimed. The tumult still continued. Ramond claimed to speak, and an express resolution was needed to secure him the privilege. At the same moment, it was announced that the petitioners were eight thousand in number. "They are eight thousand," said Calvet, "and we are but seven hundred and forty-five: let us retire." "Order! order!" was shouted from all sides. Calvet was formally called to order, and Ramond urged to speak, as eight thousand citizens were in waiting. "If eight thousand citizens are waiting," said he, "twenty-four millions of Frenchmen are not less so." He then proceeded to repeat the arguments adduced by his friends of the right side. Suddenly the petitioners rushed into the hall. The assembly rose indignantly, the president put on his hat, and the petitioners retired with respectful submission. The assembly, satisfied at this proof of docility, consented to receive them.

Their petition, conceived in the most audacious spirit, expressed the opinions of all the petitions of that period. "The people are ready; they wait only for you; they are determined to use strong means to give execution to the second article in the declaration of rights—resistance to oppression; let the minority amongst you, at variance with your sentiments and ours, purge the land of liberty, and begone to Coblentz. Investigate the cause of the evils that threaten us: if it originate with the executive power, let it be annihilated!"

The president, after pronouncing a reply in which he promised the petitioners unremitting vigilance on the part of the representatives of the people, and exhorted them to give obedience to the laws, granted them, in the name of the assembly, permission to defile before it. The doors were then thrown open, and the crowd, which at this moment amounted to at least thirty thousand, passed in procession through the hall. What the wild imagination of a populace all abandoned to itself, is likely to exhibit, may be easily imagined. Enormous tables bearing the declaration of rights preceded the march; women and children danced around these tables, brandishing branches of olive and pikes, intended to intimate peace or war at the option of the enemy; and all repeated in chorus the famous air, Ca ira. Then came the porters of the markets and workmen of all denominations, with rusty muskets, swords, and bludgeons, with sharp steel points. Santerre, and the Marquis de Saint-Hurugues, already mentioned as a distinguished actor on the 5th and 6th October, marched, sword in hand, at their head. Some battalions of the national guard followed in good order, to restrain the tumult by their presence. After them came more women, followed by other armed men. Floating streamers bore the words: "The constitution or death." A pair of tattered breeches was raised aloft, amidst cries of "The sans-culottes (the breechless) for ever!" Finally, an atrocious symbol added ferocity to the grotesqueness of the scene. At the point of a pike was borne a calf's heart, with this inscription: "Heart of an aristocrat." Abhorrence and indignation broke loose at this exhibition; instantly the dismal emblem disappeared, but only to be again reared at the gates of the Tuileries. The acclamation of the galleries, the shouts of the populace traversing the hall, the civic songs, the confused uproar, the silence mixed with anxiety of the assembly, composed a scene of the strangest character, and one afflictive even to those members who viewed the multitude as an auxiliary. Alas! that reason is so powerless in times of discord! Alas! that those who invoked the disciplined barbarians of the north obliged their adversaries to call upon those undisciplined barbarians, of alternate gaiety and ferocity, who multiply in the heart of cities, and stagnate beneath the most progressive civilisation!

This scene lasted three hours. In conclusion, Santerre, reappearing to return thanks to the assembly on behalf of the people, presented it with a flag as a token of gratitude and devotion.

The multitude then attempted to enter the garden of the Tuileries, the gates of which were barred. Numerous detachments of the national guard surrounded the palace, and stretching in line from the terrace of the Feuillants to the river, presented an imposing front. An order from the king caused the garden gates to be opened. The populace immediately rushed in, marched under the windows of the palace, and before the ranks of the national guard, without any hostile demonstration, save repeatedly shouting, "Down with the veto!—the sans-culottes for ever!" A few individuals, however, alluding to the king, exclaimed, "Why does he not show himself? We don't intend him any harm." The old phrase, "He is deceived," was still heard, but very rarely. The people, prompt to imbibe the impressions of their leaders, had likewise given up the idea in despair.

The multitude issued from the garden by the gate opening on the Pont-Royal, passed up the quay, and, traversing the avenues of the Louvre, proceeded to the Place du Carrousel. This square, now so open and spacious, was then filled with numberless streets, which formed, as it were, covered ways through it. Instead of that immense court which at present extends between the palace and the railing, and from one wing to the other, were several small courts, separated by walls and houses, old-fashioned posterns giving them access to the Carrousel. The populace occupied all the surrounding space, and advanced to the royal gateway. An entrance through it was denied: some municipal officers here addressed them, and seemed to have prevailed on them to retire. It is alleged that, at this moment, Santerre, coming out of the assembly, where he had remained to the last for the purpose of presenting his flag, reanimated the already flagging dispositions of the crowd, and brought cannon to bear on the gate. It was now almost four o'clock; suddenly two municipal officers raised the bars,* whereupon the troops, who were gathered at this point in considerable numbers, consisting of battalions of the national guard and detachments of gendarmerie, were completely paralysed. The people rushed precipitately into the court, and thence into the vestibule of the palace. Santerre, threatened, it is said, by two witnesses with impeachment for this violation of the royal abode, exclaimed, turning to the assailants, "Be witnesses that I refuse to proceed into the king's apartments!" The populace had received too powerful an impulse to be stopped by such an appeal; they spread into all parts of the palace, pressed up all the staircases, and transported in their arms a piece of ordnance even to the first floor. In the mean time the assailants began to hack, with swords and axes, the doors which were closed against them.

* All the witnesses examined were agreed upon this fact, and were at variance only as to the names of the municipal officers.

Louis XVI., at this moment, had dismissed many of his dangerous friends, who, without ability to save him, had so often tended to compromise him. They had flocked around him on this day, but he ordered them to leave the Tuileries, where their presence would only exasperate without awing the people. He had remaining with old Marshal de Mouchy, Acloque, commander of a battalion,* some servants of his household, and several devoted officers of the national guard. At length the shouts of the populace, and the blows of the hatchets, were heard. The officers of the national guard immediately surrounded the king, and entreated him to show himself, promising to die by his side. He did not hesitate, and ordered the doors to be opened. At that very instant, the panel of the one before him fell beneath his feet, under some vehement blow. At length all impediments to the crowd were removed, and a forest of pikes and bayonets bristled to the view. "Here I am!" said Louis XVI., showing himself to the unbridled mob. His attendants pressed around him, and formed a rampart for him with their persons. "Respect your king!" they exclaimed; and the multitude, who had assuredly no settled object, the design of a threatening inroad being all that had been marked out for them, slackened in their irruption. Several voices announced there was a petition, and demanded it might be heard. Those who surrounded the king urged him to pass into a larger saloon, in order that this petition might be conveniently read. The populace, gratified at seeing its wishes attended to, followed the monarch, whom his attendants had the wisdom to place in the recess of a window. They induced him also to mount a bench, whilst some of them drew up others in front of him; a table, likewise, was added, and all who accompanied him stood around. Some grenadiers of the guard and officers of his household came to increase the number of his defenders, and composed a rampart behind which he could listen with less of imminent danger to the popular demands. In the midst of the tumult and the shouts, these words were often heard repeated: "No veto!—no priests!—no aristocrats!—the camp near Paris!" Legendre, the butcher, drew near, and demanded, in popular phraseology, the sanction of the decrees. "This is neither the place nor the time to ask it," said the king, with firmness; "I will do all that the constitution requires." This resistance produced its effect. "The nation for ever!—the nation for ever!" shouted the assailants. "Yes," resumed Louis XVI., "the nation for ever! I am its fastest friend." "Indeed!—let us see!" said one of these men, holding out to him a red cap at the end of a pike. Rejection was pregnant with danger; and surely the dignity of the king did not require him to immolate himself from repugnance for a vain symbol; but, on the contrary, as he in sooth did, to repel with composure the assault of the multitude. He put the cap on his head, and general approbation was expressed. Panting from the heat of the season and the crowd, one of the men, in a half-intoxicated condition, holding in his hands a glass and a bottle, asked him to drink. The king had for some time been apprehensive of poison; however, he drank without hesitation, and was vociferously applauded.

During this interval, the Princess Elizabeth, who was attached to her brother by the tenderest affection, and who alone, of all his family, had been able to reach him, followed him from window to window, in order to share his dangers. When the people saw her, they took her for the queen. Yells of "There's the Austrian!" resounded in a fearful manner. The national guards who had surrounded the princess wished to undeceive the people. "Leave them," said that generous relative, "in their error, and save the queen!"

The queen, accompanied by her children, had been unable to join her royal consort. She had fled from the lower apartments, and gained the council-chamber, but could not penetrate to the king, on account of the crowd which obstructed every room in the palace. She was extremely anxious to join him, and earnestly entreated to be conducted to the room in which he was. With great difficulty she was dissuaded from attempting it; and standing behind the council-table, with some grenadiers, she surveyed the mob as it moved along, her heart palpitating with terror, and her eyes moist with suppressed tears. At her side, her daughter was weeping bitterly; and her young boy, at first greatly terrified, had soon regained confidence, and was smiling with the happy unconsciousness of tender age. Some of the populace had thrust a red cap into his hand, which the queen put upon his head. Santerre, who was stationed in this quarter, enjoined respect upon the people, and attempted to comfort the princess. He repeated to her the usual but unfortunately disregarded phrase—"Madam, you are misled—you are deceived;" and seeing the young prince oppressed by the red cap, "This child is smothered," said he, and freed him from the burlesque head-dress.

Upon learning the dangers of the palace, some deputies had hastened to the king, and addressed the people, urging them to respect. Others had repaired to the assembly to communicate what was passing; and the excitement within the hall had risen to the highest pitch, from the indignation of the right side, and the endeavours of the left to excuse this irruption into the palace of the monarch. A deputation had been decreed without dissent, and twenty-four members departed to surround the king. The deputation was ordered to be renewed every half hour, in order that the assembly might be always kept apprised of events. The deputed members harangued by turns, having themselves supported on the shoulders of grenadiers. Pétion afterwards appeared, and was accused of being too tardy in his arrival. He asserted he had not been informed until half-past four of the inroad effected at four; that he had taken half an hour to reach the palace, and had afterwards encountered so many obstacles as to be unable to penetrate to the king before half-past five. He approached the monarch; "Fear nothing," said he to him, "you are in the midst of the people." Louis XVI, upon these words, took the hand of a grenadier, and placed it on his heart, saying, "Feel if it beats faster than usual." This noble observation was greatly applauded. Pétion mounted on a chair, and addressing the crowd, told it, that having made its representations to the king, the only duty left for it to perform was to retire without disturbance, and in such a manner as not to sully the day. Some of the witnesses allege that Pétion said, "its just representations." These words would only prove at the most an anxiety not to irritate the multitude. Santerre united his influence with Pétion's, and the palace was speedily evacuated. The crowd retired peaceably and orderly. The palace was cleared about seven in the evening.

The king, the queen, his sister, and his children, immediately assembled together, mingling their tears. The king, stupified by the scene, still had the red cap on his head; he was now made sensible of the ill-omened ornament he had worn for several hours, and hurled it from him with indignant wrath. At this moment, fresh deputies arrived to take cognisance of the state of the palace. The queen, accompanying them through it, pointed out to them the shattered doors and the broken furniture, expressing herself with anguish upon the enormity of the outrages. Merlin de Thionville, one of the most ardent republicans in the assembly, was amongst the deputies present; and the queen perceived tears in his eyes. "You weep," said she to him, "at seeing the king and his family so cruelly treated by a people whom he has always desired to render happy." "It is true, madam," replied Merlin, "I weep at the misfortunes of a beautiful and sensitive lady, the mother of a family; but do not misconstrue them, for not one of my tears is shed for the king or the queen. I detest kings and queens."*

*["A brewer of the Faubourg Saint-Marceau. The virtues and misfortunes of the king had made such an impression on this worthy man, that his majesty had not a more zealous partisan." —Bertrand's Annals, vol. vi. p. 337.]

* See Madame Campan, vol. ii. p. 215.

CHAPTER X.

CONSEQUENCES OF THE 20TH JUNE, AND EVENTS SUBSEQUENT TO AUGUST 1792.

On the morning following this insurrectional day of the 20th, the principal events of which we have just recounted, Paris still wore a threatening aspect; and the different parties were moved with more than wonted violence. Indignation, of course, was general amongst the partisans of the court—they regarding it as atrociously outraged; and among the constitutionalists, who considered the invasion of the palace as an attack upon the laws and the public tranquillity. The disorder had been doubtless great, but it was now unduly exaggerated: it was alleged there had been a project to assassinate the king, and that the plot had only failed by a fortunate chance. Thus, by a very natural reaction, the feeling of the moment was entirely in favour of the royal family, exposed the day before to so many dangers and insults; and great disapprobation was expressed against the presumed instigators of the insurrection.

In the assembly, mournful countenances occupied the benches. Several deputies inveighed with force against the events of the previous day. M. Bigot proposed a law against armed petitions, and the usage of allowing bands to march through the hall. Although laws already existed upon these points, they were renewed by a decree. M. Daveirhoult maintained that informations should be taken against the perturbators. "Informations!" said some of the members, "against forty thousand men!" "Well," he retorted, "if it be impossible to distinguish the guilty amongst forty thousand, punish the guard for making no defence; but at all events act in some manner." The minister subsequently came to make a report on what had passed; and a discussion arose upon the nature of the facts. A member of the right side urged, on the ground that Vergniaud could not be suspected, and had been an eyewitness of the scene, that he should speak to what he had personally witnessed. But Vergniaud did not rise to this appeal, and preserved strict silence. However, the more undaunted of the left side shook off this constraint, and resumed courage towards the end of the sitting. They even ventured to move that an inquiry should be made, whether to decrees of urgency the sanction was necessary. But this motion was rejected by a large majority.

Towards evening, a renewal of the scenes of the preceding day was feared. The populace on retiring had stated that they would return, and it was generally imagined they would keep their promise. But, whether it were merely a remnant of the yesterday's excitement, or any fresh attempt were judged inexpedient at the moment by the leaders of the popular party, all tendency to riot was easily suppressed; and Pétion ran incontinently to the palace to assure the king that order was re-established, and that the people, after having made their representations to him, were calm and satisfied. "That is not true," said the king to him. "Sire"—— "Be silent." "The magistrate of the people is not called upon to be silent when he does his duty and tells the truth." "The tranquillity of Paris rests upon your head." "I know my duties: I will observe them." "Enough: go and perform them. Retire."

Notwithstanding his extreme amiability, the king was susceptible of splenetic emotions, which the courtiers used to call "fits of snorting." The sight of Pétion, who was accused of having stimulated the scenes of the 20th, irritated him, and provoked the conversation we have just related. All Paris was speedily acquainted with its terms. Two proclamations were forthwith published, one emanating from the king and the other from the municipality, demonstrating, significantly, that those two authorities were coming into conflict.

The municipality told the citizens to remain quiet, to respect the king, to respect and make respected the national assembly; and not to congregate in arms, because the laws prohibited it; and, above all, to distrust those evil-disposed persons who strove to put them again in motion.

It was rumoured at the moment, that the court was seeking to arouse the people a second time, to have an opportunity of shooting them down. Thus, the palace was haunted with the idea of an assassination, and the faubourgs with that of a massacre.

In his proclamation the king said, "The French will not have learnt without indignation that a multitude, deluded by certain factious individuals, has invaded, by force of arms, the habitation of the king. The king opposed to the menaces and insults of the factious nothing but the rectitude of his conscience and his love for the public weal.

He is ignorant to what extremity it is their purpose to restrict themselves; but, whatever excesses they may perpetrate, they will never wring from him a consent to what he believes opposed to the public interest, et cetera.

If those who labour to overthrow the monarchy have occasion for one more crime, they may commit it.

The king commands all the administrative bodies and municipalities to watch over the safety of persons and property."

Such opposite language was in accordance with the two opinions then prevalent. All whom the conduct of the court had driven to despair, were only the more exasperated against it, and more determined to contravene its schemes by all possible means. The popular societies, the municipalities, the men of pikes,* a portion of the national guard, and the left side of the assembly, applauded the proclamation of the Mayor of Paris, and vowed to use forbearance only so far as might be necessary to avoid being mowed down by artillery without effecting any decisive result. Still uncertain as to the means they should employ, they awaited events, full of their former distrust and aversion. Their first proceeding was to oblige the ministers to appear before the assembly, to give an account of the precautions they had adopted upon two essential points:—

1st, Upon the religious troubles excited by the priests;

2d, Upon the safety of the metropolis, which the camp of twenty thousand men, refused by the king, was intended to cover.

Those who were called aristocrats, the sincere con-

* [With regard to pikes, there is a curious passage quoted by Bertrand in his Annals, and attributed to Brissot in his journal. It is as follows:—"Where will these pikes go?" asks an aristocrat. "Wherever ye shall be, ye enemies of the people," is the reply. "Will they dare go to the palace of the Tuileries?" "Yes, certainly, if ye be there." "Who shall command these pikes?" "Necessity." "Who shall distribute them?" "Patriotism. Pikes began the revolution; pikes shall end it."] stitutionalists, a part of the national guards, several of the provinces, and especially the departmental directories, declared their opinions upon this occasion in a very energetic manner. The laws having been violated, they had all the advantage in argument, and used it to good purpose. A multitude of addresses came to the king. At Rouen and at Paris, a petition was prepared, to which twenty thousand signatures were attached, and which was associated in the detestation of the people with that formerly signed by eight thousand Parisians against the camp below Paris. Finally, an inquiry was ordered by the department against the mayor Pétion, and the attorney of the commune, Manuel, who were both accused of having encouraged, by their inertness, the insurrection of the 20th June. At this period, the conduct of the king on that fatal day was spoken of with admiration: there was a general relapse from the opinion respecting his character, which it was thought had been too harshly judged when suspected of weakness. But it was soon seen that the passive courage which can resist is far removed from that active, enterprising courage which anticipates dangers instead of awaiting them with composure.

The constitutional party likewise bestirred itself with extreme activity. All those who had flocked around Lafayette to concert with him the letter of the 16th June, again assembled, in order to arrange a grand demonstration. Lafayette had been roused to indignation on learning the events that had occurred in the palace, and they found him perfectly disposed to coincide with their views. Several regiments were induced to send addresses to him, testifying the same feelings of abhorrence. Whether these addresses were prompted or were spontaneous, he interdicted them by an order of the day, promising to convey, himself and in person, the sentiments of the whole army. He resolved accordingly to visit Paris, and repeat to the legislative body what he had written to it on the 16th June. He came to an understanding with Luckner, who was easily led, as an old warrior who had never been out of a camp. He prevailed on him to write a letter addressed to the king, expressive of the same sentiments he was about to proclaim viva voce at the bar of the Legislative Assembly. He then made all the necessary dispositions to prevent his absence being injurious to the military operations, and tearing himself from the affectionate solicitude of his soldiers, he repaired to Paris at the risk of imminent personal danger.

Lafayette relied upon his faithful national guards, and upon new energy on their part. He likewise relied upon the court, whose enmity he could scarcely anticipate when he was exposing himself to serve it. After having proved his chivalric love for liberty, he was anxious to prove his sincere attachment to the king; and in his heroic mood, it is probable he was not insensible to the glory of this double devotion. He arrived on the morning of the 28th June. The intelligence was rapidly diffused, and it was every where repeated with amazement and curiosity that General Lafayette was at Paris.

Before his arrival, the assembly had been agitated by the presentation of numerous contrary petitions. Those from Rouen, Havre, the Ain, the Seine and Oise, the Pas de Calais, and the Aisne, inveighed against the excesses of the 20th June; whilst those from Arras and Herault seemed almost to approve of them. On the one hand, Luckner's letter to the king had been read, and on the other, vindictive placards against him. The reading of these different documents had caused great excitement for several days.

On the 28th, a considerable crowd repaired to the assembly, in the hope that Lafayette, whose purpose was as yet unknown, would appear there. In fact, about half-past one it was announced that he requested to be admitted to the bar. Upon his entrance, he was received with the cheers of the right side, and the silence of the galleries and the left side.

"Gentlemen," said he, "I ought in the first place to assure you that, consequent upon dispositions concerted between Marshal Luckner and myself, my presence here in no respect compromises either the success of our arms, or the safety of the army I have the honour to command."

He then proceeded to unfold the reasons which brought him to Paris. It had been asserted that his letter was not from him; he came to avow it, and for that purpose had left the intrenchments of his camp, where the attachment of his soldiers was his greatest security. A more powerful motive had impelled him to this step; the 20th June had excited the indignation of his army, which had presented to him a multitude of addresses. He had interdicted them, and undertaken to become the organ of his troops with the National Assembly. "Already," said he, "the soldiers ask themselves whether it is really the cause of liberty and the constitution that they are defending."

He entreated the National Assembly:

1st, To prosecute the instigators of the 20th June;

2d, To annihilate a faction which usurps the national sovereignty, and whose public debates leave no doubt as to the atrocity of its projects;

3d, To ensure respect to the authorities, and to give the armies assurance that the constitution will receive no injury at home, whilst they are shedding their blood to defend it abroad.

The president answered him that the assembly would be faithful to the sworn law, and would consider his petition. He was invited to the honours of the sitting.

The general took his seat on the benches of the right. The deputy Kersaint remarked that he ought to take his place on the bench for petitioners. "Yes!" "No!" was shouted from all parts. The general modestly arose, and proceeded to the petitioners' bench. Long-continued cheers accompanied him to this new seat. Guadet was the first to speak, and, with infinite tact, asked if their enemies were subdued, if their country were delivered, since M. Lafayette was at Paris. "No," said he, "the country is not delivered—our situation has not changed, and yet the general of one of our armies is at Paris! I will not stop to inquire whether M. de Lafayette, who sees in the French people only creatures of faction, surrounding and threatening the authorities, be not himself surrounded by a staff which circumvents him; but I will observe to M. de Lafayette, that he infringes the constitution by becoming the organ of an army, legally incapable of deliberating, and that in all probability, likewise, he has infringed upon military subordination, by coming to Paris without authority from the minister at war."

In consequence, Guadet moved that the minister be called upon to state whether he gave leave of absence to M. de Lafayette, and also that the extraordinary commission should make a report on the question whether a general was competent to address the assembly upon matters purely political.

Ramond came forward to answer Guadet. He commenced by a very natural and often an apposite observation, that the interpretation of laws varies according to circumstances. "Never," said he, "have you been so scrupulous upon the existence of the right of petitioning. When very recently an armed multitude appeared, you did not ask what its mission was, nor reproach it with invading, by the display of arms, the independence of the assembly; and yet when M. de Lafayette, who, from the whole course of his life, is the very standard of liberty both for America and for Europe, presents himself, suspicions are awakened! If there be two weights and measures, if there be two modes of considering things, let the respect to persons be observed in favour of the first-born of liberty!"

Ramond then moved the reference of the petition to the extraordinary commission, for the purpose of examining, not the conduct of Lafayette, but the petition itself. After considerable tumult, and a double vote, the motion of Ramond was adopted. Lafayette left the assembly encompassed by a numerous concourse of deputies and soldiers of the national guard, all of them his partisans and old companions in arms.

This was the critical moment for all—for himself, for the court, and for the popular party. He repaired to the palace. The most insulting expressions were circulated in his hearing by the crowd of courtiers. The king and queen also accorded a cold reception to the man who had just taken so perilous a step in their behalf. He quitted the palace, afflicted, not on his own account, but on that of the royal family itself, at the dispositions evinced towards him. As he issued from the Tuileries, a considerable assemblage was waiting for him, which followed him with cries of "Lafayette for ever!" to the door of his residence, and even fixed a Maypole before the house. These testimonies of continued attachment affected the general, and intimidated the Jacobins. But it was necessary to turn these remnants of affection promptly to account, and to give them increased stimulus, if it were wished to render them efficacious. Certain officers of the national guard, particularly devoted to the royal family, addressed themselves to the court for an intimation of what ought to be done. The king and queen were both of opinion that it was not expedient to second M. de Lafayette.*

He therefore found himself abandoned by the only portion of the national guard upon which any hope of support could still be placed. Nevertheless, determined to serve the king in spite of himself, he held consultations with his friends. But their sentiments were far from harmonising together. Some, and especially Lally-Tolendal, desired that he should act with promptitude against the Jacobins, and attack them by main force in their club. Others, all members of the department and the assembly, taking their position on the law, upon which alone their influence rested, refused to sanction its violation, and strenuously opposed any open attack. Lafayette, however, gave the preference to the boldest of the counsels, and fixed a rendezvous with his partisans, with the view of expelling the Jacobins from their hall, and walling up the doors. But although the place of meeting was duly appointed, few made their appearance, and Lafayette found it impossible to strike the blow. In the mean time, whilst he was in despair at seeing himself so ill supported, the Jacobins, ignorant of the defection of his friends, were seized with a panic, and abandoned their hall. They hastened to Dumouriez, who had not yet departed for the army, and urged him to put himself at their head and march against Lafayette; but their proposal was not accepted. Lafayette remained another day at Paris, amidst denunciations, menaces, and plans of assassination, and finally departed in disgust at his own fruitless solicitude and the deplorable infatuation of the court. And yet this is the man, so completely abandoned, when he came to confront the most imminent dangers to save the king, who is accused of having betrayed Louis XVI.! The writers of the court pretend that his measures were ill combined: doubtless it was more easy and more sure, at least in appearance, to be served by eighty thousand Prussians; but in Paris itself, and with a determination of not appealing to foreigners, what more could be done than to place himself at the head of the national guard, and overawe the Jacobins by dispersing them?

Lafayette returned to his army with the intention of still serving the king, and arranging for him, if it were possible, the means of quitting Paris. He wrote to the assembly a letter in which he reiterated with yet greater energy all that he had said in person against those he called the factious.

* See Madame Campan, vol. ii. p. 224; a letter from M. de Lally to the King of Prussia; and all the authorities.

Scarcely was the popular party freed from the alarms which the presence and purpose of the general had caused it, than it resumed its attacks upon the court, and persisted in demanding a rigorous account of the measures it was taking to defend the country. It was already known, although the executive power had sent no notification to the assembly, that the Prussians had broken their neutrality, and were advancing by Coblentz to the number of eighty thousand men, all veterans of the great Frederick, and commanded by the Duke of Brunswick, a general of celebrity. Luckner, having too few troops, and relying little upon the Belgians, had been obliged to retreat upon Lille and Valenciennes. On evacuating Courtray, an officer had burnt the suburbs of that town, with the intention, as it was believed, of alienating the Belgians by so remorseless a proceeding. The government was taking no steps to augment the force of the armies, which amounted at the most, upon the three frontiers, to scarcely two hundred and thirty thousand men. It was adopting none of those energetic steps which arouse the zeal and enthusiasm of a nation. In short, the enemy might easily reach Paris in six weeks.

The queen reckoned upon it, and imparted her confidence to one of her ladies. She had the itinerary of the emigrants and the King of Prussia. She knew that upon such a day they would be at Verdun, on such another at Lille, and that they designed to lay siege to that latter fortress. The unfortunate princess hoped, as she said, to be delivered in a month.* Alas! that she did not rather credit those sincere friends who represented to her the evil consequences of foreign aid, and its inutility, inasmuch as it would arrive too soon to compromise, too late to save her! —that she did not credit her own fears in this respect, and the gloomy presentiments which sometimes assailed her!

We have seen that the measure upon which the national party laid greatest stress was a reserve of twenty thousand federalists under the walls of Paris. The king, as has been already stated, had opposed this project. He was summoned, in the persons of his ministers, to give explanations on the precautions he had taken in substitution of those ordained by the unsanctioned decree. He answered by proposing a new plan, which consisted in directing upon Soissons a reserve of forty-two battalions of national volunteers, to replace the old reserve, which was exhausted by draughts to the two main armies. This was in some sort the first decree, with one difference, which the patriots regarded as highly important, namely, that the reserved camp was to be formed between Paris and the frontier, and not near Paris itself. This plan was received with murmurs, and remitted to the military committee.

Several departments and municipalities, excited thereto by their correspondents at Paris, had previously resolved to carry into execution the decree for the camp of twenty thousand men, although it remained unsanctioned. The departments of the Bouches-du-Rhone, the Gironde, and L'Herault, set the first example, and were speedily imitated by others. Such was the commencement of the insurrection.

So soon as these spontaneous levies were known, the assembly, modifying the project relative to forty-two new battalions, as proposed by the king, decreed that the battalions which, in the ardour of their zeal, had begun their march before being legally summoned, should pass through Paris, in order to be inscribed at the municipality of that city; that they should be afterwards directed upon Soissons for the purpose of encamping there; and, finally, that such of them as should reach Paris before the 14th July, the anniversary of the federation, should assist at that national solemnity. This festival had not been observed in 1791, on account of the flight to Varennes, and it was determined to celebrate it this year with great splendour. The assembly subjoined to their decree that, immediately after the celebration, the federalists should take the road to the place of their destination.

* See Madame Campan, vol. ii. p. 230.

These provisions tended at once to authorise the insurrection, and to re-enact, almost in terms, the unsanctioned decree. The only difference was that the federalists were merely to pass through Paris. But the important point was to bring them there, for, once arrived, a thousand circumstances might retain them. The decree as thus amended was immediately sent to the king, and was sanctioned on the morrow.

To this important measure was added another. A feeling of repugnance existed against a portion of the national guards, and especially against the staffs, which, after the example of the directories of departments, had a considerable leaning in favour of high authority, from being drawn into relation with it by their superior rank. The staff of the Parisian national guard chiefly excited the popular ire; but the assembly, considering it unsafe to make a direct attack upon it, decreed that all staffs, in towns of more than fifty thousand souls, should be dissolved and re-elected.* The state of agitation which prevailed in France securing to the most ardent an ever-increasing influence, this re-election was certain to bring forward characters devoted to the popular and republican party.

These were great measures, carried by pure energy against the right side and the court. But nothing seemed sufficiently effective to the patriots against the imminent dangers wherewith they believed themselves threatened. Forty thousand Prussians, as many Austrians and Sardinians, advancing on the frontiers; a court apparently in unison with the enemy, employing no means to augment the armies and stimulate the nation, but, on the contrary, applying the veto to thwart the measures of the legislative body, and the civil list to procure itself partisans in the interior; a general, who was certainly not deemed capable of uniting with the emigrants to deliver up France, but was, nevertheless, evidently disposed to support the court against the people;—all these circumstances struck the public mind with affright and profound emotion. "The country is in danger!" was the universal cry. But how prevent this danger?—there was the difficulty. Its causes even were matters of dispute. The constitutionalists and the partisans of the court, equally terrified with the patriots themselves, imputed the dangers solely to the factious, trembled only for royalty, and perceived peril in disunion alone. The patriots, on the contrary, held the peril to lie in the invasion, and charged it solely upon the court, its refusals, its delays, and its secret plots. Cross petitions were presented; some attributing every mischief to the Jacobins, others to the court, which was alternately designated under the appellations of "the palace," "the executive power," "the veto." The assembly heard, and remitted them all to the extraordinary commission of twelve, some time previously appointed to reflect upon and propose measures of safety. Its plan was impatiently desired. In the interim, threatening placards every where covered the walls; and the public journals, as daring as the placards, spoke openly of a forced abdication and dethronement. This was the subject of all conversations; and it was only in the assembly that any measures seemed to be preserved. There the attacks against royalty were as yet but indirect. It had been proposed, for example, to suppress the veto on decrees of urgency, and several times questions had been raised on the civil list and its criminal appropriation, with the view of either reducing it, or subjecting its outlay to public scrutiny.

The court had never refused to act upon the demands addressed to it by the assembly, and to materially augment the means of defence. It could not have done so, indeed, without compromising itself too openly; and, furthermore, it must have been indifferent to the numerical reinforcement of armies which it deemed completely disorganised. The popular party, on the other hand, desired those extraordinary measures, which evince a grand determination, and frequently render the most desperate cause triumphant. Such were the measures conceived by the commission of twelve, after a long inquiry, and proposed by it to the assembly. They were contained in the following project:—

When the danger became extreme, the legislative body was to promulgate the fact, by this solemn declaration—The country is in danger.

Upon this proclamation, all local authorities, the communal, district, and departmental councils, and the assembly itself, as the first of the authorities, were to be permanent, and to sit without interruption. All the citizens were bound, under the severest penalties, to surrender to the authorities the arms they possessed, in order that a suitable distribution might be made of them. All the men, young and old, capable of service, were to be enrolled in the national guards Some were to be kept disposable, and transferred to the seats of the district and departmental bodies; whilst others were to be dispatched into all quarters where the danger of the country should require, either at home or abroad. A uniform was not to be made imperative on those too poor to afford the expense of one. All the national guards, when removed from their places of abode, were to receive the pay of volunteers. The authorities were to be chargeable with the providing of munitions. A rebellious symbol, hoisted intentionally, was to be punished with death. All cockades and banners were reputed seditious except those of the tricolour.

According to this project, the nation was to be on the alert and in arms; it would possess the means of deliberating, and of fighting on all sides and at all moments; and could disregard the government by amply compensating for its inertness. The agitation of the masses, hitherto without a specific object, would be regulated and directed. If, in fine, after the appeal was made, the French did not respond to it, nothing more would be due to a nation which did nothing for itself. A debate of the most stirring character did not fail, as may be well imagined, to ensue upon such a project.

The deputy Pastoret made the preliminary report on the 30th June.

He gave satisfaction to no one, laying blame on all parties, then flattering them at each other's expense, and failing to illustrate in a decisive manner the measures for meeting the public dangers. After him, the deputy Jean de Bry gave a clear and calm exposition of the reasons on which the plan of the commission was founded. The discussion, once commenced, soon became a mere interchange of reproaches. It gave play to those hot and hasty imaginations which fly incontinently to extreme measures. The great law of public safety, that is to say, a dictatorship, or, in other words, the power of doing any thing, with the chance of using it cruelly but efficiently—a law, in fact, which was suitable only for the convention, was proposed, nevertheless, in the Legislative Assembly.

M. Delaunay d'Angers moved that the assembly declare that, until after the cessation of danger, it would consult only the imperious and supreme law of public safety.

This was, under an abstract and vague formula, evidently intended to suppress royalty, and declare the assembly absolute sovereign. M. Delaunay said that the revolution was not accomplished, that they deceived themselves if they thought otherwise, and that fixed laws were for a revolution saved, not for a revolution to save; in short, he said all that is usually said in favour of a dictatorship, the idea of which invariably presents itself in moments of imminent danger. The reply of the deputies on the right side was, naturally, that the oaths taken to the constitution would be violated by instituting an authority to absorb the legal and established powers. Their opponents retorted by asserting, that the example of the violation had been given, and that it behoved them to take care they were not surprised in a defenceless state. "But prove," responded the partisans of the court, "that this example has been given, and that the constitution has been betrayed." This defiance was met by renewed accusations against the court, and these accusations, again, were opposed by invectives against agitators. "You are factious!" "You are traitors!"—such was the mutual and incessant reproach, and it involved the question to be solved.

* Decree of the 2d July.

M. de Jaucourt moved that Delaunay's proposition be dismissed to the club of Jacobins, so extravagant did he deem it. M. Isnard, to whose impetuous temperament it was acceptable, demanded that it be taken into consideration, and that the speech of M. Delaunay be sent to the departments, as an antidote to that of M. Pastoret, which was only "a dose of opium administered to one in agony."

M. de Vaublanc succeeded in obtaining a hearing, and said that the constitution might be saved by the constitution; that the project of M. Jean de Bry was a proof of it; that the speech of M. Delaunay might be printed, if it were desired, but certainly not sent to the departments; and that the assembly ought to revert to the proposition of the commission. The debate was finally adjourned to the 3d July.

One deputy had not yet spoken, and that was Vergniaud. A member of the Gironde, and its greatest orator, he was nevertheless independent of it. Either from coolness or true elevation of mind, he seemed superior to the passions of his friends; and, whilst participating their ardent patriotism, he did not always yield to their prejudices and violence. When he spoke upon a question, he carried with him, by his eloquence and a certain acknowledged impartiality, that undecided portion of the assembly which Mirabeau was formerly wont to sway by his vehement and logical outbursts. Wavering masses every where obey the impulse of talent and the force of reason.*

It had been announced that he would speak on the 3d July, and an immense crowd attended to hear the great orator, on a question which was regarded as decisive.

He rose accordingly,† and cast a preliminary glance at the state of France. "If we did not trust," said he, "in the imperishable love of the people for liberty, we might doubt whether the revolution was retrograding, or had reached its limit. Our armies in the north were advancing into Belgium, and suddenly they gave way; the theatre of the war is carried to our own territory, and the unfortunate Belgians preserve of us only the remembrance of the conflagrations which illumined our retreat! At the same time a formidable army of Prussians menaces the Rhine, although we had been led to expect that their march would not be so immediate.

How comes it that this was the moment chosen to dismiss the popular ministers, to break the chain of their labours, to deliver up the empire to inexperienced hands, and to repudiate the measures we had found it our duty to propose? Can it be true that our triumphs are viewed with fear? Is it the blood of Coblentz, or yours, for which consideration is felt? Is it wished to reign over depopulated towns, over devastated fields? Where, in a word, are we? And you, deputies, what are you doing for the public safety?

You, whom they flatter themselves with having intimidated; you, whose consciences they think to alarm by stigmatising your patriotism as the spirit of faction, as if they had not called those factious who took the oath in the tennis-court; you, whom they have so calumniated because you are not of a haughty caste, which the constitution has humbled to the dust; you, upon whom they charge criminal designs, as if you, invested with a power alien to that of the law, had a civil list at disposal; you, whom, in their hypocritical moderation, they would have relax in attention to the dangers of the people; you, whom they have succeeded in dividing, but who, in this moment of peril, will lay aside your animosities, your miserable dissensions, and will not feel mutual hatred so sweet as to prefer the fiendish gratification to the safety of the country;—you, I say, listen to me: what are your resources?—what does necessity enjoin upon you?—what does the constitution permit you?"

During this exordium, vociferous cheers frequently drowned the voice of the speaker. He continued, and unfolded two orders of dangers, the one internal, the other external.

"To obviate internal dangers, the assembly proposed a decree against the priests; and whether that the genius of a Medicis still lingers under the arches of the Tuileries, or that a La Chaise or a Letellier still troubles the mind of the monarch, the decree was refused by the throne. It is not permitted us to believe, without doing wrong to the king, that he desires religious commotions. Therefore he deems himself sufficiently powerful—he finds sufficient in the old laws to secure public tranquillity. Let his ministers, then, answer for it with their heads, since they have the means of preserving it!

To obviate external dangers, the assembly had devised a reserve camp: the king rejected it. It would be an outrage on him to believe that he desired to deliver up France: he must, therefore, have armies sufficient to protect her: his ministers must answer to us with their heads for the safety of the country." Hitherto the orator restricts himself, as we see, to ministerial responsibility, and to investing it with a more threatening character. "But," he added, "it is not enough to hurl the ministers into the abyss their malignancy or their impotence may have prepared. I pray you listen to me with calmness; be not too hasty in interpreting my meaning."

At these words, attention was excited to the highest pitch; the deepest silence reigned in the assembly.

"It is in the name of the king," said he, "that the French princes have striven to rouse Europe; it is to vindicate the dignity of the king that the treaty of Pilnitz was concluded; it is to bring succour to the king that the sovereign of Bohemia and Hungary makes war upon us—that Prussia marches to our frontiers. Now, I read in the constitution: 'If the king puts himself at the head of an army, and directs its strength against the nation, or if he does not oppose, by a formal act, any such enterprise that may be undertaken in his name, he shall be adjudged to have abdicated the throne.'

What is a formal act of opposition? If a hundred thousand Austrians march upon Flanders, a hundred thousand Prussians upon Alsace, and the king opposes to them ten or twenty thousand men, would he perform a formal act of opposition?

If the king, being bound to notify impending hostilities, and well aware of the movements of the Prussian army, gave no knowledge thereof to the national assembly; if a camp of reserve, necessary to arrest

* This justice was allowed to Vergniaud by the Journal de Paris, then so well known for its opposition to the majority of the assembly, and for the high talents which presided over its editorial department, especially in the unfortunate and immortal André Chénier. (See the number of the 4th July 1792.)

† It is scarcely necessary to state that I analyse, and do not give the speech of Vergniaud in its precise words.

the progress of the enemy into the interior, were proposed, and the king substituted for it a plan ill-defined and tedious to execute; if the king left the command of an army to an intriguing general, suspected by the nation; if another general, reared far from the corruption of courts, and familiar with victory, demanded a reinforcement, and by a refusal of the king, the king virtually said to him, I enjoin thee not to conquer; can it be alleged that the king has given a formal act of opposition?

I have purposely exaggerated several points, to remove all pretext for applications purely hypothetical. But if, whilst France were swimming in blood, the king said to you, It is true that enemies pretend to act for me—for my dignity, for my rights; but I have proved that I was not their accomplice: I have brought armies into the field; these armies are too weak, but the constitution does not fix the amount of their strength; I have assembled them too tardily, but the constitution does not fix the period for their junction; I have stopped a general who was going to conquer, but the constitution does not enjoin victories; I have employed ministers who deceived the assembly and disorganised the government, but their nomination belonged to me; the assembly has passed useful decrees which I have not sanctioned, but I had a right so to do; I have done all that the constitution prescribes to me; it is not possible, therefore, to doubt my fidelity to it."

Vehement cheers burst from all sides. "If, then," he resumed, "the king held this language to you, would you not be justified in replying to him, 'Oh, king! who, like the tyrant Lysander, have held that truth was not more estimable than falsehood—who have feigned to love the laws only that you might preserve the power enabling you to brave them—was it defending us to oppose foreign soldiers with forces whose inferiority left not even a doubt as to their inevitable defeat? Was it defending us to discard the plans calculated to fortify the interior? Was it defending us to abstain from repressing a general who violated the constitution, and to chain down the courage of those who were serving it? Does the constitution leave you the choice of ministers for our prosperity or our ruin? Does it make you chief of the armies for our glory or our shame? Does it give you, in a word, the right of veto, a civil list, and so many high prerogatives, in order constitutionally to ruin the constitution and the empire? No! no! as a man whom the generosity of the French people has failed to touch with sensibility, whom the love of despotism alone can actuate, you are no longer fit for that constitution you have so unworthily violated—for that people whom you have so basely betrayed!'

"But, no," continued the orator; "if our armies be not complete, the king is doubtless not culpable; he will doubtless take the necessary measures to save us; doubtless the march of the Prussians will not be so triumphant as they anticipate; but, at the same time, it was essential to conceal nothing in apprehension or in speech, for frankness can alone save us."

Vergniaud concluded by proposing a message to Louis XVI., in firm but respectful language, which should compel him to choose between France and foreigners, and impress upon him that the French were resolved to perish or to triumph with the constitution. He recommended, furthermore, that the country should be pronounced in danger, in order to awaken in all hearts those lofty emotions which have often animated great nations, and which would be unquestionably found in the French people; "for it will not be," said he, "in the regenerated French of '89 that nature will show herself debased." He urged, in fine, that an end should be put to dissensions, the character of which was pregnant with gloomy forebodings, "and that those should be joined together who were in Rome and on Mount Aventine."

In pronouncing these last words, the voice of the orator faltered, and a general emotion prevailed. The galleries, the left side, the right side, the whole audience applauded. He quitted the tribune, and was surrounded by a crowd eager to congratulate him. He alone had hitherto ventured to speak in the assembly of the dethronement, which was talked of by every one in public, but he had only presented it in a hypothetical manner, and under forms still respectful, when compared with the language instigated by the passions of the time.

Dumas essayed to reply. He laboured under the disadvantage of speaking on the spur of the moment, after Vergniaud, and before auditors with minds still affected with all the sensations he had aroused. He repeatedly claimed silence and attention, which were as repeatedly refused to him. He lingered on the reproaches dealt out against the executive power. "The retreat of Luckner was owing," said he, "to the fortune of war, which cannot be regulated in the depths of cabinets. You certainly have confidence in Luckner?" "Yes! yes!" exclaimed all; and Kersaint forthwith proposed a resolution declaring that Luckner had preserved the national confidence. The resolution was passed, and Dumas continued. He alleged with reason, that if they had confidence in that general, they could not consider the motive of his retreat as criminal or suspicious; that as to the deficiency of force inveighed against, the marshal himself allowed that all the troops then disposable were collected for the enterprise in question; that besides, all the preparations must have been made by the late Girondist ministry, the authors of the offensive war, and that if the means were insufficient, the fault rested with that administration solely; that the new ministers could not repair all defects by a few couriers; and, finally, that they had given unlimited discretion to Luckner, and left him power to act according to circumstances and the nature of the country.

"The decree for the camp of twenty thousand men," added Dumas, "has been refused; but, in the first place, the ministers are not responsible for the veto; and, secondly, the plan which they have substituted is better than that proposed by the assembly, inasmuch as it does not paralyse the means of recruiting. The decree against the priests has been refused, but there is no need of new laws to secure the public tranquillity; nothing is required but peace, security, and respect for individual and religious liberty. Wherever those franchises have been held inviolable, the priests have not been seditious." Dumas concluded by justifying the king, under the allegation that he had not desired war, and Lafayette, by reminding his hearers that he had always been the friend of liberty.

The decree proposed by the commission of twelve, for regulating the measures consequent upon the country being declared in danger, was passed amidst vehement cheering. But the declaration itself was adjourned, because the assembly did not deem itself yet called upon to take that decisive step. The king, stimulated doubtless by all that had been said, notified to the assembly imminent hostilities on the part of Prussia, the proofs of which he grounded on the declaration of Pilnitz, on the welcome given to rebels, on the violences committed towards French merchants, on the dismissal of the French minister, and on the departure of the Prussian ambassador from Paris; in short, on the march of Prussian troops to the number of 52,000 men. "Every thing proves to me," added the king's message, "an alliance between Vienna and Berlin." (Much laughter was elicited by these words.) "In terms of the constitution, I give advice thereof to the legislative body." "Yes," replied several voices, "when the Prussians are at Coblentz!" The message was remitted to the commission of twelve.

The discussion upon the articles of the declaration of the country being in danger was resumed. The assembly decreed that this declaration should be considered as a simple proclamation, and consequently not subject to the royal sanction; a decision not particularly just, since the declaration was to involve legislative provisions. But, without venturing to proclaim it, the assembly already followed the law of public safety.

The controversies in the chamber became every day more envenomed. The hope of Vergniaud, as to uniting those in Rome and on Mount Aventine, was not realised; the fears reciprocally inspired were converted into irreconcilable hatred.

In the assembly was a deputy named Lamourette, constitutional Bishop of Lyons, who had ever viewed liberty but as a return to primitive fraternity, and who was equally afflicted and astonished at the divisions amongst his colleagues. He had no idea of a real hatred existing between them, but surmised that they were all labouring under groundless suspicions. On the 7th July, at the moment the debate on the danger of the country was about to be resumed, he claimed to be heard upon a motion of order; and addressing his colleagues in the most persuasive tone, and with the most benignant aspect, he said to them that every day propositions were submitted to them for the severest measures, intended to obviate the dangers of the country; but that, for his part, he put faith in milder and more efficacious means. It was the division amongst the representatives that caused all the evils; and to this dissension it was needful to apply a remedy. "Oh!" exclaimed the worthy pastor, "he who should succeed in uniting you, would be the veritable conqueror of Austria and Coblentz. It is daily said that your union is impossible in the present posture of affairs. Alas! I shudder to hear it!—but it is a calumny. Nothing is irreconcilable but vice and virtue. Honest men dispute with warmth, because they are sincerely convinced of the rectitude of their opinions; but they cannot hate each other. Gentlemen, the public safety is in your hands; what retards you from accomplishing it?

What do the two parties in the assembly charge upon each other? One accuses the other of designing to modify the constitution by means of foreigners, and the latter accuses the first of designing to overthrow the monarchy to establish a republic. Well, my friends, hurl one and the same anathema at the republic and the two chambers—devote them both to common execration by a last and irrevocable oath! Let us swear to have but one spirit, one sentiment; let us swear an eternal fraternity! Let the enemy know that what we determine is the determination of all, and the country is saved!"

The speaker had scarcely concluded these words, than the two sides of the assembly were on their feet, applauding his generous sentiments, and eager to throw off the weight of their respective animosities. Amidst universal acclamation, they devoted to public execration every project for altering the constitution, either by two chambers or by a republic, and then flew from the opposing benches to embrace each other. Those who had attacked and those who had defended Lafayette, the veto, and the civil list—the factious and the traitors—were clasped in each other's arms; all differences were merged; and Pastoret and Condorcet were seen in a close embrace, although they had but the day before indulged in reciprocal abuse in the public prints. There was no longer a right side or a left side; and all the deputies took their seats without distinction of place or party: Dumas was by the side of Bazire, Jaucourt close to Merlin, and Ramond to Chabot.

It was immediately resolved that the provinces, the army, and the king, should be informed of this happy event. A deputation, headed by Lamourette, repaired to the palace. Lamourette shortly returned to announce the king's approach, who was coming; as on the 4th February 1790, to testify his gratification to the assembly, and tell it that he could not brook the delay of a deputation, since it retarded his being in the midst of the representatives.

The enthusiasm was carried to the highest pitch by these words; and, if the unanimous acclamation were to be credited, the country was saved. Were there then a king and eight hundred deputies forming on the instant a scheme for mutual deception, and hypocritically feigning an oblivion of wrongs for the purpose of afterwards betraying each other with more certainty? No, unquestionably not; such a scheme is not formed by so large a body of men, suddenly, and without premeditation. But hatred is oppressive to the mind, and it is sweet to cast off the encumbrance. Besides, with reference to the most threatening emergencies, which was the party that, in the uncertainty of victory, would not have willingly consented to maintain the present, such as it was, provided it were well assured? This scene proves, as well as many others, that distrust and apprehension produced all the animosities, that a moment of confidence dispelled them, and that the party which was called republican did not look towards a republic from principle but from despair. Why, when he had returned to the palace, did not the king write without a moment's delay to Austria and Prussia? Why did he not join to that secret proceeding some public and decisive measure? Why did he not say, like his ancestor Louis XIV., at the approach of the enemy, "We will all go!"

But the same evening, the result of the proceedings instituted by the department against Pétion and Manuel was communicated to the assembly, and this result was the suspension of those two magistrates. From what has been since ascertained, and from the mouth of Pétion himself, it is probable he might have prevented the movement of the 20th June, more especially as he prevented others at a later date. Still his connivance with the agitators was not then authenticated, but it was strongly suspected; in addition to which, he was open to the charge of certain infractions of the law, as, for example, of having purposely studied delay in his communications to the different authorities, and of having permitted the council of the commune to pass a resolution in opposition to that of the department, by deciding that the petitioners should be received into the ranks of the national guard. The suspension pronounced by the department was consequently legal and energetic, but impolitic. After the reconciliation of that morning, was there not in reality great imprudence in signifying, the same evening, the suspension of two magistrates enjoying such boundless popularity? True, the king referred the matter to the assembly, but that body did not conceal its dissatisfaction, and surlily remitted the decision to his own judgment. The galleries recommenced their accustomed cries; numerous petitions were presented with the burden of "Pétion or death;" and the deputy Grangeneuve, whose person had been insulted, demanded a report against the author of the outrage. Thus the reconciliation was already forgotten. Brissot, whose turn had come to speak on the question of the public danger, asked for time to modify the terms of his speech, on account of the reconciliation that had taken place since he had prepared it. Nevertheless, he was unable to restrain himself from recapitulating all the crimes of negligence and tardiness laid to the charge of the court; and, despite the chimerical harmony, he concluded by demanding that the question of forfeiture should be solemnly discussed; the ministers impeached for having so reluctantly notified the hostilities of Prussia; a secret committee appointed, composed of seven members, and charged to watch over the public safety; the possessions of emigrants exposed to sale; the organisation of the national guards accelerated; and, finally, the declaration made without delay of The country in danger.

Intelligence was at the same period brought of the conspiracy of Dussaillant, a member of the old nobility, who, at the head of some insurgents, had seized upon the fortress of Bannes, in the department of L'Ardèche, and kept all the surrounding country in alarm. The dispositions of the powers were likewise detailed to the assembly by the ministry. The house of Austria, drawing Prussia into its snares, had determined that power to march against France, although the disciples of Frederick the Great murmured against the impolitic alliance. The electorates were all open or secret enemies. Russia had been the first to declare against the revolution; she had acceded to the treaty of Pilnitz, had stimulated the projects of Gustavus, and assisted the emigrants; all which was designed to mislead Austria and Prussia, and to impel them both upon France, whilst she pursued her schemes against Poland. At present, she was negotiating with the Counts de Nassau and d'Esterhazy, emigrant leaders; but, notwithstanding her ostentatious promises, she had simply granted them a frigate, to get rid of their presence at St Petersburg. Sweden was quiet since the death of Gustavus, and received French vessels. Denmark promised a strict neutrality. France might consider herself at war with the court of Turin. The pope was preparing his thunderbolts. Venice was neutral, but seemed disposed to cover Trieste with its fleets. Spain, without openly joining in the coalition, gave no symptom of an intention to fulfil the family compact, and to render to France the aid she had often received. England was bound to neutrality, and gave fresh assurances of it. The United States would gladly assist France with all their might, but were unable to afford the most trifling aid, from their distance and the paucity of their population.

Upon this picture being laid before it, the assembly was anxious instantly to declare the country in danger; but on reflection, the declaration was delayed for a new report from all the committees united. On the 11th July, after hearing such reports, in the midst of an awful silence, the president pronounced the solemn declaration:—"CITIZENS! THE COUNTRY IS IN DANGER!"

From this moment the sittings were declared permanent; minute guns announced the momentous crisis; all the municipalities, all the district and departmental councils, sat without intermission; all the national guards put themselves in motion. Amphitheatres were erected in the middle of the public squares, and municipal officers received there on a table, supported by drums, the names of those who came to enrol themselves as volunteers. The enrolments amounted to fifteen thousand in one day.

The reconciliation of the 7th July, and the oath which accompanied it, had failed, as we have seen, to dissipate any one suspicion. The necessity of guarding against the schemes of the palace was still the prevailing sentiment; and the idea of declaring the king dethroned, or of forcing him to abdicate, was present to all minds as the only possible remedy for the calamities which impended over France. Vergniaud had but alluded to that course, and in a hypothetical form; others, and especially the deputy Torné, insisted that the supposition of Vergniaud should be held as a positive proposition. Petitions from all parts of France arrived to give the aid of public opinion to that desperate resource of the patriotic deputies.

The city of Marseilles had already sent a threatening petition, read in the assembly on the 19th June, and reported above. At the period the country was declared in danger, several others were presented. One asked for the impeachment of Lafayette, the suppression of the veto in certain cases, the reduction of the civil list, and the reinstatement of Manuel and Pétion in their municipal functions. Another demanded, with the suppression of the veto, the publicity of council meetings. But the town of Marseilles, which had given the first example of these daring remonstrances, soon proceeded to still greater audacity. It transmitted an address in which it urged the assembly to abolish royalty in the reigning branch, and to substitute for it a royalty elective and without a veto—that is to say, a mere executive magistracy, as in republics. Amazement stunned the assembly for a moment as these sentiments were read aloud; but it was speedily aroused by the bravoes of the galleries, and a motion for printing made by one of the members. But the address was referred to the commission of twelve, to receive the application of the law which declared infamous every project for altering the constitution.

Consternation, meanwhile, pervaded the palace; nor was it unfelt by the patriot party, which spirited petitions were far from altogether encouraging. The king believed that designs were formed against his person; he considered that the 20th June was a foiled project of assassination, which was assuredly a grievous error, for nothing would have been more easy than the perpetration of such a crime, if it had been projected. Fearing poison, he and his family took their meals with a lady on confidential terms with the queen, where they partook of other food than that prepared in the kitchens of the palace.* As the day of the federation drew nigh, the queen got prepared for the king a cuirass, composed of quiltings of stuff capable of resisting the sudden stab of a dagger However, as time passed away, and the popular audacity increased, without any attempt at assassination being detected, the king began more fully to comprehend the nature of his danger; he already discerned that it was no longer the point of a dagger, but a judicial condemnation he had to fear; and the fate of

* Madame Campan gives an interesting statement respecting the fears of the royal family, which is as follows:—

"The spies of M. de Laporte, intendant of the civil list, apprised him, about the end of 1791, that a man belonging to the king's offices, who had established himself as a confectioner in the Palais-Royal, was about to enter upon the duties of his post, which the death of a former holder had secured to him by reversion; that he was so desperate a Jacobin as to have daringly stated, that a great benefit would be conferred on France if the king's days were shortened. His functions were confined simply to the details of confectionery; he was narrowly watched by the culinary superintendants, persons perfectly devoted to his majesty; but a subtle poison may be so easily introduced into dishes, that it was decided the king and queen should no longer eat of any thing but roasts; that their bread should be brought by M. Thierry de Ville d'Avray, intendant of the private apartments, who should likewise take upon himself to provide wine. The king was fond of pastry, and I had directions to order supplies, as if for myself, first from one confectioner, and then from another. The soft sugar was, likewise, kept in my room. The king, the queen, and the Princess Elizabeth, took their meals together, and no one remained in waiting. They had each a dumb-waiter of mahogany, and a little bell to summon attendance when they desired it. M. Thierry came himself to deliver to me their majesties' bread and wine, and I locked those articles in a private closet in the king's cabinet, on the ground floor. As soon as the king was seated at table, I carried to him the pastry and the bread. Every thing was concealed under the table, lest there should be any need for calling in the servants. The king thought that it was as dangerous as distressing, to evince this fear of attempts against his life, and this distrust of the cookery department. As he never drank a whole bottle of wine at his repasts (the princesses drank nothing but water), he filled that from which he had drunk nearly half up from the bottle furnished by the officers of his butlery. I carried it away after dinner. Although they partook of no pastry but that which I had brought, they took care, in the same manner, to make it appear as if they had eaten of that served at table. The lady who succeeded me, found this secret service organised, and executed it in like manner: these details were never known in public, nor the apprehensions which had given rise to them. At the end of three or four months, the advices brought by the same spies, were to the effect that this sort of plot against the king's life was no longer to be feared; that the plan was entirely changed; and that the blows intended would be as much directed against the throne as the person of the monarch."—Memoirs of Madame Campan, vol. ii. p. 188.

Charles I. continually haunted his agonised imagination.

Although repulsed by the court, Lafayette had not the less resolved to save the king, and he caused a project of flight to be submitted to him, very boldly conceived. He had, in the first place, made sure of Luckner, and even wrung from the simple-minded old marshal a promise to march upon Paris. In consequence, Lafayette recommended that the king should procure an order for him and Luckner to visit Paris, under the pretext of having their presence at the federation. The appearance of two generals seemed to him calculated to overawe the people, and prevent all the dangers apprehended upon that day. On the morrow of the ceremony, he urged that Louis XVI. should publicly leave Paris, under pretext of going to Compiègne, in order to give a proof of his liberty to all Europe. In case of resistance, he asked for but five* devoted cavaliers to carry him out of Paris. From Compiègne, squadrons duly stationed would convey him to the midst of the French armies, where Lafayette would trust to his probity for the preservation of the new institutions. Finally, in case none of these plans succeeded, the general was determined to march upon Paris with all his forces.†

Either because this project required too great a stretch of boldness on the part of the king, or because the repugnance of the queen for Lafayette prevented

* [It is probable that this is a misprint in the French edition for "fifty."]

† When M. de Lafayette was imprisoned at Olmütz, M. de Lally-Tolendal wrote a very eloquent letter in his behalf to the King of Prussia. He there enumerated all that the general had done to save Louis XVI., and gave proofs in support. Amongst the documents he adduced are the following letters, which make known the plans and the efforts of the constitutionalists at this period:—

COPY OF A LETTER FROM M. DE LALLY-TOLENDAL TO THE KING.

"Paris, 9th July 1792, Monday.

I am authorised by M. de Lafayette, to propose directly to his majesty, for the 15th of this month, the same project he had proposed for the 12th, and which cannot be executed at that period since the engagement contracted by his majesty to be present at the ceremony of the 14th.

His majesty must have seen the project as sent by M. de Lafayette, for M. Duport was to carry it to M. Montciel, in order that he might show it to his majesty.

M. de Lafayette purposes being here on the 15th, together with old General Luckner. They have recently seen each other, have exchanged pledges, and have but one sentiment and one plan.

They propose that his majesty publicly leaves the city between them, previously writing to the National Assembly, assuring it that he will not overstep the constitutional line, and stating that he was proceeding to Compiègne.

His majesty and all the royal family will be in a single carriage. A hundred trusty horsemen to escort it will be easily found. The Swiss, in emergency, and a part of the national guard, will protect the departure. The two generals will remain near his majesty. When arrived at Compiègne, he will have as a guard a detachment from that town, which is excellent in spirit, one from the capital, which will be picked, and one from the army.

M. de Lafayette, all his fortresses being garrisoned as well as his reserve-camp, has disposable for this purpose in his army ten squadrons and the horse-artillery. Two forced marches can bring all this division to Compiègne.

If, contrary to all probability, his majesty be prevented leaving the city, the laws being then evidently violated, the two generals will march upon the capital with an army.

The consequences of this project are manifest:—

Peace with all Europe through the mediation of the king;

The king re-established in all his legitimate power;

A large and necessary extension of his sacred prerogatives;

A real monarchy, a real monarch, a real state of liberty;

A real national representation, of which the king will be the head and an integral part;

A real executive power;

A real national representation, chosen from those holding property;

The Constitution revised, abolished in part, and in part amended, and established on a better basis;

The new legislative body holding its sittings only three months in the year;

The old nobility reinstated in its former privileges, not political but civil, dependent on opinion, such as titles, arms, liveries, &c.

In fulfilling my commission, I dare not allow myself to proffer either counsel or reflection. My imagination is too keenly alive to the rage which will seize upon all those bewildered heads at the first town which shall be taken from us, not to doubt even of myself; so much so, indeed, that the scene of Saturday, which seems so tranquillising to many persons, has doubled my solicitude. All these kisses have reminded me of Judas.

I merely ask to be one of the eighty or a hundred horsemen who shall escort his majesty, if he sanction the project; and I flatter myself, I do not need to assure him that he will not be reached, nor any member of his royal family, except over my corpse.

I will add one word: I was the friend of M. de Lafayette before the revolution. I broke off all intercourse with him after the 22d March of the second year; at that epoch I wished him to be what he is now; I wrote to him, that his duty, honour, and interest, all prescribed to him that course; I detailed to him, at length, the plan such as my conscience suggested to me. He promised me; I saw no result from his promise. I will not speculate whether it were owing to incapacity or evil purpose; I became a stranger to him; I declared to him my sentiments, and from none could he have ever heard more severe truths than from me and my friends, who were also his. At present, these same friends have reopened my correspondence with him. His majesty knows what has been the object and the nature of that correspondence. I have seen his letters; I have had a two-hours' conference with him the night before he left Paris. He acknowledges his errors; he is ready to devote his energies for liberty, but, at the same time, for the monarchy; he will immolate himself, if it be necessary, for his country and his king, two objects he no longer separates; he is imbued, in short, with the principles I have laid down in this note; he gives himself wholly to them, with candour, conviction, feeling, fidelity to the king, oblivion of self; I answer for it on my faith.

I forgot to say he requests that nothing of this shall be discussed with those officers who may be in the capital at this moment. All may suspect that there are certain projects in agitation; but not one is acquainted with the actual design. It will be enough that they know it on the morning of execution; he fears indiscretion, if it be mentioned to them beforehand, and none of them is excepted from the scope of this observation.

P.S.—I venture to remark, that this project appears to me proper to be meditated upon by him alone, who, on a day for ever memorable, vanquished by his heroic courage an entire army of assassins; by him who, on the morrow of that unexampled triumph, dictated a proclamation as sublime as his actions had been the day before; and not under the influence of the counsels which suggested the letter written in his name to the legislative body, announcing that he would be present at the ceremony of the 14th; not under the influence of counsels which induced him to sanction the decree upon feudal rights—a decree equivalent in criminality to a theft on the pocket or on the highway.

M. de Lafayette does not admit the idea that the king, once emerged from the capital, will be under any other direction than that of his conscience and free judgment. He conceives that the first operation of his majesty ought to be the creation of a guard for his person; he conceives, likewise, that his project may be modified in twenty different ways. He gives the preference to a retreat towards the north over one to the south, as being more in a capacity to afford succour on that side, and feeling apprehensive of the southern faction. In a word, the liberty of the king, and the destruction of the factions—such his objects in all the sincerity of his heart. What ought to follow, will follow."

COPY OF A LETTER FROM M. DE LAFAYETTE.

"8th July 1792.

I had disposed my army in such a manner, that my best squadrons of grenadiers, and the horse artillery, were under the orders of M——, in the fourth division; and if my proposition had been accepted, I would have marched fifteen squadrons, and eight pieces of ordnance, to Compiègne in two days, the rest of the army being placed in progressive stations at a march's interval; and every regiment, howsoever backward at first, would have come to my aid, if my comrades and I had been engaged.

I had overcome Luckner so far, as to make him promise to march on the capital with me, if the safety of the king required it, and he had given the necessary orders; and I have five squadrons of his army, of which I dispose absolutely, Languedoc him from accepting his aid, the king again refused it, and returned him a chilling answer, unbefitting the zeal evinced by the general. "The best advice," this answer bore, "to give M. de Lafayette, is to continue a terror to the factious, by ably performing his duty as a general."*

The day of the federation was approaching. The people and the assembly were clamorous that Pétion should not be wanting to the solemnity of the 14th. The king had already endeavoured to throw upon the assembly the task of approving or disapproving the sentence of the department, but the assembly, as we have seen, had constrained him to take the matter on himself, and it urged him day by day to make known his decision, in order that the question might be disposed of before the 14th. On the 12th the king confirmed the suspension. The intelligence of this event greatly increased the discontent. The assembly hastened to adopt a step in its turn, and it is not difficult to surmise its nature. The next day, that is to say, on the 13th, it reinstated Pétion. But, from a remnant of respect, it adjourned its decision relative to Manuel, who had been seen moving in the midst of the tumult on the 20th June, wrapped in his scarf, but making no use of his authority.

At length the 14th July 1792 arrived. How times were changed since the 14th July 1790! No longer that magnificent altar tended by three hundred priests; nor that vast plain covered by sixty thousand national guards, richly clad and regularly organised; nor those lateral tiers thronged by a countless multitude, exuand ——; the command of the horse artillery is also exclusively mine; I relied upon these also marching to Compiègne.

The king has come under an engagement to be present at the federal festival. I regret that my plan has not been adopted; but we must do the best with the one that has been preferred.

The steps which I have taken, the adhesion of several departments and communes, that of M. Luckner, my influence over my army, and even over the other troops, my popularity in the kingdom, which is rather augmented than diminished, although much contracted in the capital; all these circumstances, combined with several others, have given cause of anxiety to the factious, by putting honest men on the alert, and I hope that the physical dangers of the 14th July are much reduced. I think, indeed, that they will be nullified altogether if the king be accompanied by Luckner and myself, and surrounded by picked battalions, which I can get ready for him.

But if the king and his family remain in the capital, are they not still in the hands of the factious? We will lose the first battle; it is impossible to doubt it. The disaster will produce a great sensation in the capital. I say, moreover, that the bare supposition of a correspondence between the queen and the enemy, will suffice to provoke the last excesses. At the very least, the king will be carried to the south; for this idea, which is repudiated at present, will appear natural when the allied kings are approaching. I see plainly, therefore, that immediately after the 14th, a train of dangers will begin.

I once more repeat, the king must leave Paris. I am aware that if his good faith were not undoubted, such a course might have unpleasant consequences; but when we are asked to confide in the king, who is a man of honour, can we hesitate? I am tormented with a desire to see the king at Compiègne.

The two points, therefore, upon which my present project hangs, are as follow:—

1st, If the king has not yet summoned Luckner and me, it must be done forthwith. We have Luckner; and he must be committed more and more. He will say, we are identified together; I will say all the rest. Luckner can take me on his way, so that we may be in Paris on the evening of the 12th. The 13th and 14th may supply offensive chances; at all events, the defensive will be made sure by your presence, and who knows what effect mine may have on the national guard?

We will accompany the king to the altar of the country. The two generals, representing two armies known to be much attached to them, will hinder the outrages that might otherwise be attempted on the dignity of the king. As to myself, I may give fresh force to the habit which some have long had of obeying my voice; the terror I have always inspired in others since they became factious, and possibly some personal resources for taking advantage of a crisis, may render me useful, at least to ward off dangers. My request will be deemed the more disinterested, when the unpleasantness of my situation is viewed in comparison with the position I occupied on the grand federation; but I consider it as a sacred obligation to be with the king upon that occasion, and my mind is so decided in this respect, that I imperatively require the minister at war to summon me, and that this first part of my proposition be adopted, and I beg you to let it be known by common friends to the king, his family, and his council.

2dly, As to my second proposition, I believe it equally indispensable, and it is thus I explain it: the oath of the king, and ours, will have tranquillised all but the evil-minded, and the knaves will be for some days deprived of that pretext. I would suggest that the king write privately to M. Luckner and myself a letter common to both, and which would meet us on the way by the evening of the 11th or the morning of the 12th. The king will say in it, "That, after having taken our oath, means should be adopted to prove his sincerity to foreigners; that the best plan would be for him to pass a few days at Compiègne, where he charges us to have in readiness some squadrons to join the national guard of the place and a detachment from the capital; that we are to accompany him to Compiègne, whence we will rejoin our armies; that he desires us to select squadrons whose officers are known for their attachment to the constitution, and a general-officer, who is likewise above all doubt on that head."

In compliance with this letter, Luckner and I will intrust M—— with this expedition; he will take with him four pieces of artillery—eight, if desired; but it is necessary the king should not speak of this, because the odium of the cannon must be borne by us. On the 15th, at ten in the forenoon, the king should go to the assembly, accompanied by Luckner and me; and whether we may have a battalion, or only fifty horsemen, persons devoted to the king or friends, we shall see if the king, the royal family, Luckner, and me, will be stopped.

I will suppose that we are stopped. Luckner and I would return to the assembly to exclaim against the proceeding, and menace it with our armies. And if the king has to turn back, his position will not be a whit the worse, for he will not have departed from the constitution; he will have against him only the enemies of that constitution, and Luckner and I might easily draw detachments from Compiègne. Observe, that this does not endanger the king nearly so much as he must necessarily be by the events in preparation.

The funds of which the king can dispose have been so wasted in aristocratic imbecilities, that doubtless little remains in store. But there is no question he might borrow enough, if it be necessary, to take advantage of the three days of the federation.

There is also another thing to anticipate, namely, a decree of the assembly, that the generals are not to enter the capital. This difficulty can be obviated by the king promptly refusing his sanction.

If, by an inconceivable fatality, the king has already given his sanction, and, appointing us to meet him at Compiègne, he should be stopped on setting off, we would open for him the means of coming thither free and triumphant. It is needless to observe, that, under all circumstances, once arrived at Compiègne, he will there establish his personal guard such as the constitution gives him.

I assure you that when I see myself surrounded by inhabitants of the country, who come ten leagues and more to see me, and to swear that they have no confidence but in me, that my friends and foes are theirs; when I see myself beloved by my army, over which the efforts of the Jacobins have no influence; when I see proofs of adhesion to my opinions arrive from all parts of the kingdom, I cannot deem all to be lost, or that I have no means of rendering myself useful.

* The following answer is taken from the collection of documents mentioned in the preceding note:—

ANSWER HOLOGRAPH OF THE KING.

"He must be answered that I am infinitely sensible of the attachment for me which would urge him to take so prominent a part, but that the mode appears to me impracticable. It is not from personal fear, but all would be at stake at once, and, whatever he may say, this project failing, would render all things worse than ever, and more and more under the rod of the factious. Fontainebleau is but a blocked alley, it would be a bad retreat; and to the south, to the north, would seem as if going to meet the Austrians. As to the summons to Paris, he will have an answer; consequently, I have nothing to say here. The presence of the generals at the federation might be advantageous: it might, besides, have for motive the seeing the new minister, and arranging with him for the wants of the army. The best advice to give M. de Lafayette is to continue a terror to the factious, by ably performing his duty as a general. He will thereby secure more and more the confidence of his army, and will be enabled to make use of it as he may desire in emergency."

berant with joy and pleasure; nor that balcony where the ministers, the royal family, and the assembly, appeared at the first federation! All was changed. Hatred usurped all hearts as after a faithless reconciliation; and all the emblems proclaimed inveterate hostility. Eighty-three tents represented the eighty-three departments. By the side of each was a poplar, from the summit of which floated tricoloured streamers. A large pavilion was appropriated to the assembly and the king, and another to the administrative bodies of Paris. Thus all France seemed as if encamped in the presence of the enemy. The altar of the country was nothing but a stunted column, placed on the top of those steps which still remained in the Champ de Mars since the period of the first ceremony. On one side was seen a monument to those who were dead, or going to die on the frontiers; on the other, an immense tree called the tree of feudalism. It arose from the midst of a vast pile, and bore on its boughs coronets, blue ribbons, tiaras, cardinals' hats, the keys of St Peter, ermine mantles, doctors' caps, lawyers' bags, patents of nobility, escutcheons, coats-of-arms, et cetera. The king was to be invited to apply the torch.

The oath was appointed to be taken at mid-day. The king had repaired to the rooms of the Military School, and there awaited the national procession, which had gone to lay the foundation-stone of a column intended to be reared on the site of the Bastille. The king preserved a calm dignity, and the queen strove to suppress emotions only too visible. The king's sister and his children accompanied them. Those present in the rooms were moved by some affecting expressions, and tears moistened the eyes of more than one of them. At last the procession made its appearance. Hitherto the Champ de Mars had been almost empty, when the crowd suddenly poured into it. Beneath the balcony on which the king was placed, women, children, and drunken men, rushed pell-mell past, vociferating "Pétion! Pétion or death!" and bearing on their hats the words they had on their lips. Then came federalists arm-in-arm, carrying a model of the Bastille, and a press, with which they stopped from time to time to throw off and distribute patriotic ballads. After them appeared the legions of the national guard and regiments of the line, maintaining with difficulty the order of their ranks amidst this rolling populace; lastly, the authorities and the assembly. The king then descended, and, stationed in the centre of a square of troops, he walked with the procession to the altar of the country. The crowd was prodigious in the middle of the Champ de Mars, and permitted but a very slow advance. After great exertions on the part of the regiments, the king reached the steps of the altar. The queen, still standing on the balcony the king had left, viewed the whole scene with an eye-glass. The tumult seemed to increase an instant about the altar, and the king to fall down a step: at this sight the queen uttered a piercing cry, and terrified all around her. However, the ceremony was concluded without any accident. Scarcely had the oath been taken, than a general rush was made towards the tree of feudalism. The people desired to draw the king there, in order that he might set fire to it; but he rid himself of their clamours by objecting very appositely that there was no longer any feudalism. He thereupon resumed his march towards the Military School. The troops, overjoyed at having saved him, uttered reiterated cries of "Long live the king!" The multitude, always irresistibly acted upon by the spirit of sympathy, also took up those cries, and was thus as prompt to cheer the monarch as it had been a few moments before to insult him. The unfortunate Louis XVI. appeared beloved a few hours more; the people and himself believed it for a moment; but even illusions were become faint and evanescent, and it was already no longer possible to gloss over the mutual distrust. The king returned to the palace, gratified at having escaped from perils he deemed great, but in deep sadness at those he descried in the distance.

The news which came every day from the frontiers redoubled alarm and agitation. The declaration of The country in danger had put all France in commotion, and accelerated the departure of numerous federalists. There were only two thousand of them at Paris on the day of the federation; but they were incessantly arriving, and their manner of conducting themselves justified at once the fears and the hopes that their anticipated presence in the capital had excited. All volunteers, they were composed of the most hot-brained spirits in the clubs of France. The assembly ordered them an allowance of thirty sous a-day, and reserved the galleries for them exclusively. They soon imposed law upon the legislative body itself by their shouts and cheers. Associated with the Jacobins, and gathered into a club, which in a few days surpassed all the rest in violence, they were ready to rise in insurrection at the first signal. They even stated so in an address presented to the assembly. They would not depart, they said, until the internal enemies were silenced. Thus the plan for collecting at Paris an insurrectional force was, despite the opposition of the court, completely realised.

To this resource were added others. The soldiers of the former French guards were distributed amongst the regiments; the assembly ordained that they should be united into a corps of gendarmerie. Their tendencies were of course well appreciated, for they had commenced the revolution. It was vainly objected that those soldiers, being almost all non-commissioned officers in the army, composed its main strength. The assembly listened to no remonstrances, fearing the enemy at home infinitely more than the one outside. After having formed its own forces, it was expedient to decompose those of the court, for which purpose the assembly ordered the removal of all regiments. So far it was within the terms of the constitution; but not contented with expelling them, it enjoined them to betake themselves to the frontiers, and in this it usurped the disposing power of the king over the public force.

The object of this measure was more particularly to remove the Swiss, whose fidelity could not be doubted. To ward this blow, the minister put in motion M. d'Affry, their commanding officer. He appealed to the terms of his engagement as a warrant for refusing to quit Paris. The assembly made a show of taking the reasons he adduced into serious consideration, but ordered in the meanwhile the departure of two Swiss battalions.

It is true the king had his veto as an opposition to these measures, but all his influence was prostrated, and he was no longer in a capacity to exert his prerogative. The assembly itself could not always resist the motions brought forward by certain of its members, and vigorously supported by the applauding shouts of the galleries. It never failed to declare for moderation when possible; and if it yielded to measures of a highly insurrectional character on the one hand, it was found approving and welcoming petitions of a moderate tendency on the other.

But the measures adopted, the petitions presented, and the tenor of all conversations, gave token of an approaching revolution. The Girondists both foresaw and desired it, without, however, clearly discerning the means or being easy as to the issue. Those below them complained of their inertness, and accused them of effeminacy and incapacity. The leaders of the clubs and sections, weary of an unproductive eloquence, called in violent terms for an active and precise direction to the popular efforts, in order that they might not prove for ever fruitless. At the Jacobin Club was a room set apart for the management of correspondence, and a central committee of federalists was there installed to deliberate and arrange in concert. To secure greater secrecy and energy to its resolutions, this committee was limited to five members, and received the name of the Insurrectional Committee. These five members were Vaugeois, a grand vicar; Debessé, from La Drôme; Guillaume, a professor at Caen; Simon, a journalist at Strasburg; and Galissot, from Langres. To these were shortly added Carra, Gorsas, Fournier the American, Westermann, Kienlin of Strasburg, Santerre; Alexandre, commander of the Faubourg St Marceau; a Pole named Lazouski, captain of artillery in the battalion of the same St Marceau; Antoine of Metz, an ex-member of the Constituent Assembly, and two electors, Lagrey and Garin. Manuel, Camille-Desmoulins, and Danton, were subsequently united with them, and exercised a paramount influence over their colleagues.* The committee thus constituted was in confederacy with Barbaroux, who promised the co-operation of his Marseillese, whose arrival at Paris was impatiently expected. It was in communication, also, with Pétion the mayor, and obtained from him a pledge not to interfere with the insurrection. It promised him in return that his house should be guarded, and himself detained in it, so that his inaction might be justified by an appearance of constraint if the enterprise were not successful. The plan definitively fixed upon was to resort in arms to the palace, and depose the king. For its execution, the populace must be stimulated to movement, and some extraordinary circumstance was indispensable to effect this essential point. Exertions were made with this view, and the subject was anxiously discussed at the Jacobins'.

There the deputy Chabot expatiated, with all the ardour of his temperament, on the necessity of a grand resolution; and said, it was greatly to be desired that the court should attempt the life of a deputy. Grangeneuve, himself a deputy, heard this oration: he was a man of mediocre intellect, but of an enthusiastic character. He took Chabot aside. "You are right," said he; "it is necessary that a deputy should be sacrificed, but the court is too sly to afford us so excellent a pretext. It must be done for it, and I killed as soon as possible in the vicinity of the palace. Preserve secrecy, and prepare the means of execution." Chabot, roused to enthusiasm, offered to share his fate. Grangeneuve agreed, saying that two deaths would make a greater sensation than one. They settled the day, the hour, and the means for getting killed and not maimed, as they said, and separated, resolved to sacrifice themselves for the benefit of the common cause. Grangeneuve, who was fully bent on keeping his word, put his private affairs in order, and at half-past ten in the evening walked to the place of meeting. Chabot was not there. He waited. Still Chabot came not, and he concluded that he had changed his determination, but trusted that the murder would be at least perpetrated on himself. He promenaded to and fro for some time, awaiting the mortal blow; but was ultimately obliged to return home safe and sound, much chagrined that he had been disappointed in laying down his life to feed a calumny.*

The occasion, then, so anxiously desired was not forthcoming, and mutual accusations passed of lack of courage, capacity, and unity of purpose. The Girondist deputies, the mayor Pétion, and, in fact, all the more eminent personages who, either in the tri-

* DETAIL OF THE EVENTS OF THE 10TH AUGUST.

This is taken from a document signed "Carra," and entitled, "An Historical and exact Commentary upon the Origin and the real Authors of the celebrated Insurrection of the 10th August, which saved the Republic." The author affirms that the mayor had not the smallest share in its success, but that he was where he should be upon the occasion, showing himself an undoubted guardian to the patriots. The piece itself is found in the "Political Annals" for the 30th of November.

"'The men,' said Jerome Pétion, in his excellent speech upon the impeachment moved against Maximilian Robespierre, 'who have taken to themselves the glory of that day, are those to whom it least belongs. It is due to those who prepared it; it is due to the inevitable nature of things; it is due to the brave federalists and their secret directory, who long before concerted the plan of the insurrection; it is due, in short, to the tutelary genius which has constantly presided over the destinies of France since the first meeting of her representatives.'

It is concerning this secret directory, of which Jerome Pétion speaks, that I am about to speak in my turn, both as a member of that directory and as an actor in all its proceedings. This secret directory was formed by the central committee of federalists, which met in the correspondence-room at the Jacobins, Rue Saint-Honoré. It was from the forty-three members who had daily assembled in that room from the beginning of July, that five were selected for the directory of insurrection. Those five members were Vaugeois, grand-vicar of the Bishop of Blois; Debessé, from the department of La Drôme; Guillaume, professor at Caen; Simon, a journalist from Strasburg; and Galissot, from Langres. I was added to these five members, at the very period of the formation of the directory; and a few days afterwards they invited to it Fournier, the American; Westermann; Kienlin, from Strasburg; Santerre; Alexandre, commander of the Faubourg Saint-Marceau; Lazouski, captain of the artillery of Saint-Marceau; Antoine, from Metz, an ex-constituent; Lagrey; and Garin, an elector of 1789.

The first meeting of this directory was held in a small tavern, the Golden Sun, in the street Saint-Antoine, near the Bastille, during the night between Thursday and Friday, 26th July, after the civic festival given to the federalists on the site of the Bastille. The patriot Gorsas also appeared in the tavern, which we left at two in the morning to proceed to the column of liberty on the site of the Bastille, and there to die, if necessary, for the country. It was in this tavern of the Golden Sun that Fournier, the American, brought us the red flag, the adoption of which I had proposed, and on which I had caused these words to be inscribed, Martial law proclaimed by the sovereign people against the rebellion of the executive power.' It was likewise to this tavern that I carried five copies of a placard, whereon were these words, 'Those who fire on the columns of the people shall be instantly put to death.' This placard, which was printed at Buisson the publisher's, had been taken to Santerre's house, whence I went to fetch it at midnight. Our plan failed this time through the prudence of the mayor, who felt doubtless that we were not sufficiently prepared at this moment; and the second active sitting of the directory was adjourned to the 4th August.

Nearly the same persons attended that sitting, and, in addition, Camille-Desmoulins; it was held at the Cadran-Bleu, on the Boulevards; and at eight in the evening, it was transferred to the room of Antoine, the ex-constituent, Rue Saint-Honoré, opposite the Assumption, in the very house where Robespierre resides. Robespierre's landlady was so alarmed at this conclave, that she came, about eleven o'clock at night, to ask Antoine if it were his object to get Robespierre murdered. 'If any one is to be murdered,' said Antoine, 'we will be the victims, doubtless; Robespierre has nothing to do with the matter—he has only to keep himself in concealment.'

It was in this second active sitting that I wrote out, with my own hand, the entire plan of the insurrection, the march of the columns, and the attack on the palace. Simon made a copy of this plan, and we sent it to Santerre and Alexandre about midnight; but our project miscarried a second time, because Santerre and Alexandre were not yet sufficiently prepared, and several wished to wait for the debate fixed for the 10th August on the suspension of the king.

Lastly, the third active sitting of this directory was held during the night of the 9th and 10th August last, precisely as the tocsin was rung, and in three different places at once, namely, Fournier the American, with some others, at the Faubourg Saint-Marceau; Westermann, Santerre, and two others, at the Faubourg Saint-Antoine; Garin, the Strasburg journalist, and I, in the Marseillese Barrack, and in the very chamber of the commander, where we were seen by the whole battalion.

From this account, which is strictly accurate, and which I defy any one whomsoever to impugn in the smallest particular, it is seen that nothing was heard of Marat, or of Robespierre, or of many others, who want to pass as actors in that enterprise; and that those who alone are justified in directly assuming the glory of the famous 10th August, are such as I have named, and who formed the secret directory of the federalists."

* [This extraordinary anecdote is related somewhat differently, and with more spirit, by Madame Roland in her Memoirs, called "An Appeal to impartial Posterity," under the head of Grangeneuve.]

bune or in their official stations, felt it incumbent to speak the language of the law, shrunk more aside, and condemned these continual agitations, which compromised them without leading to any result. They reproached the subordinate agitators with exhausting their strength in partial and useless movements, which exposed the people without producing a decisive consequence. These latter, on the contrary, who were doing in their respective spheres all they could, retorted upon the deputies and the mayor on account of their public discourses, and accused them of restraining the energy of the people. Thus the deputies blamed the mass for not being organised, and it threw back the allegation upon themselves. The want of a leader was the great necessity of the moment. "A man is needed!" was the universal cry: but who? None was eligible amongst the deputies. They were all orators rather than conspirators; and, besides, their rank and course of life removed them too far from the multitude which it was necessary to influence. The same objection applied to Roland, Servan, and all those men whose courage was indisputable, but whom their stations elevated too much above the people. Pétion might, from the nature of his functions, have more easily communicated with the populace; but Pétion was cold, stiff, and more fitted to endure than to act. His system consisted in discountenancing petty movements for the advantage of a decisive insurrection; but by pursuing it too rigorously, he threw obstacles in the way of every manifestation, and lost all favour with the agitators, whom he paralysed without overawing. They required a leader who, not having yet emerged from the ranks of the populace, had not lost all influence over it, and had received from nature the rare faculty of swaying others.

A vast field for activity had opened in the clubs, the sections, and the revolutionary press. Numbers had gained notoriety, but none had acquired a marked superiority. Camille-Desmoulins was distinguished for his vehemence, his cynicism, his audacity, and his promptitude in assailing all those who seemed to grow lukewarm in the revolutionary career. He was well known to the lowest classes; but he had neither the lungs necessary for a popular speaker, nor the activity and stimulating power indispensable for a party leader.

Another journalist had obtained a fearful celebrity. This was Marat, known under the name of "The Friend of the People," and, from his exhortations to murder, an object of horror to all who still preserved any respect for moderation. Born at Neufchâtel, and devoted to the study of the physical and medical sciences, he had daringly attacked the best-established systems, and evinced an activity of mind partaking of the convulsive, so to speak. He was veterinary surgeon in the stables of the Count d'Artois when the revolution commenced.* He rushed unhesitatingly into the new career it presented, and soon made himself remarkable in his section. His height was below the middle standard, his head of great bulk, his features strongly marked, his complexion sallow, his eyes fiery, his person slovenly. He would have been looked upon as something merely ludicrous or hideous; but from that strange form were suddenly heard issuing fantastic and atrocious doctrines, urged in a harsh accent, and with a vulgar familiarity. It was necessary to strike off several thousands of heads, he was wont to say, and to exterminate all the aristocrats who rendered liberty impossible. Marks of abhorrence and contempt cumulated around him. He was hooted, his feet trod upon, his miserable appearance derided; but, accustomed to scientific contests, and to uphold the most singular paradoxes, he had learned to despise those who despised him, and scorned them as incapable to comprehend him. He thenceforth made his journal the organ of the frightful dogmas with which his brain was stocked. The skulking life to which he was condemned, in order to escape the penalties of the law, had infuriated his moody spirit, and the evidences of public horror only tended to inflame him the more. The polished manners of the times were in his eyes vices inconsistent with republican equality; and in his delirious exasperation at obstacles, he saw but one medium of safety—wholesale slaughter. His studies and experiments upon the physical man had naturally habituated him to view pain with indifference; and his ardent mind, unfettered by any instinct of sensibility, went directly to its purpose by the ways of blood. This idea of acting by extermination had gradually become systematised in his head. He advocated a dictatorship, not to obtain for its possessor the delights of supreme power, but to lay upon him the terrible burden of purifying society. His dictator was to have a cannon-ball attached to his feet, in order that he might always be under the control of the people; and only one faculty he judged essential to be vested in him, that of indicating victims, and ordering the undeviating penalty of death. Marat knew only this punishment, for he had no idea of simply chastising—he would obliterate his obstacle.

Perceiving all around him aristocrats conspiring against liberty, he collected all the facts which accorded with his passion, denouncing with fury, and with a recklessness which resulted from that very fury, all the names suggested to him, and frequently such as had no existence. He denounced them without personal hatred or fear, and even without danger to himself, for he was beyond the pale of human relations, and those of the wronged towards the wrong-doer had ceased to prevail between him and his fellow-creatures.

A decree had been recently pronounced against him and Royou, "the friend of the king;" and he had concealed himself with an obscure and indigent lawyer, who had given him shelter. Barbaroux was invited to visit him. Barbaroux had pursued the study of physical science, and had formerly known Marat. He could scarcely refuse to attend him upon his request, and concluded, as he listened to him, that his mind was deranged The French, according to this appalling man, were but dastardly revolutionists. "Give me," said he, "two hundred Neapolitans, armed with poignards, and bearing muffs on their left arms by way of bucklers, and with them I will traverse France and consummate the revolution." In order to distinguish the aristocrats, he desired that the assembly should enjoin them to wear a white ribbon round the arm, and authorise their slaughter when found together to the number of three. Under the name of aristocrats he included royalists, Feuillants, and Girondists; and when, at times, the difficulty of recognising them was objected to him; "There is no chance of being deceived," he was accustomed to reply; "we may fall on those who have carriages, servants, clothes of silk, and who come out of theatres; they are aristocrats beyond doubt."

Barbaroux left him, terror-stricken. Marat, exclusively possessed with his atrocious system, cared little about means of insurrection, and was in fact incompetent to lay them in train. During his bloody reveries, he hung with complacency on the idea of retiring to Marseilles. The republican enthusiasm of that city led him to hope that he would be better understood and more prized there than he found himself at Paris. He thought, therefore, of taking refuge in Marseilles, and was anxious that Barbaroux should send him thither under his auspices; but that personage had no desire to make such a present to his native city, and he left in his concealment the madman whose apotheosis he assuredly had not the foresight to discern.

* [Marat (J. P.), born in 1744, of Calvinist parents, was not five feet high; his face was hideous, his character of countenance horrible, and his head monstrous for his size. From nature he derived a daring mind, an ungoverned imagination, a vindictive temper, and a ferocious heart; and the mode of life he pursued till the revolution, added yet more to his natural wildness and cruelty. It has been said that he studied medicine before he settled in Paris, where he was long in indigence, devoting his attention to anatomy, acting as an empiric, and vending simples and a specific which healed all diseases; nay, many assert that he was for a time reduced to absolute beggary. At last he obtained the title of veterinary surgeon to the Count d'Artois; but at the period of the revolution, his enthusiasm rose to delirium, he set up a journal, and became as great a charlatan in politics as he had been in medicine.—Biographie Moderne.]

The systematic and sanguinary Marat, consequently, was not the active chief capable of concentrating masses widely scattered and confusedly heaving. Robespierre seemed more suited to the task, inasmuch as he had secured for himself at the Jacobin Club the partisanship of many hearers, generally more energetic than readers in their prepossessions; but he likewise had not all the indispensable qualities. Robespierre, an indifferent advocate at Arras, had been deputed by that town to the states-general. He had there connected himself with Pétion and Buzot, and supported with churlish violence the opinions they upheld with a deep and calm conviction. He was ridiculed at first for the heaviness of his style and the poverty of his ideas; but his obstinacy drew some attention towards him, especially at the period of the revision. When, after the tragical scene of the Champ de Mars, it was rumoured that a prosecution would be instituted against the signers of the Jacobin petition, his terror and his youth* inspired Buzot and Roland with a degree of interest in his behalf, and they tendered him an asylum. But he speedily recovered courage, and the assembly being dissolved, he intrenched himself amongst the Jacobins, upon whom he perseveringly inflicted his dogmatical and inflated harangues. Having been elected public accuser, he refused that office, and laboured exclusively to gain for himself the twofold reputation of an incorruptible patriot and an eloquent speaker.

His early friends, Pétion, Buzot, Brissot, and Roland, received him in their families, and viewed with pain the morbid egotism which pourtayed itself in all his looks and movements. Those, indeed, who took any interest in him regretted that he, a man so much occupied with the public weal, should also think so h of himself. However, he was of too little importance to excite any serious animosity on account of his repulsive pride, and it was overlooked in consideration of his mediocrity and zeal. It was frequently remarked, that although silent in society, and rarely expressing an opinion, he took the lead the following day in propounding from the tribune the ideas he had heard drop from others. This usage was observed upon in his presence, but not at all in a reproachful strain; nevertheless, he speedily took disgust at a society in which he met men superior to himself, as he had formerly held in sullen detestation that of the constituent members. He then betook himself altogether to the Jacobins, where, as we have seen, he differed in opinion with Brissot and Louvet upon the question of war, and called them, possibly believed them, bad citizens, because they thought differently from himself, and supported their sentiments with eloquence. Whether he were sincere in his prompt suspicions of those who opposed him, or maliciously calumniated them, is one of those mysteries hid from human intelligence. There is no doubt that, with a narrow and vulgar mind, and an extreme susceptibility, he was greatly prone to irritation, and vastly difficult to enlighten; and it is not impossible that the soreness of pride may have turned into an abhorrence upon principle, and that he really believed those wicked who had roused his wrath.

Be that as it may, in the inferior circle in which he was placed he succeeded in exciting enthusiasm by his unrelenting dogmatism, and by his reputation for disinterestedness. His popularity thus rested materially on irreflective passions and weak understandings. Self-denying austerity and stern tenacity captivate warm imaginations, and sometimes even superior minds. There were, in fact, many men disposed to invest Robespierre with an energy more real, and with talents greater, than he in truth possessed. Camille-Desmoulins styled him his Aristides, and found him eloquent.

Others again, without discrimination, but subjugated by his audacious egotism, went about repeating that he was the man to place at the head of the revolution, and that, without this dictator, it could not progress. As for himself, permitting his partisans to disseminate such opinions, he never showed himself in the conclaves of the conspirators. He even complained of being compromised, because one of them, an inmate in the same house with him, had occasionally assembled in his room the insurrectional committee. He held back, therefore, and left the field of action open to his trumpeters, Panis, Sergent, Osselin, and others, members of the sections and municipal councils.

Marat, who was in search of a dictator, resolved to satisfy himself whether Robespierre was fitted for the office. The slovenly and regardless attire of Marat contrasted strongly with that of Robespierre, who was full of attention and study for his appearance. Secreted in an elegant cabinet, where his portrait was multiplied in all fashions, painted, engraved, and sculptured, he there devoted himself to unremitting labour, pondering diligently upon the writings of Rousseau, and assiduously preparing his harangues. Marat saw him, found in him only petty personal hatreds, no great system, none of that sanguinary daring which worked in his own distorted fancy, no genius in short; he left him full of contempt for the little man, pronounced him incapable of saving the state, and more than ever persuaded that he alone possessed the great social system.*

The admirers of Robespierre beset Barbaroux, and besought him to accompany them to their idol, saying that a man was needed, and that Robespierre alone could fill the vacuum. This language displeased Barbaroux, whose proud spirit little brooked the idea of a dictatorship, and whose exalted imagination was already captivated by the virtue of Roland and the talents of his friends. He went, nevertheless, to the house of Robespierre. In their interview, the conversation turned on Pétion, whose popularity hung heavily on Robespierre, and who, it was alleged, was incapable of serving the revolution. Barbaroux replied with warmth to the reproaches levelled at Pétion, and strenuously defended a character which had won his admiration. Robespierre spoke of the revolution,

* [Robespierre (Maximilian Isidore) was born at Arras in 1759. His father, a barrister in the Superior Council of Artois, having ruined himself by his prodigality, left France long before the revolution, established a school at Cologne, went into England, and thence to America, where he suffered his friends to be ignorant of his existence.—Biographie Moderne.]

* [Robespierre and Marat—enemies in secret, to external appearance friends—were early distinguished in the convention; both dear to the mob, but with different shades of character. The latter paid his court to the lowest of the low—to the men of straw or in rags, who were then of so much weight in the political system. The needy, the thieves, the cut-throats—in a word, the dregs of the people, the caput-mortuum of the human race, to a man supported Marat.

Robespierre, albeit dependent on the same class to which his rival was assimilated by his ugliness, his filth, his vulgar manners, and disgusting habits, was nevertheless allied to a more elevated division of it—to the shopkeepers and scribes, small traders, and the inferior rank of lawyers. These admired in him the politesse bourgeoise; his well-combed and powdered head, the richness of his waistcoats, the whiteness of his linen, the elegant cut of his coats, his breeches, silk stockings carefully drawn on, bright knee and shoe buckles; every thing, in short, bespoke the gentlemanly pretensions of Robespierre, in opposition to the sans-culottism of Marat.—Graphic History of French National Convention.] and repeated, according to his wont, that he had accelerated its march. He concluded by declaring, in the usual language of the time, that a man was needed. Barbaroux retorted that he wanted neither a dictator nor a king. Fréron recriminated by saying that Brissot was labouring to become one. Thus they fell into mutual upbraidings, and arrived at no understanding. When the interview was ended, Panis, wishing to correct the bad feeling engendered in it, observed to Barbaroux that he had misconceived the purpose; that a mere momentary authority was all that they designed; and that Robespierre appeared to them the only man to whom it could possibly be given. These vague expressions, and these proofs of petty rivalry, were what erroneously induced the Girondists to believe that Robespierre was bent upon usurping power. A moody jealousy was taken for ambition; but it was one of those mistakes which the clouded eye of party invariably commits. Robespierre, capable at the utmost of detesting merit, had neither the energy nor the genius of ambition, and his partisans formed for him pretensions which he himself shrunk from imagining.

Danton was more competent than any other to be that leader whom all imaginations invoked for the purpose of infusing unity into the revolutionary movements. He had formerly appeared at the bar, but had not succeeded. Indigent and teased with passions, he had thrown himself into the political troubles of his era with ardour, and probably with hopes. He was uninformed, but endowed with a superior understanding and great powers of imagination. His athletic form, his sunken and somewhat negro features, his stentorian voice, his strange yet lofty images, took captive the auditories of the Cordelier Club and of the sections. His countenance would express by turns passion in all its brutality, a jovial recklessness, and even simple benevolence. Danton neither hated nor envied mortal, but his daring in attack had no limits; and, in certain moments of enthusiasm, he was capable of executing all that the atrocious mind of Marat was capable of conceiving.

A revolution, the unforeseen but inevitable consequence of which had been to rouse the lower classes of society against the higher, was sure to stimulate jealousies, to bring forth systems, and unchain the brutal passions. Robespierre was the man of envy, Marat the man of system, and Danton the man of passion—violent, fickle, and by fits cruel or generous. If the two first, occupied, the one by a gnawing hate, the other by demoniac reveries, were calculated to have but few of those wants which render men accessible to corruption, Danton, on the contrary, full of unbridled impulses and greedy for enjoyment, was but badly fitted to resist its snares. Under pretext of recompensing him for a former post of advocate to the council, the court gave him some rather considerable sums; but whilst it succeeded in bribing, it failed to gain him. He did not the less continue, on that account, to harangue and excite the multitude of the clubs against it. When he was reproached for not fulfilling his contract, he replied, that in order to preserve the means of serving the court, he must in appearance treat it as an enemy.

Danton, therefore, was the most redoubtable leader of those bands which are gained and moved by rough oratory. But, audacious and stimulating at the critical moment, he was not fitted for those assiduous labours which the desire of dominion needs for realisation; and although wielding great influence over the conspirators, he did not govern them. He was capable simply, in a moment of hesitation, to re-animate them and drive them to their object by imparting a decisive impulse.

The members of the insurrectional committee, meanwhile, had not yet arrived at a final determination amongst themselves. The court, advertised of their slightest movements, adopted on its own side certain measures calculated to shelter it from any sudden attack, and to secure it time and safety until the arrival of the coalesced powers. It had originated and established a club in the vicinity of the palace, called "The French Club," which was composed of artisans and soldiers of the national guard. They all had arms concealed in their place of meeting, and were in a position to fly on a pressing emergency to the succour of the royal family. This single establishment was a charge on the civil list to the extent of 10,000 francs a-day. A native of Marseilles, named Lieutand, had besides a body of men under his orders, who alternately filled the galleries, the public places, the cafés, and the taverns, to support a diversion in favour of the king, and to resist the riotous proceedings of the patriots.* Disputes consequently ensued in all quarters, and from words the parties generally proceeded to blows. But, despite all the efforts of the court, its partisans were few and weak, and that portion of the national guard which was devoted to it sunk into the greatest discouragement.

A great number of faithful retainers, who had hitherto kept apart from the court, now came forward to defend the king and make a rampart round him with their bodies. Their meetings at the palace were numerous and frequent, and they augmented the public distrust. They had been called "knights of the dagger" ever since the scenes of February 1791. Orders had likewise been issued to secretly assemble the constitutional guard, which, although disembodied, had continued to receive its pay.

In the mean time, confusion and disagreement prevailed in the counsels of the king, and produced in his feeble and naturally indecisive mind the most agonising perplexity. Some prudent friends, and, amongst others, Malesherbes,† advised him to abdicate; others, and they were the more numerous, supported a project of flight, but they were in harmony neither as to the means, the place, nor the result of the flight. To infuse some uniformity into their different plans, the king desired that Bertrand de Molleville should consult with Duport, the ex-constituent. Louis XVI. had great confidence in the latter, and he was obliged to lay positive injunctions on Bertrand upon the subject, as that personage pretended to have scruples against maintaining any relation with a constitutionalist such as Duport. With them were also associated in council Lally-Tolendal, Malouet, Clermont-Tonnerre, Gouvernet, and others, all devoted to Louis XVI., but, beyond that point, differing widely in opinion upon the part to be adopted by the king, if royalty itself should be saved. In this committee the monarch's flight was fixed upon, and the Castle of Gaillon in Normandy as the place of his retreat. The Duke de Liancourt, a friend of Louis XVI., and enjoying his full confidence, commanded that province. He answered for his troops and the inhabitants of Rouen, who had declared by a forcible address against the events of the 20th June. He offered to receive the royal family, and conduct it to Gaillon, or to transfer it to Lafayette, who would carry it into the midst of his army. He furthermore tendered his whole fortune to facilitate the execution of the scheme, asking only a reservation of one hundred louis a-year for behoof of his children. This plan was agreeable to the constitutional members of the committee, because, in lieu of placing the king in the hands of the emigrants, it consigned him to the care of Liancourt and Lafayette. But from a similar motive, it was repugnant to the others, and was also likely to prove distasteful to the king and queen. The Castle of Gaillon had the great advantage of not being above thirty-six leagues from the sea, and of presenting an easy retreat into England through Normandy, a province favourably inclined to the royal cause. It likewise possessed another, in being scarcely twenty leagues from Paris, on which account the king could proceed to it without infringing the constitutional law and that was an important consideration with him, for he clung with singular tenacity to the desire of not assuming a position of open contravention.

* See Bertrand de Molleville, vols. viii. and ix.

† Ibid

M. de Narbonne and Madame de Staël, the daughter of Necker, also engendered a project of flight. On their side, the emigrants propounded their plan, which proposed the transport of the king to Compiègne, and hence to the banks of the Rhine by the forest of Ardennes. All are eager to pour advice into the ear of a feeble monarch, because all aspire to impress upon him a will which he has not of himself. So many contrary exhortations added materially to the natural vacillation of Louis XVI.; and that unfortunate prince, worried by opposing counsels, convinced by the arguments of some, carried away by the passions of others, tortured with fears for the fate of his family, and wrung with the scruples of conscience, hesitated amidst the multitude of projects, and beheld the popular storm rolling towards him without daring either to brave or to fly it.

The Girondist deputies, who had so boldly raised the question of forfeiture, remained nevertheless indecisive on the eve of an insurrection. Although the court was almost disarmed, and positive supremacy on the side of the people, still the approach of the Prussians, and the dread which ancient authority always inspires, even after it has been stripped of its strength, induced them to believe that it might yet be better to negotiate with the court than risk the chances of an attack. On the supposition even that the attack were successful, they feared that the speedy arrival of a foreign army might destroy all the consequences of a victory over the palace, and visit a terrible vengeance for the momentary success. However, notwithstanding this disposition to treat, they opened no negotiations upon the subject, nor ventured to take the initiative; but they hearkened to one Boze, the king's painter, who was on intimate terms with Thierry, valet-de-chambre to Louis XVI. This painter Boze, filled with alarm at the dangers hovering over the state, besought them to transcribe what they deemed essential in the conjuncture to save the king and liberty. They did, in consequence, indite a letter, signed by Guadet, Gensonné, and Vergniaud, and commencing with these words, "You ask from us, sir, our opinion upon the present situation of France." This exordium proves sufficiently that the explanation had been requested. "The time was past," said the three deputies in substance to Boze, "for the king to deceive himself upon any point; and he would be strangely blinded if he did not perceive that his own conduct was the occasion of the general excitement, and of that violence in the language of the clubs of which he so incessantly complained. New protestations on his part would be fruitless, and seem derisory; in the extremity to which things had come, nothing less would be available than measures incontestibly calculated to calm the public apprehension. Every one, for example, firmly believed that it was in the power of the king to remove the foreign armies, hence it was advisable he should begin by ordering such withdrawal; then he ought to select a patriotic ministry; dismiss Lafayette, who, in the present state of affairs, could no longer serve beneficially; propose a law for the constitutional education of the young dauphin; submit the civil list to a public superintendence; and declare in solemn form that he would not accept for himself any augmentation of power but with the free concurrence of the nation. By such steps," added the Girondists, "it was reasonable to hope that the feeling of exasperation would subside, and that with time and perseverance in this system, the king would redeem the confidence he had now utterly lost."

Let us pause for an instant.

The Girondists were at this time very near the attainment of their object—if they had really been conspiring so long, and up to this moment, for the realisation of a republic—and yet we are told that they might have been suddenly stopped, when on the very point of success, by having the ministry given to three of their friends! Such cannot be the correct version. It has been rendered manifest that a republic was desired only from despair of the monarchy; that it was never a positive object; and that even when it was to be had for grasping, those who are accused of having long laboured for it refused to sacrifice the public welfare to the triumph of their system, but consented to preserve the constitutional monarchy, provided it were defended by sufficient guarantees. The Girondists, by demanding the retirement of the troops, gave sufficient proof that the impending danger mainly occupied their thoughts; and the care they evinced for the education of the dauphin likewise demonstrates that a future monarchy was not to them an insupportable contemplation.

It is alleged that Brissot, on his part, had submitted propositions with a view to avert the forfeiture of the crown, and that in them he had inserted a condition of a large pecuniary payment. This assertion rests upon the authority of Bertrand de Molleville, who has always dealt in calumny for two reasons—malevolence of heart, and obliquity of mind. Besides, he produces no proof of the fact; and the known poverty of Brissot, and his powerful conviction, ought to answer for his purity. It is not impossible, doubtless, that the court may have told out money on the account of Brissot, but such disbursement would not prove that the money had been either asked or received by him. The circumstance already recorded in these pages concerning the corruption of Pétion, so confidently promised to the court by certain knaves, in conjunction with other facts of the like nature, shows evidently that no confidence ought to be placed in these imputations of venality, so frequently and so easily hazarded. And, furthermore, howsoever the case might stand with Brissot, the three deputies, Gensonné, Guadet, and Vergniaud, have not even been accused, and they alone undersigned the letter transmitted to Boze.

The lacerated mind of the king was less capable than ever of appreciating their sagacious counsels. Thierry presented the letter to him, but he cast it angrily from him, making his two accustomed responses, that it was not he but the patriotic ministry who had provoked the war, and that, as to the constitution, he was scrupulously observing it, whilst others were labouring with all their might to destroy it.* These allegations were not strictly to the pur-

* COPY OF THE LETTER WRITTEN TO CITIZEN BOZE BY GUADET, VERGNIAUD, AND GENSONNE.

"You ask from us, sir, our opinion upon the present situation of France, and the suggestion of such measures as might extricate the state from the imminent dangers wherewith it is menaced: such, indeed, are the causes of disquiet to all good citizens, and the objects of their deepest meditations.

When you question us concerning interests of such magnitude, we will not hesitate to explain ourselves with frankness.

It ought not to be dissembled, that the conduct of the executive power is the immediate cause of all the calamities which afflict France, and of the perils which beset the throne. They deceive the king who seek to persuade him that exaggerated doctrines, the effervescence in clubs, the manœuvres of certain agitators and powerful factions, have engendered and sustain these disorganising movements, of which every day may increase the violence, and of which it may soon be impossible to calculate the consequences: it is to place the cause of the malady in its symptoms.

If the people were assured of the stability of a revolution so dearly purchased, if public liberty were no longer in danger, if the conduct of the king aroused no distrust, opinions would find their level of themselves; the great mass of the citizens would think only of enjoying the benefits which the constitution promises to them; and if, in such a state of things, factions still existed, they would cease to be dangerous, for they would have neither pretext nor object.

pose, because, although he had not provoked the war, it was a duty not the less incumbent on him strenuously to support it; and so far as his scrupulous adherence to the letter of the law was concerned, a text observance was of little moment, the important point consisting in not endangering the whole substance by an appeal to foreign aid.

To the hope the Girondists entertained of finding their counsels heeded, we must unquestionably attribute the moderation they observed when an attempt was made to raise the question of forfeiture, daily agitated in the clubs, in the public groups, and in petitions. Every time they came in the name of the committee of twelve to speak of the dangers of the country, and the means of meeting them, "Go back to the cause of the danger!" was shouted to them; "To the cause!" loudly responded the galleries. Vergniaud,

But so long as public liberty is in peril—so long as the alarms of the citizens are stimulated by the conduct of the executive power, and the conspiracies hatched in the interior and the exterior of the kingdom appear more or less openly favoured by the king, the condition of affairs necessarily evokes commotions, disorder, and factions. In states the best constituted, and constituted for ages, revolutions have no other principle; and their effect must be for us so much the more prompt, as there has been no interval between the movements which induced the first, and those which seem now to announce a second, revolution.

It is therefore only too evident that the existing state of things must inevitably lead to a crisis, in which nearly all the chances will be against royalty. In fact, opinion now separates the interests of the king from those of the nation; it views the first public functionary of a free nation as a party leader, and, as the consequence of so disastrous a policy, it heaps on him the odium of all the evils which desolate France.

Alas! what will be the success of the foreign powers, should they even enable the king, by their intervention, to augment his authority, and give a new form to the government? Is it not evident, that those men who formed the idea of that congress, have sacrificed to their prejudices and their personal interest the interest of the king himself; that the success of those attempts would give a character of usurpation to powers which the nation alone delegates, and which its confidence alone can support? How is it not seen that the force which produces this change will long be necessary for its maintenance, and that thus will be sown in the bosom of the country the germ of divisions and discord, which the lapse of many ages may scarcely suffice to eradicate?

As sincerely as invariably attached to the interests of the nation, from which we will never sever those of the king, except so far as he himself dissevers them, we think that the means of averting the calamities wherewith the empire is threatened, and of re-establishing tranquillity, will be for the king to remove, by his conduct, all grounds of suspicion, to declare his purpose in a manner at once frank and unequivocal, and, in short, intrench himself in the confidence of the people, which alone can constitute his strength and assure his happiness.

And it is not now by fresh protestations that he can gain this object; they would be derisory, and, in the present state of circumstances, would seem so truly ironical, as, instead of dissipating alarm, to cause an increase of danger.

There is only one from which any good result might be anticipated; and that would be a declaration under the most solemn sanctions, that in no case will the king accept an augmentation of power, unless voluntarily conceded to him by the French people, without the concurrence or interference of any foreign power, and freely deliberated upon in the constitutional forms.

Upon this subject it is observable, that several members of the national assembly are aware that such a declaration was proposed to the king when he made the proposition for war against the King of Hungary, and that he declined to promulgate it.

But what would probably suffice to recover him the national confidence, would be for the king successfully to impress upon the allied powers a sense of the independence of the French nation, to obtain a cessation of all hostilities, and the withdrawal of the cordons of troops which menace our frontiers.

It is impossible but a very considerable portion of the nation should be convinced that the king has it fully in his power to procure an abandonment of the coalition; and so long as it puts public liberty in peril, the king's friends need not flatter themselves that confidence will revive.

Should any exertions of the king to effect this object be fruitless, he ought at least to aid the nation, by all the means which are in his power, to repel the external attack; and should omit nothing to free himself from the suspicion of favouring it.

In this supposition, little judgment is required to perceive that the suspicions and distrust spring from unfortunate circumstances, which it is impossible to change.

To consider them as criminal, when the danger is real and cannot be gainsaid, is the surest mode of redoubling them; to complain of exaggeration, inveigh against clubs, and attribute all to agitators, when the effervescence and the agitation are the natural effects of circumstances, is to give them a new force—to increase the tumult of the people by the very means adopted to calm it.

So long as there shall be a subsisting and ascertained action against liberty, a reaction is inevitable; and the development of both the one and the other will have an identical progress.

In so deplorable a situation, tranquillity can be established only by the cessation of all dangers; and, until that auspicious moment arrives, the point of chief interest to the nation and the king is, that those melancholy circumstances be not continually rendered more exasperating by a conduct on the part of the agents of the executive, to be characterised in the mildest term as equivocal.

1st, Wherefore does the king not select his ministers amongst men the most emphatic in favour of the revolution? Wherefore, in moments the most critical, is he surrounded only by men unknown or suspected? If it were the policy of the king to increase distrust, and excite the people to commotions, could a more certain plan be pursued to foment them?

The choice of a ministry has been at all times one of the most important functions of the authority vested in the king; it is the thermometer by which public opinion has always judged the dispositions of the court; and it cannot be a matter of conjecture what effect the present selections must now have, when they, even at any other time, would have excited the most violent murmurs.

A ministry essentially patriotic, would, therefore, be one of the great means the king may use to recover confidence. But it would be an inconceivable blindness to imagine, that, by a single step of this nature, it could be promptly regained. It is only by time, and by constant efforts, that an expectation may be indulged of effacing impressions too profoundly stamped to be dissipated on the moment to the last vestige.

2d, At a time when all means of defence should be forthcoming—when France cannot arm all her defenders—wherefore has the king not offered the muskets and the horses of his guard?

3d, Wherefore does not the king himself solicit a law to subject the civil list to a form of scrutiny, calculated to satisfy the nation that it is not perverted from its legitimate purposes and applied to other uses?

4th, One decisive mode of tranquillising the people as to the personal dispositions of the king, would be for him to request a law regulating the education of the prince-royal, and thus accelerate the period at which the care of that young prince should be transferred to a governor possessing the confidence of the nation.

5th, It is still a subject of complaint, that the decree on the disembodiment of the staff of the national guard is not sanctioned. These multiplied refusals of the sanction to legislative provisions, which public opinion strenuously calls for, and the urgency of which cannot be denied, provoke inquiry into the constitutional question as bearing upon the application of the veto to laws of emergency, and are assuredly not calculated to dissipate alarms and discontent.

6th, It would be advisable that the king withdraw the command of the army from the hands of M. de Lafayette. It is at all events evident he cannot in that capacity beneficially serve the public good.

We will conclude this simple sketch by a general remark, namely, that every thing which may obliterate suspicions, and reanimate confidence, neither can nor ought to be neglected. The constitution is saved if the king adopt this resolution with courage, and act upon it with firmness. We are," &c.

COPY OF THE LETTER WRITTEN TO BOZE BY THIERRY.

I have just been scolded a second time for having received the letter which my seal determined me to present.

However, the king has permitted me to answer:—

1st, That he was always careful in the choice of his ministers;

2d, That the declaration of war was owing solely to the ministers, self-styled patriots;

3d, That he had used every exertion at the time to prevent the coalition of the powers, and that now, to remove the armies from the frontiers, there are none but general means;

4th, That, since his acceptance, he has most scrupulously observed the laws of the constitution, but that many other persons are at present labouring in a contrary spirit."

Brissot, and the Girondists, replied that the committee had its eyes on the cause, and that when the time should arrive they would unmask it; but that for the present it was not expedient to introduce a new topic of discord.

But it was irrevocably fixed that all the means and projects of negotiation should fall to the ground; and the catastrophe, long foreseen and dreaded, came hastily on, as we shall shortly see.

CHAPTER XI.

INSURRECTION OF THE 10TH AUGUST, AND SUSPENSION OF THE KING.

In continuation of a festival given to the federalists, the insurrectional committee decided that the people should move, early on the morning of the 26th July, in three columns upon the palace, and march with the red flag bearing this inscription: "Those who fire on the columns of the people shall be instantly put to death!" The object was to constitute the king a prisoner, and to incarcerate him in Vincennes. The national guards of Versailles were canvassed to assist the movement; but they had been apprised so late, and the Parisians were so little in concert with them, that their officers came to the town-hall of Paris, on the very morning appointed, to inquire what they were expected to do. The secret, besides, was so ill guarded, that the court was fully aware, the whole royal family arisen, and the palace full of people. Pétion, perceiving that the measures had been badly taken, apprehending some treachery, and, above all, reflecting that the Marseillese had not yet arrived, repaired in all haste to the faubourgs, in order to arrest a movement which must ruin the popular party if it were not successful.

A frightful tumult prevailed in the faubourgs: the tocsin had been sounded the whole night. The more to infuriate the people, a report was spread that a pile of arms was hoarded in the palace, which must be thence reclaimed. Pétion succeeded, with infinite difficulty, in restoring order. The keeper of the seals, Champion de Cicé, who had accompanied him, received some sabre-cuts; but the populace ultimately consented to disperse, and the insurrection was adjourned.

The petty acerbities and disputes, which are the ordinary preludes to a definitive rupture, kept the excitement from subsiding. The king had ordered the garden of the Tuileries to be closed since the 20th June. The terrace of the Feuillants, contiguous to the hall of assembly, was the only part left open, and sentinels were placed to prevent any one passing from that terrace into the garden. D'Espremenil was there encountered, conversing energetically with a deputy. He was hooted, pursued into the garden, and carried to the Palais-Royal, where he received several wounds. The lines which prevented access to the garden having thus been violated, it was proposed that a decree should supply a more efficient safeguard. The decree, however, was not passed, but in lieu thereof it was moved that a paper should be exhibited bearing these words: "Prohibition against entering a foreign territory." The placard was planted, and sufficed to prevent the people from overstepping the limits, although the sentinels had been removed by orders from the king.* Thus the last vestiges of outward regard were cast away. To exemplify the feeling more, a letter from Nanci, detailing several civic manifestations which had taken place in that town, was immediately copied out and transmitted to the king.

At length, on the 30th, the Marseillese arrived. They were five hundred in number, and counted in their ranks all the most enthusiastic spirits of the south, and all of the most turbulent character whom an active trade drew to the port of Marseilles. Barbaroux went as far as Charenton to meet them. On this occasion a new project was concerted with Santerre. Under pretext of going to welcome the Marseillese, it was resolved to collect the faubourgs, march in rank to the Carrousel, and there encamp without tumult, calmly to await the suspension of the king by the assembly, or his voluntary abdication. This plan was agreeable to the philanthropists of the party, who would have wished the revolution terminated without effusion of blood. It failed nevertheless, because Santerre did not succeed in assembling the faubourgs, and could only muster a small number of men to meet the Marseillese. Santerre thereupon offered them a repast, which was served in the Champs-Elysées. It happened that, on the same day, and at the same hour, a company composed of national guards of the battalion Filles Saint-Thomas, and other individuals, civilians or military, all partisans of the court, were dining near the place where the Marseillese were regaled. This entertainment could certainly not have been arranged with a design to disturb that of the Marseillese, inasmuch as the invitation given to the latter had been quite sudden, for instead of a banquet an insurrection had been in contemplation. It was, however, scarcely possible that persons of such opposite principles should peaceably conclude their carousals in the immediate vicinity of each other. The populace insulted the royalists, who came out to defend themselves; the patriots, called to assist the populace, rushed to the scene with ardour, and battle was forthwith joined. The contest was not of long duration; the Marseillese, falling on their adversaries, put them to flight, slew one, and wounded several. In a moment Paris was in universal uproar. The federalists traversed the streets, and tore away all cockades of ribbon, exclaiming that they ought to be of woollen.

Some of the fugitives arrived, all bleeding, at the Tuileries, where they were received with open arms, and treated with an attention quite natural under the circumstances, since they were viewed as friends who had fallen victims to their loyalty. The national guards on duty at the palace reported these details, exaggerated them perhaps; and thus were propagated fresh rumours and fresh animosities against the royal family and the ladies of the court, who had, it was said, wiped away the perspiration and the blood of the wounded with their kerchiefs. It was even concluded from these facts that the scene had been prepared; and the ground of a new accusation against the palace was hence supplied.

The national guard of Paris immediately demanded the removal of the Marseillese; but it was hooted by the galleries, and its petition met with no attention.

It was in the midst of these events that a document was disseminated, professing to emanate from the Duke of Brunswick, and shortly ascertained to be authentic. We have already spoken of the mission of Mallet-du-Pan. He had presented in the king's name the form of a manifesto, but its spirit was speedily scouted. Another manifesto, dictated by the passions of Coblentz, and sanctioned by the name of Brunswick, was published in advance of the Prussian army. This document was conceived in the following terms:—

"Their majesties the emperor and the King of Prussia having confided to me the command of the combined armies which they have assembled on the frontiers of France, I deem it fitting to apprise the inhabitants of that kingdom of the motives which have influenced the measures of the two sovereigns, and the views which guide them.

* [" A line traced on the ground at the two extremities of the terrace, and tricoloured ribbons tied across all the passages, with the device of Ne plus ultra suspended to them, sufficed to keep on the terrace the immense populace that crowded it, while the rest of the garden was deserted."—Bertrand's Annals, vol. vii. p. 71.]

After having arbitrarily confiscated the rights and possessions of the German princes in Alsace and Lorraine, disturbed and overthrown the established order and legitimate government in the interior of the kingdom, directed against the sacred person of the king and his august family attacks and outrages which are still continued and renewed from day to day, those who have usurped the reins of government have at last filled the measure of iniquity by declaring an unjust war against his majesty the emperor, and invading his provinces situated in the Low Countries. Some of the possessions of the German empire have been comprised within the scope of this oppression, and several others have escaped the like danger only by yielding to the imperious menaces of the dominant party and its emissaries.

His majesty the King of Prussia, united with his imperial majesty in a close and defensive alliance, and himself a preponderant member of the Germanic body, has consequently felt himself imperatively called upon to march to the succour of his ally and his co-estates; and it is in this double relation that he assumes the defence of that monarch and of Germany.

To these paramount interests is joined an object equally momentous and dear to the hearts of the two sovereigns, namely, to put an end to the anarchy prevailing in the interior of France, to suppress the attacks levelled at the throne and the altar, to re-establish the legal power, to restore the king to the security and liberty of which he is deprived, and to place him in a condition to exercise the legitimate authority rightfully his.

Assured that the sound part of the French nation abhors the excesses of a faction which holds it in thraldom, and that the majority of the inhabitants impatiently await the moment of assistance to declare openly against the odious enterprises of their oppressors, his majesty the emperor and his majesty the King of Prussia summon and exhort them to return without delay to the paths of reason and justice, of order and peace. With such views it is that I, the undersigned, the general commanding in chief the two armies, declare, 1st, That drawn into the present war by irresistible circumstances, the two allied courts propose to themselves no other object than the happiness of France, without any pretension of aggrandisement by conquests.

2d, That they have no intention of interfering in the internal government of France; but that they desire simply to deliver the king, the queen, and the royal family, from their captivity, and to procure for his most christian majesty the security necessary to enable him to make, without danger and without hindrance, such convocations as he shall judge expedient, and to devote himself to the welfare of his subjects according to his promises and to the utmost of his power.

3d, That the combined armies will protect the towns, hamlets, and villages, and the persons and property of all those who submit to the king, and will assist in the immediate re-establishment of order and police throughout France.

4th, That the national guards are summoned to watch provisionally over the tranquillity of towns and rural districts, and the security of the persons and property of all the French, until the arrival of the troops of their imperial and royal majesties, or until it be otherwise ordered, under pain of being held personally responsible; that, on the other hand, those national guards who shall fight against the troops of the two allied courts, and shall be taken with arms in their hands, will be treated as enemies, and chastised as rebels to their king and disturbers of the public

5th, That the generals, officers, non-commissioned officers, and soldiers of the French troops of the line are, in like manner, summoned to return to their former allegiance, and immediately to submit to the king, their legitimate sovereign.

6th, That the members of departments, districts, and municipalities, shall be in like manner responsible, in life and estate, for all breaches of the peace, burnings, assassinations, robberies, and acts of violence, which they shall allow to be committed, or shall not have notoriously attempted to prevent in their jurisdictions; and that they, furthermore, shall be bound to continue the provisional exercise of their functions until his most christian majesty, when restored to full liberty, have otherwise provided, or it have been otherwise ordered in the interval.

7th, That the inhabitants of towns, hamlets, and villages, who shall dare defend themselves against the troops of their imperial and royal majesties, and fire upon them, whether in the open country or from the windows, doors, and apertures of their dwellings, shall be instantly punished according to the rigour of martial law, and their dwellings demolished or burnt. On the contrary, all the inhabitants of the said towns, hamlets, or villages, who shall evince alacrity in submitting to their king, by opening their gates to the troops of their majesties, will be from that moment under their immediate protection; their persons, estates, and effects will be under the ægis of the laws; and means will be taken to assure the general safety of all and each of them.

8th, The city of Paris and all its inhabitants, without distinction, are held bound to submit instantly, and without any delay, to the king, to restore that prince to full and entire liberty, and to ensure him, as well as all the royal personages, the inviolability and reverence which the laws of nature and society impose upon subjects towards their sovereigns; their imperial and royal majesties rendering personally responsible for all events, at the risk of their heads, according to martial trial, without hope of pardon, all members of the national assembly, the department, the district, the municipality, and the national guard of Paris, justices of peace, and all others whom it may concern; their said majesties furthermore declaring, on their imperial and royal faith and word, that if the palace of the Tuileries be forced or insulted, if the least violence or outrage be perpetrated towards their majesties the king and queen, and the royal family, if their safety, preservation, and liberty be not immediately provided for, they will exact an exemplary and ever-memorable vengeance, by delivering up the city of Paris to military execution and total destruction, and the rebels guilty of resistance to the dire chastisement they will have merited. Their imperial and royal majesties promise the inhabitants of the city of Paris, on the other hand, to employ their good offices with his most christian majesty to obtain pardon for their wrongs and errors, and to take the most vigorous measures to secure their persons and property, if they promptly and strictly conform to the injunctions heretofore proclaimed.

Finally, their majesties, refusing to recognise as laws in France any but such as shall emanate from the king, in the enjoyment of undoubted freedom, protest in advance against the authenticity of all the declarations which may be made in the name of his most christian majesty, so long as his sacred person, and the persons of the queen and all the royal family, shall not be in security; in pursuance of which, their imperial and royal majesties invite and entreat his most christian majesty to name a town in his kingdom contiguous to the frontiers, most eligible in his opinion for his retiring to with the queen and his family, under a strong and sure escort, which shall be sent to him for that purpose, in order that his most christian majesty may call around him, in full security, the ministers and counsellors whom it shall please him to designate, make such convocations as shall appear to him suitable, provide for the re-establishment of order and regulate the administration of his kingdom.

In fine, I declare and promise, in my own name, and in my above-mentioned quality, to cause a faithful and strict discipline to be observed by the troops intrusted to my command, undertaking to treat with mildness and moderation those well-disposed people who shall evince a peaceable and submissive spirit, and to employ force only against those who shall be guilty of resistance and of evil intentions.

For these sufficient reasons, I require and exhort all the inhabitants of the kingdom, in the strongest and most earnest terms, not to oppose the march and operations of the troops I command, but rather to grant them every where free access, and all the countenance, succour, and assistance which circumstances may need.

Given at Head-quarters at Coblentz, the 25th July 1792. (Signed) CHARLES WILLIAM FERDINAND, Duke of Brunswick-Luneburg."

With regard to this declaration, it is somewhat surprising that, although dated on the 25th at Coblentz, it was in Paris on the 28th, and published in all the royalist journals. It produced an extraordinary sensation, causing all the effects of highly wrought passions coming to inflame other excited passions. On all sides pledges were exchanged to resist to the last an enemy whose language was so haughty and threats so vindictive. In the existing state of feeling, it was natural that the king and the court should be accused of this new fault. Louis XVI. hastened to disavow the manifesto by a message; and he could do so, doubtless, with perfect sincerity, since it was so different from the model he had proposed; but he might have seen by this example how his intentions would be exceeded by his party, if that party ever became the dispenser of fate. Neither his disavowal, nor the expressions with which he accompanied it, were available to satisfy the assembly. In speaking of the welfare of that people, whose happiness had been ever dear to his heart, he added, "How many sorrows would be effaced by the slightest mark of its return!"

These affecting terms no longer elicited the enthusiasm they were once wont to evoke; they were viewed only as words of perfidy, and many deputies supported the motion for printing the king's message, on the express ground of displaying to the public the contrast they held to exist between the language and the conduct of the king. From this moment the agitation rapidly increased, and circumstances assumed a more portentous character. Intelligence was brought of a resolution by which the department of the Mouths of the Rhone determined to retain the taxes, in order to pay the troops it had sent against the Savoyards, and accused of insufficiency the measures adopted by the assembly. This daring act was owing to the instigations of Barbaroux. The resolution was annulled by the assembly, but without being effective to prevent its execution. It was reported, at the same time, that the Sardinians, who were advancing, numbered fifty thousand. The minister for foreign affairs found it necessary to come in person, and assure the assembly that the armament did not exceed at the utmost ten or twelve thousand men. To this rumour succeeded another. It was asserted that the small body of federalists actually at Soissons had been poisoned by glass being mixed with their bread. Assurance was even positive that one hundred and sixty had already expired, and that eight hundred were stretched in sickness. Informations were taken, and it was ascertained that the flour being deposited in a church, some of the panes had been broken, and pieces of the glass found in the bread; but there were none either dead or ill.

On the 25th July, a decree had constituted all the sections of Paris in permanence. They had assembled and charged Pétion to propose in their name the dethronement of Louis XVI. On the morning of the 3d of August, the Mayor of Paris, emboldened by this energetic expression of opinion, presented himself at the bar of the assembly to urge a petition in the name of the forty-eight sections of Paris. He inveighed against the conduct of Louis XVI. since the commencement of the revolution, and recapitulated, according to the language of the era, the benefits conferred by the nation upon the king, and the proofs of his ingratitude. He descanted upon the dangers with which all minds were oppressed—the approach of the foreigner, the inefficiency of the means of defence, the revolt of a general against the assembly, the opposition of many departmental directories, and the terrible and monstrous threats uttered in the name of Brunswick; in consequence whereof, he concluded for the deposition of the king, and requested the assembly to put that important question in the order of the day.

This demand, which had been hitherto made only by clubs, federalists, and communes, assumed a very different character when presented in the name of Paris, and by its mayor. It was heard with a feeling of astonishment rather than of favour in the morning sitting. But in the evening, the debate was opened, and one part of the assembly gave way to the full current of passion. Some called eagerly for an instant discussion of the question, and others urged its adjournment. The assembly finally delayed it till Thursday the 9th August, and continued to receive and read the various petitions expressing, with still more energy than the mayor, the like desires and sentiments.

The section of Mauconseil, surpassing all the others, was not contented with demanding the deposition, but pronounced it of its own plenary authority. It declared that it no longer recognised Louis XVI. as King of the French, and that it intended shortly to come and ask of the assembly whether it really designed to save France. Furthermore, it invited all the sections of the empire (no longer using the word kingdom) to follow its example.

From what has been already stated, it is manifest that the assembly did not yield to the insurrectional movement so swiftly as the inferior authorities; and for this reason—it was obliged, from its position as guardian of the laws, to pay them more respect. It consequently found itself frequently outstripped by the popular bodies, and its power violently shaken. It therefore annulled the resolution of the section of Mauconseil. Vergniaud and Cambon made use of the most severe expressions against that proceeding, which they stigmatised as an usurpation of the sovereignty of the people. It would seem, however, that they did not so much condemn in this act the violation of principles as the precipitation of the resolutionists, and especially the impropriety of their language with reference to the national assembly.

But now the term of all uncertainties was drawing rapidly nigh. The same hour saw meetings of the insurrectional committee of the federalists, and of the king's friends discussing his flight. The committee deferred the insurrection to the day appointed for the debate on the deposition, that is to say, to the evening of the 9th August, in readiness for the morning of the 10th. On their part, the king's friends deliberated on his flight in the gardens of M. de Montmorin. Liancourt and Lafayette renewed their propositions. Every thing was arranged for the departure; money alone was deficient. Bertrand de Molleville had fruitlessly exhausted the civil list in subsidising royalist clubs, orators of assemblies, orators of mobs, and pretended corrupters, who corrupted nobody, but appropriated to themselves the largesses of the court. The want of funds was met by loans, which generous subjects were eager to offer their king. The proposals made by M. de Liancourt have been already mentioned; he gave all the money he had been able to raise. Other persons supplied what was in their power. Devoted adherents volunteered to accompany the carriage which was to convey the royal family, and if necessity arose, to die at its side. All being arranged, the meeting at Montmorin's finally settled the departure, after a consultation which lasted for some hours. The king, who was immediately afterwards waited upon, gave his consent to this determination, and directed that a consultation should be held with Messieurs de Montciel and de Sainte-Croix. However much the opinions of the men who had joined to effect this enterprise might differ, it was to them all a moment of happiness, when they believed the monarch's deliverance so near at hand.*

But the following day all was changed. The king caused an intimation to be given that he would not depart, because he was not disposed to commence a civil war. All those who, in spite of their dissimilar principles, took an equal interest in his welfare, were thrown into consternation. They were aware that his real motive was not the one he had assigned. The veritable reasons that weighed with him were, in the first place, the approach of Brunswick, which was announced as immediate; and in the next, the adjournment of the insurrection; but, above all, the refusal of the queen to trust herself with the constitutionalists. She had manifested her repugnance in the most emphatic terms, saying that it was better to perish than be beholden to men who had done the king so much mischief.†

Thus all the efforts of the constitutionalists, and all the dangers they incurred, were completely thrown away. Lafayette had seriously compromised himself. It was known that he had prevailed on Luckner to march, in case of emergency, against the capital. That general, being called before the assembly, had confessed all to the extraordinary committee of twelve. The old man was weak and fickle. When he passed from the hands of one party into those of another, he was easily brought to avow all he had heard or said on the previous occasion, afterwards excusing himself for his breach of confidence by alleging his ignorance of the French language, and weeping, and complaining that he was surrounded by none but factious men.

* The following document is amongst those quoted by M. de Lally-Tolendal in his letter to the King of Prussia:—

"COPY OF THE MINUTES OF A MEETING HELD ON THE 4TH AUGUST 1792, WRITTEN IN THE HAND OF LALLY-TOLENDAL.

4th August.

M. de Montmorin, ex-minister of foreign affairs; M. Bertrand, ex-minister of the marine; M. de Clermont-Tonnerre; M. Lally-Tolendal; M. Malouet; M. de Gouvernet; M. de Gilliers.

Three hours' deliberation in a secluded part of M. Montmorin's garden. Each gave an account of what he had learnt. I had received an anonymous letter, in which I was apprised of a conversation held at the house of Santerre, settling a project for marching upon the Tuileries, killing the king in the fray, and seizing upon the prince-royal, to make of him what circumstances might suggest; or if the king were not killed, for making all the royal family prisoners. We all resolved that the king should leave Paris, at whatsoever cost, escorted by the Swiss, by ourselves, and by our friends, who were in good number. We relied upon M. de Liancourt, who had offered to come from Rouen to meet the king, and afterwards upon M. de Lafayette. As we ended our consultation, M. de Malesherbes arrived, who came to urge Madame de Montmorin, and Madame de Beaumont, her daughter, to withdraw, stating that the crisis was approaching, and that Paris was no longer a place for women. From what M. de Malesherbes told us in addition, we determined that M. de Montmorin should go immediately to the palace, to inform the king what we had learnt and resolved. The king appeared to consent that evening, and told M. de Montmorin to consult with M. de Sainte-Croix, who, in conjunction with M. de Montciel, was likewise occupied with a scheme for the flight of the king. We went the next day to the palace: I had a long conversation with the Duke de Choiseul, who was entirely of our opinion, and greatly desired that the king should depart, whatever might be the consequence, but that he preferred exposing himself to the extremes of danger rather than be the first to open a civil war. It was announced that the deposition would be pronounced the following Thursday. I could think of no other resource than the army of Lafayette. I dispatched to him on the 8th the draft of a letter I advised him to write to the Duke of Brunswick, as soon as he had tidings of the dethronement," et cetera.

† See the Memoirs of Madame Campan, vol. ii. p. 195.

Guadet had the address to make him confess the propositions of Lafayette, and Bureau de Puzy, accused of having been the intermediate agent, was ordered to the bar. He was one of the friends and officers of Lafayette. He denied all with resolute boldness, and with an air of sincerity which was conclusive of his innocence as to the negotiations of his general. The motion for deciding whether Lafayette should be put under impeachment was again adjourned.

The day fixed for the debate on the king's dethronement was drawing nigh, and the plan of the insurrection was definitively settled and known. The Marseillese, quitting their more distant barrack, had moved to the section of the Cordeliers, where the club of that name was held. They were thus placed in the centre of Paris, and in the immediate vicinity of the scene of action. Two municipal officers had been sufficiently daring to distribute cartridges amongst the conspirators. In short, all was ready for the 10th.

The 8th was devoted to deliberation on the fate of Lafayette. A great majority declared against his impeachment. Some deputies, exasperated at the acquittal, demanded a call of votes; and upon this second trial, 446 members had the courage to pronounce in favour of the general against 224. The populace rose in fury at the intelligence, flocked to the door of the hall, insulted the deputies as they came out, and grossly maltreated those, more especially, who were known to belong to the right side of the assembly, such as Vaublanc, Girardin, Dumas, &c. Indignation was loudly expressed in all quarters against the national representation, and Paris rang with the clamour that all hope of safety was at an end with an assembly capable of absolving the traitor Lafayette.

The following day, the 9th August, an extraordinary agitation prevailed amongst the deputies. Those who had been insulted the evening before, complained in person or by letter. When it was stated that M. Beaucaron had been nearly hanged, a barbarous laugh ran through the galleries. When it was added that M. de Girardin had been struck, those who were well aware of the indignity offered to him, asked him, sneeringly, where and how. "Ah! do you not know," retorted M. de Girardin, with dignified asperity, "that cowards never strike but from behind?" At length a member called for the order of the day. But the assembly decided that the procurator-syndic of the commune, Rœderer, should attend at the bar, to be specifically charged, upon his individual responsibility, to vindicate the freedom and inviolability of the members of the assembly.

A motion was made to summon the Mayor of Paris, and insist upon his declaring, yea or nay, whether he could preserve the public tranquillity. Guadet replied to this proposition by one for summoning the king also, and obliging him in his turn to declare, yea or nay, whether he could answer for the safety and inviolability of the French soil. However, amid these conflicting propositions, it was very evident that the assembly dreaded the decisive moment, and that the Girondists themselves would have preferred obtaining the deposition by a debate to having recourse to a doubtful and sanguinary attack.

Rœderer arrived in this state of affairs, and announced that a section had determined to sound the tocsin, and march upon the assembly and the Tuileries, if the deposition were not adjudged. Pétion entered in his turn: his explanations were far from being positive, but he confessed that sinister projects were in agitation; he enumerated the precautions taken to prevent the movements which were threatened, and undertook to co-operate with the department in giving effect to its measures, if they appeared to him more advisable than those of the municipality.

Pétion, like all his Girondist friends, would have rather had the deposition pronounced by the assembly than incur the risks of an uncertain assault upon the palace. A majority in favour of deposition being almost secure, he would have willingly foiled the projects of the insurrectional committee. He accordingly appeared before the committee of superintendence at the Jacobins', and urged Chabot to suspend the insurrection, assuring him that the Girondists had determined upon the dethronement, and the immediate convocation of a national convention; that they were certain of a majority, and that it was useless to hazard an attack with a very doubtful result. Chabot replied that there was nothing to hope from an assembly which had absolved the wretch Lafayette; that he, Pétion, allowed himself to be played upon by his friends; that the people had at last taken the resolution to save themselves, and that the tocsin would ring that very evening in all the faubourgs.

"You will always be headstrong, then," said Pétion in answer. "Evil betide us, if they rise in insurrection! I know your influence, but I have also some, and I will employ it against you." "You will be arrested," observed Chabot, "and prevented from doing any harm."

The passions were in truth too highly excited for the fears of Pétion to be participated, or his influence of any avail. An universal uproar prevailed throughout Paris; drums beat to arms in all the quarters; the battalions of the national guard assembled and repaired to their posts, with various dispositions. The sections were filled, not by the majority, but by the most furious of the citizens. The insurrectional committee had formed at three points. Fournier and some others were in the Faubourg St Marceau; Santerre and Westermann occupied the Faubourg St Antoine; finally, Danton, Camille-Desmoulins, and Carra, sat at the Cordeliers', with the battalion of Marseilles. Barbaroux, after stationing informants at the assembly and the palace, had prepared couriers in readiness to take the route to the south. He had, as an additional precaution, provided himself with a dose of poison, so dubious was the hope of success; and he awaited at the Cordeliers' the result of the insurrection. It is not known where Robespierre lurked: Danton had concealed Marat in a cellar of the section, and then taken possession of the tribune at the Cordelier Club. Every one felt oppressed, as always on the eve of a momentous crisis; but Danton, rising in boldness with the greatness of the enterprise, exalted his sonorous voice to its highest pitch; he enumerated what he styled the crimes of the court; he recalled its hatred for the constitution, its deceitful words, its hypocritical promises, always belied by its conduct, and its palpable machinations to introduce foreigners. "The people," said he, "can no longer rely upon any but themselves, for the constitution is insufficient, and the assembly has absolved Lafayette; therefore, there remain for you only yourselves to save you. Make haste, then, for this very night satellites concealed in the palace are appointed to make a sally on the people, and complete a massacre before quitting Paris to join Coblentz. Save yourselves, therefore. To arms! to arms!"

At this moment a musket-shot was fired in the Court of the Commerce. The cry "to arms!" instantly became general, and the insurrection was proclaimed. The time was half-past eleven. The Marseillese formed at the door of the Cordeliers', appropriated some pieces of cannon, and swelled their numbers by a vast concourse falling in at their sides. Camille-Desmoulins and others rushed away to have the tocsin sounded; but they did not meet with the same ardour in all the sections. They strove without loss of time to arouse their zeal; speedily succeeded in assembling them together, and getting commissioners named to take possession of the town-hall, displace the existing municipality, and concentrate in themselves all authority. Then they flew to the bells, seized upon them by main force, and commenced ringing the tocsin. Its mournful knell resounded through the immense city, reverberating from street to street, and from edifice to edifice, summoning deputies, magistrates, and citizens to their posts, and reaching at length the palace, there to announce that the fatal night was come—a night of terror, of agitation, and of blood, the last appointed for the monarch to pass in the palace of his fathers.

Its emissaries hastened to apprise the court that the critical moment was at hand, bearing with them the phrase of the president of the Cordeliers, who had said to his followers that a simple civic promenade was not now in contemplation, as on the 20th June; or, in other words, that if the 20th June had been the warning demonstration, the 10th August was intended to be the decisive catastrophe. No doubt, indeed, was entertained upon the subject. The king, the queen, their two children, and their sister the princess Elizabeth, instead of retiring to rest after supper, had passed into the council-room, where all the ministers and a great many superior officers were assembled. There they deliberated with troubled minds upon the means of saving the royal family. The means of resistance were but small, having been almost annihilated, either by the decrees of the assembly, or by the ill-judged measures of the court itself.

Thus, the constitutional guard, dissolved by a decree of the assembly, had not been replaced by the king, who had preferred continuing its pay to forming a new one. By this loss the palace was deprived of eighteen hundred men at least.

The regiments which had evinced favourable dispositions towards the king during the last federation, had been removed from Paris by the accustomed method of a decree.

The Swiss could not be sent to a distance, by virtue of their capitulations; but they had been denuded of their artillery; and the court, when it had decided for a moment upon fleeing into Normandy, had dispatched thither one of those faithful battalions, under pretext of watching over the landing of corn. This battalion had not been yet recalled. Merely a few Swiss, cantoned at Courbevoie, had returned, under the sanction of Pétion, and altogether they did not amount to more than eight or nine hundred men.

The gendarmerie had been recently composed of the old soldiers of the French guards, the authors of the 14th July.

Lastly, the national guard had neither the same leaders, nor the same organisation, nor the same attachment, as on the 6th October 1789. Its staff, as we have already remarked, had been reconstructed. A multitude of citizens had grown disgusted with the service; and those who had not actually deserted their colours, were intimidated by the fury of the populace. The national guard was therefore composed, like all the bodies in the kingdom, of a new revolutionary generation. It was divided, as all France was divided, into constitutionalists and republicans. The entire battalion of the Filles Saint-Thomas, and part of that of the Petits-Peres, were devoted to the king, whilst the others were indifferent or hostile. The artillery, which constituted their principal strength, were all decided republicans. The fatigues attendant upon that branch of the service had scared from it the rich bourgeoisie; thus locksmiths and farriers became masters of the cannon, and they participated in all the feelings of the populace, inasmuch as they formed part thereof.

Consequently there remained to the king but eight or nine hundred Swiss, and something more than one battalion of the national guard.

Since the retirement of Lafayette, the command of the national guard had passed alternately to the six legionary leaders. On this day it devolved on the commander Mandat, an old soldier, in bad odour with the court on account of his constitutional opinions, but inspiring it with entire confidence from his firmness, talents, and attachment to his duties. Mandat, general-in-chief during that fatal night, had hastily made the only possible dispositions.

The floor of the grand gallery which joined the Louvre to the Tuileries had been sawn asunder to a certain extent, by way of debarring the assailants from that approach. Mandat therefore gave no further heed to the protection of that wing, but devoted all his attention to the courts and the garden. Notwithstanding the call to muster, but few of the national guards had congregated. The battalions had not been completed, and the most zealous of the body repaired individually to the palace, where Mandat embodied and distributed them conjointly with the Swiss, in the courts, the garden, and the apartments. He fixed a piece of ordnance in the court of the Swiss, and three in that of the princes.

These pieces were unfortunately intrusted to the gunners of the national guard, and the enemy was thus already within the walls. But the Swiss, full of ardour and fidelity, kept an eye upon them, ready at the first hostile movement to seize upon the cannon and expel the artillerymen from the enclosure of the palace.

Mandat had furthermore planted some advanced posts of gendarmerie at the colonnade of the Louvre, and at the town-hall; but this gendarmerie, as we have just remarked, was composed of the former French guards.

To these defenders of the palace must be added a crowd of old retainers, whom their age or their moderation had prevented from emigrating, and who, in the moment of danger, had hastened thither, some with a view to gain absolution for not having gone to Coblentz, and others with the generous intention of dying at the feet of their king. They had hastily snatched up all the weapons they could find at the palace, some appearing with antique sabres, others with pistols attached to their belts by kerchiefs, and some even with the tongs and shovels of the fire-places. Witticisms were not wanting in this dismal moment, when the court had surely enough to make it serious for once. This concourse of useless persons, far from being capable of any service, incommoded the national guard, which regarded them with suspicion, and only tended to increase a confusion already too great.

All the members of the departmental directory had repaired to the palace. The virtuous Duke of Larochefoucauld was there, as likewise Rœderer, the procurator-syndic. Pétion had been summoned also, and he arrived, accompanied by two municipal officers. Pétion was urged to sign an order to repel force by force; and he signed it, to avoid appearing an accomplice of the insurgents. The court congratulated itself on having him within the palace walls, and holding in his person a hostage dear to the people. The assembly, advertised of this purpose, ordered him to the bar by a decree. The king, who was strongly advised to detain him, refused to do so; and he accordingly left the Tuileries without molestation.

The order to repel force by force once obtained, various opinions were volunteered on the manner of using it. In such a state of excitement, it was but natural that extravagant notions should be suggested. There was one of great boldness, and which probably might have been attended with success, namely, to anticipate the assault by dispersing the insurgents, who had not yet assembled in great force, forming, even with the Marseillese, at the utmost a mob of a few thousand men. At this moment, in fact, the Faubourg Saint-Marceau had not congregated; Santerre was hesitating in the Faubourg Saint-Antoine; Danton and the Marseillese alone had been daring enough to meet at the Cordeliers', and they were waiting impatiently on the Saint-Michael bridge for the junction of the other assailants. A vigorous sally might have dislodged and scattered them; and in this moment of hesitation, a sudden panic would have infallibly prevented the insurrection.

Mandat acted upon a more certain and legal plan, which consisted in awaiting the march of the faubourgs, but attacking them on two decisive points as soon as they were in movement. He purposed that when one body debouched on the square in front of the town-hall, by the arcade of Saint-Jean, it should be suddenly charged, and the same tactics adopted at the Louvre against those who should advance by the Pont-Neuf (the New Bridge), along the quay of the Tuileries. With this view, he had ordered the gendarmerie stationed at the colonnade to allow the insurgents to defile past, and afterwards to charge them in the rear, whilst the gendarmerie placed in the Carrousel should fall upon them through the wickets of the Louvre, and make the attack in front. The success of such measures was almost certain. The commanders of the different posts, and especially the one at the town-hall, had already received from Mandat the necessary orders.

It has been previously stated that a new municipality had been formed at the town-hall. Danton and Manuel were the only members of the old body retained. The orders given by Mandat were shown to this insurrectional committee. It instantly summoned that commander to give attendance at the town-hall. The summons was taken to the palace, where the formation of a new commune was unknown. Mandat hesitated to obey; but those around him, and the members of the department themselves, being profoundly ignorant of what had passed, and of opinion that it was not yet time to infringe the law by a refusal to appear, urged him to go. He yielded to their arguments, and delivering to his son, who was with him at the palace, Pétion's order to repel force by force, he departed, in accordance with the summons of the municipality. It was about four o'clock in the morning when he left the palace. The moment he entered the town-hall, he was struck with amazement at finding a new authority installed there. He was immediately surrounded, interrogated respecting the orders he had given, and then dismissed; but in dismissing him, the president made a sinister gesture, indicative of a judgment of death. The unfortunate commander, accordingly, had scarcely reached the street, when he was seized, and laid prostrate by a pistol-ball. His clothes were torn off, but the assassins were disappointed in finding Pétion's order, which he had taken the precaution to leave with his son; and his body was thrown into the river, whither so many corpses were destined speedily to follow.

This bloody deed paralysed all the measures of defence taken at the palace, destroyed all unity of operation, and completely prevented the execution of Mandat's plan. However, affairs were not even yet quite desperate, and the insurrection was far from being entirely organised. The Marseillese, after long and impatiently awaiting the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, without its appearing, had concluded, for a time, that the enterprise had proved abortive. But Westermann, placing his sword on Santerre's breast, had compelled him to march. The faubourgs had then successively come forward, some arriving by the Street Saint-Honoré, others by the New Bridge, the Royal Bridge, and the passages of the Louvre. The Marseillese marched at the head of the columns, with the Breton federalists, keeping their cannon pointed on the palace. To the numerous body of insurgents, swelling with every instant, was added a multitude of curious; and thus the enemy appeared, from the Tuileries, in greater force than it really was. Whilst they were bearing towards the palace, Santerre repaired to the town-hall to receive his nomination as commander-in-chief of the national guards, and Westermann remained on the field of battle to direct the assailants. Thus an extraordinary confusion prevailed in all quarters, and to such an extent, indeed, that Pétion, who, according to the plan fixed upon, was to have been put under the guard of an insurrectional force, was still waiting for the troop intended to shield him from responsibility by an appearance of constraint.

He was obliged to send a communication to the town hall, when at length a few hundred men were dispatched to his door, in order to support the pretence of his being under arrest.

The palace was by this time effectually blockaded. The assailants were on the square, and visible in the dawning light through the antique gates of the courts, and from the windows of the edifice. Their artillery was descried pointing directly on the palace, and within the walls their confused shouts and relentless yells struck its inmates' ears with consternation. The project of anticipating their attack had been again suggested; but when the murder of Mandat was known, the ministers and the directory of the department were of opinion that the assault should be waited for, so that in using force they might be within the strict limits of the law.

Rœderer went through the ranks of the garrison, and issued to the Swiss and the national guards the legal order, enjoining them to refrain from attacking, but to repel force by force. The king was urged to review in person the brave men who were drawn up to defend him. The unfortunate monarch had passed the night in listening to the multifarious and conflicting counsels poured into his ear; and in the rare intervals of quietude, he had offered up prayers to Heaven for his royal consort, his children, and his sister, the objects of all his fears.

"Sire," said the queen to him, with energy, "this is the moment to show yourself." We are even assured that, snatching a pistol from the belt of the aged D'Affry, she somewhat roughly presented it to the king. The eyes of the princess were inflamed with weeping, but her brow seemed loftier than ever, and her nostrils dilated with wrath and haughty pride. As for the king, he dreaded nothing on his own account, and even evinced a perfect coolness in this extreme peril; but he was in the greatest alarm for his family, and the anguish he felt at seeing it thus exposed, had thrown a dismal sadness over his countenance. He nevertheless presented himself with much firmness. He wore a violet dress, and a sword by his side; his hair, which had not been dressed since the day before, was somewhat disordered. On appearing at the balcony, he perceived, without visible emotion, a formidable park of artillery pointed against the edifice. His presence excited a remnant of enthusiasm; the caps of the grenadiers were suddenly hoisted on the points of swords and bayonets, and the ancient cry of "Long live the king!" echoed for the last time under the arches of his paternal palace. A last spark of courage was infused, dejected countenances brightened for a moment, and again there was a fleeting interval of confidence and hope. It was at this instant that some new battalions of the national guard arrived, which had formed later than the others, and now came up, according to the orders previously given by Mandat. They entered whilst the cries of "Long live the king!" were resounding in the court. Some joined in these salutations to the monarch, whilst others, being of very opposite sentiments, believed themselves in danger, and recalling all the popular fables they had heard, imagined they were about to be delivered up to the knights of the dagger. They immediately shouted out that the wretch Mandat had betrayed them, and thus excited a species of tumult. The artillerymen, instigated by the example, turned their pieces against the front of the palace. A contest forthwith ensued with the loyal battalions; the artillerymen were disarmed, and transferred to a detachment, and the new comers were conducted to the gardens.

After having shown himself on the balcony, the king descended the staircase to hold a review in the courts. His approach was proclaimed, and all fell into their ranks. He passed along them with a tranquil countenance, throwing upon each an expressive look, which penetrated every heart. Addressing himself to the soldiers, he told them, in a firm voice, that he was deeply sensible of their attachment, that he would remain at their side, and that, whilst defending him they defended also their wives and children. He afterwards traversed the vestibule to proceed into the garden, but at that very moment he heard the cry of "Down with the veto!" shouted by one of the battalions which had just entered. Two officers who were attending him wished him to abstain from holding the review in the garden, whilst others entreated him to visit the post of the Turning-Bridge. He at once consented to the latter proposal, although he was obliged to pass along the terrace of the Feuillants, crowded with people. In crossing this space, he was only separated from the infuriated mob by a tricoloured string; and as he advanced, all sorts of insulting and outrageous expressions were heaped upon him. He had even the mortification to behold the battalions move off, march down the garden, and issue out of it before his eyes, with the intention of swelling the ranks of the assailants on the square of the Carrousel.

This desertion, that of the artillerymen, and the shouts of "Down with the veto," extinguished all hope in the breast of the king. At the same time, the gendarmes stationed at the colonnade of the Louvre and elsewhere, had either dispersed or joined the people. The national guards, likewise, who occupied the apartments, and on whose fidelity it was thought implicit reliance might be placed, were discontented at being associated with gentlemen, and openly manifested distrust of them. The queen endeavoured to remove these impressions. "Grenadiers," she exclaimed, pointing to those gentlemen, "they are your comrades; they have come to die by your side." But, in spite of this apparent courage, her soul was filled with despair. The review had ruined all, and she complained bitterly that the king had shown no energy. We are bound to repeat, however, that the king had no apprehensions for himself; he had, in fact, refused to wear a coat of mail as on the 14th July, saying, that on a day of battle he must be uncovered like the meanest of his servants. Courage, therefore, was not deficient in him, as he afterwards evinced in a truly noble spirit; but boldness in the offensive failed him, and he lacked consistency also, in trembling at the idea of bloodshed, when he had consented to an invasion of France by foreigners. It is certain, meanwhile, as has been often asserted, that if he had mounted on horseback, and made a charge at the head of his soldiers, the insurrection would have been quelled.

The members of the department, perceiving the universal disorder prevailing in the palace, and despairing of a successful resistance, now presented themselves to the king, and advised him to retire into the hall of the assembly. This advice, so often and so harshly censured—the common fate, indeed, of all counsels given to kings which turn out inauspiciously—was the only feasible one at the moment. By this retreat, all effusion of blood would be prevented, and the royal family escape an almost certain death should the palace be taken by assault. And in the actual position of affairs, the success of that assault was not doubtful; but had it even been so, the doubt itself was sufficient to warrant a timely withdrawal from its hazard.

The queen vehemently opposed the project, however. "Madam," said Rœderer to her, "you would expose the lives of your consort and of your children; reflect on the responsibility you take upon yourself." An altercation of some warmth ensued. At last the king decided upon retiring into the assembly; and, turning to his family and those around him, he said, with an air of resignation, "Let us go." "You answer, sir, for the lives of the king and my children," said the queen, addressing Rœderer. "Madam," replied the procurator-syndic, "I answer for my dying at their side, but I promise nothing more."

The whole party then prepared to move off towards the assembly, by the garden, the terrace of the Feuillants, and the court of the Manège. All the gentlemen and the servants of the palace rushed forward to follow the king, although they were likely to endanger his safety, by irritating the people, and raising the bile of the assembly by their presence. Rœderer used fruitless endeavours to stop them, repeating to them, with all his strength, that they would cause the massacre of the royal family. He succeeded at length in detaching a considerable number, and the party commenced its march. A detachment of Swiss and of national guards accompanied the king. A deputation from the assembly came to receive him, and conduct him within its precincts. At this moment the crowd was so great that all progress was stopped. A grenadier of lofty stature took up the dauphin, and raising him in his arms, penetrated through the multitude, bearing him above his head. The queen, at this sight, imagined he was carrying off her son, and uttered a shriek, but her fears were speedily calmed. The grenadier entered the hall, and deposited the royal child on the table of the assembly.

The king and his family shortly followed, accompanied by two ministers. "I come," said Louis XVI., "for the purpose of preventing a great crime, and I believe, gentlemen, that I cannot be in greater safety than in the midst of you."

Vergniaud presided. He replied to the monarch, that he might rely on the firmness of the national assembly, and that its members had sworn to die in defence of the constituted authorities.

The king seated himself by the side of the president; but on the observation of Chabot, that his presence might interfere with the freedom of debate, he was placed in the box of the reporter employed to take down the proceedings.* The iron rail in front was directed to be broken down, in order that if the box were attacked, he and his family might fly without impediment into the midst of the assembly. The king assisted with his own hands in the work of demolition; the railing was overturned, and the insults and menaces thus rolled more freely into the last asylum of the dethroned monarch.

Rœderer then gave a recital of what had passed; he depicted in strong colours the fury of the multitude, and the dangers to which the palace was exposed, the courts of which were already forcibly occupied. The assembly thereupon ordered that twenty commissioners should proceed to tranquillise the people. They being named, forthwith departed. All at once a discharge of cannon was heard. Consternation pervaded the whole assembly. "I have to apprise you," said the king, "that I have just prohibited the Swiss from firing." But the roar of cannon was again heard, mingled with the report of fire-arms. Dismay was at its height. The next moment it was announced that the commissioners deputed by the assembly had been put to flight. Then the door of the hall was assailed, and loud and repeated blows resounded on its pannels, whilst at one of the side entrances armed citizens actually appeared. "We are stormed!" exclaimed a municipal officer. The president put on his hat; a number of deputies sprang from their seats to expel the intruders; by degrees the tumult subsided, and amidst the uninterrupted rolling of cannon and musketry, the deputies raised their voices and shouted—"The nation, liberty, equality, for ever!"

A most sanguinary conflict meanwhile had been proceeding at the palace. When the king quitted it, it was naturally concluded that the people would cease from seeking vengeance on a forsaken residence; and, furthermore, the confusion in which all things and minds were involved had prevented due attention being paid to it, and no order had been given for its evacuation. Simply, the troops which occupied the courts were drawn into the interior of the palace, and confusedly scattered through the apartments, commingled with domestics, gentlemen, and officers. A prodigious crowd thronged the palace, and, notwithstanding its vast extent, it was scarcely possible to move a step.

The populace, who were perhaps ignorant of the king's retreat, after waiting for some time before the principal barrier, at length attacked the gate, broke it open with axes, and rushed into the royal court. They then formed in column, and turned against the palace the pieces of ordnance imprudently left in the court after the withdrawal of the troops. However, they refrained as yet from commencing an assault. On the contrary, they made amicable demonstrations to the soldiers at the windows: "Yield us the palace," they cried, "and we are friends!" The Swiss manifested pacific intentions, and threw their cartridges out of the windows. Some of the assailants, more audacious than their comrades, broke out of column, and advanced to the vestibule of the palace. At the foot of the grand staircase, some timber had been thrown up in the form of a barricade, behind which Swiss soldiers and national guards had stationed themselves without any attempt at order. Those who came up from the mob outside endeavoured to penetrate farther and to clear the barricade. After a contest of some duration, which did not lead, however, to actual combat, the barrier was thrown down. Then the assailants crowded up the staircase, with repeated exclamations that the palace must be delivered up to them. It is asserted that at this moment some of the pikemen, who had remained in the court, grappled certain Swiss sentinels on duty outside with hooks, and massacred them; and it is likewise stated that a musket-ball was fired against the windows, which the Swiss, in a moment of indignation, returned by a general discharge. At this very instant, in fact, the palace resounded with a terrific volley, and those of the people who had entered fled with cries that they were betrayed. It is difficult to ascertain with precision, amidst so great a confusion, from which side the first shots were fired. The assailants have asserted that they advanced amicably, and when entangled in the palace, to have been treacherously attacked and mowed down; which allegation is void of probability, for the Swiss were not in a position to provoke a combat. Having no longer any obligation to fight after the departure of the king, their great object would necessarily be to save themselves, and assuredly a useless piece of treachery was not the way to gain their purpose. Besides, even could an act of aggression, distinctly proved, in the smallest degree alter the moral character of these events, it must always be confessed that the first and real aggression, that is to say, the attack on the palace itself, came from the insurgent mob. What ensued was nothing but an inevitable accident, and attributable to chance alone. But, howsoever the case may be, those who had advanced into the vestibule and up the staircase, were startled by a sudden discharge, and whilst they were flying in precipitation, received on the very stairs a shower of bullets. After this, the Swiss came down in good order, and when they reached the foot of the staircase, debouched by the vestibule into the royal court. There they seized upon one of the cannon planted in the court, and, in spite of a galling fire, wheeled it round, and discharged it upon the Marseillese, a considerable number of whom fell in consequence. The Marseillese recoiled, and the fire continuing, they abandoned the court. A panic immediately spread amongst the people, who fled on all sides, and sought shelter in the faubourgs. If at this moment the Swiss had pursued their advantage, if the gendarmes stationed at the Louvre, instead of having deserted their posts, had charged the routed insurgents, the affair had been concluded, and victory left with the palace.

* ["This box was the one occupied by the agents of the editor of a newspaper called The Logographe, and was but ten feet square and six feet high."—Bertrand, vol. vii. p. 159.]

But the order of the king, conveying a prohibition to fire, which he had intrusted to M. d'Hervilly, was produced at this critical instant. M. d'Hervilly succeeded in reaching the vestibule precisely as the Swiss had repulsed the assailants. He stopped their further proceedings, and commanded them, on the part of the king, to accompany him to the assembly. Accordingly they followed him, in considerable numbers, to the Feuillants', exposed to a most murderous discharge. The palace was thus deprived of the major part of its defenders. There still remained, however, both upon the staircase and in the apartments, a large body of Swiss, to whom the order was not communicated, and who were soon exposed, without means of résistance, to the unbridled fury of popular vengeance.

The insurgents had speedily rallied. The Marseillese and Bretons, indignant at having yielded, encouraged each other, and returned to the charge with whetted rage. Westermann, who afterwards displayed striking qualities, directed their efforts with ability. They pressed recklessly forward, fell in great numbers, but at length gained the vestibule, carried the staircase, and became masters of the palace. The rabble, with pikes, closely followed in their train, and the rest of the scene soon became nothing but a massacre. The wretched Swiss vainly implored pity, throwing down their arms; they were mercilessly hewn down. The palace was set on fire; the servants who filled it were attacked; some escaped by flight, others were immolated. Amongst the mob were some generous victors. "Mercy to women!" exclaimed one of them; "you would dishonour the nation!"—and he rescued some ladies in waiting on the queen, who were on their knees beneath uplifted swords. Many of the victims sold their lives dearly, and others had the ingenuity to save themselves, when defence was a useless heroism. Even amongst these furious assailants, feelings of honesty prevailed; all the valuables found in the palace, either from popular bravado, or from the disinterestedness attendant on enthusiasm, were borne to the assembly.

The assembly had remained in deep anxiety, awaiting the issue of the struggle. At last, about eleven o'clock, the cries of victory, a thousand times repeated, put an end to suspense. The doors gave way to the pressure of a multitude drunk with rapture and the fury of strife. The hall was strewed with the trophies they bore, and crowded with the Swiss whom they had made prisoners, and to whom life had been spared, with the view of presenting to the assembly an acceptable offering of popular moderation. The king and his family, enclosed in the narrow box of a reporter, were present all this while, the melancholy witnesses of the ruin of the throne and the savage joy of their conquerors. Vergniaud had quitted the presidency for an interval, to draw up the decree of deposition; he now returned, and the assembly passed that celebrated decree, according to which

Louis XVI. was provisionally suspended from the royalty:

A plan of education was ordered for the prince-royal:

A national convention was convoked.

Where now are the proofs of a project long formed to overturn the monarchy, when the king was only suspended, and the education of the young prince specifically designed? With what apprehension, on the contrary, was that ancient institution touched! With what hesitation, so to speak, was that growth of ages assailed, under which so many generations of Frenchmen had been alternately happy and unhappy, but under which they had at least lived!

Public imagination, however, is swift in its flights. But little time was needed to extinguish the last remnants of former reverence, and the suspended monarchy soon became the destroyed monarchy. It was to perish, not in the person of a Louis XI., of a Charles IX., or of a Louis XIV., but in that of Louis XVI., one of the most honest kings who ever sat on a throne.

CHAPTER XII.

SITUATION OF PARTIES WITHIN AND WITHOUT THE ASSEMBLY AFTER THE 10TH AUGUST.—TAKING OF LONGWY BY THE PRUSSIANS.—MASSACRES OF SEPTEMBER, AND THEIR PRINCIPAL CIRCUMSTANCES.

The Swiss had courageously defended the Tuileries, but their resistance was fruitless; the grand staircase had been stormed, and the palace taken. The people, now victorious, penetrated from all sides into that abode of royalty, in which they had always supposed countless treasures to be amassed, a felicity more than mortal, a power mysterious and mighty, and designs ever hatching fruitful with national wo. What vengeance there was to wreak all at once on wealth, grandeur, and power!

Eighty Swiss grenadiers, who had not had time to retreat, maintained a desperate struggle for life, but were remorselessly cut down. The multitude pressed into the apartments, and fell with savage wrath on those useless friends, who had gathered to defend the king, and had long been objects of popular execration, under the title of knights of the dagger. Their clumsy weapons served only to exasperate the conquerors, and to give an air of greater probability to the designs charged upon the court. Every door that was closed fell beneath the blows of hatchets. Two ushers, opposing access to the great council-chamber, willing to sacrifice themselves to etiquette, were massacred in an instant. The numerous servants of the royal family fled tumultuously along the vast galleries, threw themselves from the windows, or sought, in the immensity of the edifice, some obscure nook to protect their lives. The queen's women took refuge in one of her apartments, fearing every moment to be attacked in their asylum. The Princess de Tarente caused the doors to be thrown open, hoping to propitiate the assailants by offering no impediment. They soon appeared, and seized upon one of the females. The sword was already raised above her head. "Spare the women!" exclaimed a voice; "avoid dishonouring the nation!" At these words the sword dropped; the ladies of the queen were saved and conducted out of the palace by the very men who had been on the point of assassinating them, and who, with true popular instability, now acted as their escort, and displayed ingenious devotion in screening them from the fury of their confederates. After the slaughter, the work of devastation commenced; the magnificent furniture was broken, and the wrecks cast far and wide. The mob overran the private apartments of the queen, and indulged in the most indecent mirth; it penetrated into the most secluded spots, dived into all the cabinets, shattered to pieces all the pannels, and glutted the double passion of curiosity and destructiveness. To the horrors of murder and pillage was added that of fire. The flames, having already consumed the sheds erected in the outer courts, began to reach the edifice, and threatened with complete destruction that imposing sojourn of royalty. The desolation was not limited to these ample but now dismal confines; it extended beyond. The streets were strewed with wrecks and corpses. Whoever fled, or was supposed to fly, suggested the idea of an enemy, and was pursued with musket-shots. An incessant noise of musketry had succeeded to the roar of cannon, and marked fresh murders with every volley. How many are the horrors of a victory, whosoever may be the vanquished or the victors, and whatsoever the cause for which the battle has raged!

The executive power being dissolved by the suspension of Louis XVI., there remained in Paris but two authorities, the commune and the assembly. It has been already stated, in describing the preparations for the 10th of August, that certain deputies of the sections, having assembled at the town-hall, had seized upon the municipal power to the exclusion of the former magistrates, and directed the insurrection during that night and day. They possessed the real physical force, they wielded all the dominion of victory, and were the representatives of that new and ardent revolutionary class, which had been struggling the whole session against the inertness of that other class of men, more enlightened but less active, of which the Legislative Assembly was composed. The first care of the deputies of the sections was to depose all the superior bodies, which, being nearer the supreme power, were in consequence more attached to it. They had suspended the staff of the national guard, disorganised the defence of the Tuileries by drawing Mandat from his post, and given to Santerre the command of the national guard. They had not been less hasty in suspending the administration of the department, which, from the higher position it occupied, had always thwarted the popular passions, since it in no degree participated in them. As to the municipality, they had suppressed the council-general, and taken to themselves its authority, retaining only the mayor Pétion, the procurator-syndic Manuel, and the sixteen municipal administrators. All these operations had been effected during the siege of the palace. Danton had daringly directed their stormy sitting; and when the fire of the Swiss sent the multitude flying along the quays, even to the town-hall, he had rushed out, saying, "Our brethren are seeking aid; let us supply them with it." His presence had contributed to lead back the people to the scene of action, and to decide the victory. When the contest was over, it was proposed to deliver Pétion from his constraint, and restore him to his functions of mayor. But, either from a genuine interest in his safety, or from an apprehension of giving themselves a chief too scrupulous for the first moments of an insurrection, they decided he should be guarded for a day or two longer, under pretext of securing his life from all danger. They likewise removed from the hall of the council-general the busts of Louis XVI., Bailly, and Lafayette. The new class on the rise thus discarded the first revolutionary mementos, in order to substitute others of its own.

The insurgents of the commune naturally sought to bring themselves into relation with the assembly. It is true they reproached it with vacillation, and even with royalism; but they perceived in it the only sovereign authority actually existing, and were not at all disposed to depreciate it. Very early on the 10th, indeed, a deputation appeared at its bar, to announce the formation of the insurrectional commune, and give a detail of what had been done. Danton was one of that deputation. "The people who send us to you," said he, "have charged us to inform you, that they still believe you worthy of their confidence; but that they refuse to recognise any other judge of the extraordinary measures necessity has compelled them to adopt than the French people, our sovereign and yours, when met in the primary assemblies."

The assembly replied to this deputation, through its president, to the effect that it approved of all that had been done, and that it recommended the commune to promote peace and order. It furthermore communicated the decrees passed during the day, with a request to disseminate them. It afterwards drew up a proclamation, inculcating the respect due to life and property, and commissioned some of its members to carry it amongst the people.

The principal object of the assembly at this moment was necessarily to provide a substitute for dethroned royalty. The ministers, comprehended under the title of Executive Council, were provisionally charged by it with the labours of administration and the execution of the laws. The minister of justice, holder of the seal of state, was appointed to affix it to decrees, and promulgate them in the name of the legislative authority. It then became necessary to select the individuals who should compose the ministry. The names of Roland, Servan, and Clavière, instantly suggested themselves, for they had been dismissed on account of their attachment to the popular cause, and the tendency of the new revolution was inevitably to promote all that royalty had degraded. These three ministers were consequently unanimously appointed—Roland to the interior, Servan to the war, and Clavière to the financial department. Ministers of justice, of foreign affairs, and of the marine, were still to be named. Here the choice was free, and any prepossessions in favour of obscure merit, or of ardent patriotism which had incurred the displeasure of the court, might be gratified without impediment. Danton, so puissant over the multitude, and so important a character during the last eventful hours, was judged necessary; and, although distasteful to the Girondists as an idol of the populace, he was nominated minister of justice by a majority of 222 votes out of 284 actually present. After having given this satisfaction to the multitude, and rewarded energy with so high an office, they proceeded to place a man of knowledge at the board of admiralty. This was the mathematician Monge, a learned personage, well known to and appreciated by Condorcet, and appointed on his motion. Lastly, Le Brun was named to the portfolio of foreign affairs; and in his person was recompensed one of those laborious men who did all the work of which former ministers had monopolised the credit.

After having thus, in a form, reintegrated the executive power, the assembly adopted a resolution that all the decrees to which Louis XVI. had affixed his veto should be held to possess the force of laws. The formation of a camp below Paris, the object of one of those decrees, and the occasion of such warm discussions, was ordained at once; and the cannoneers received authority, at the same time, to plant esplanades on the heights of Montmartre. So soon as the revolution was perfected at Paris, the next indispensable step was to assure its success in the departments, and above all in the armies, where suspected generals held commands. Commissioners selected from the assembly were appointed to repair to the provinces and the armies, in order to explain to them the events of the 10th August; and powers were vested in those deputies to supersede any civil or military officers they might deem necessary.

A few hours sufficed for all these decrees; and whilst the assembly was busied in framing and passing them, other objects incessantly arose to distract its attention. The valuable effects taken from the Tuileries were transported into its hall; the Swiss, the retainers of the palace, all the individuals arrested in their flight, or rescued from the fury of the people, were conducted to its bar as to a place of sanctuary. Bands of petitioners came, one after the other, to report what they had done or seen, and to recount their discoveries on the supposed plots of the court. Accusations and invectives of all kinds were vociferated against the royal family, who heard the whole from the cramped corner into which it had been thrust. Louis XVI. listened with placidity to all the speeches, and conversed at intervals with Vergniaud and other deputies who sat in his immediate proximity. Shut up in that narrow box for fifteen hours, he had requested some refreshments, of which he partook with his wife and children, thereby provoking disgraceful observations on the zest with which he was reported to indulge in the pleasures of the table. When do victorious parties spare misfortune its bitterest humiliation? The young dauphin, stretched on the bosom of his mother, slept soundly, overcome with the suffocating heat. The young princess-royal and Madame Elizabeth, their eyes swoln with tears, were by the side of the queen. In the back of the box were certain devoted nobles, whom reverse of fortune had not scared away. Fifty men, taken from the detachment which had escorted the royal family from the palace to the assembly, served as a guard around the party. It was from the midst of this group that the deposed monarch contemplated the spoils torn from his palace, and beheld the dismemberment of his ancient power, and the distribution of its fragments amongst the different popular authorities.

The tumult still continued with unabated violence for, in the opinion of the populace, it was not enough to have suspended royalty, it was necessary to destroy it. Petitions quickly succeeded each other on this subject; and whilst waiting for a reply, the multitude raged outside the hall, blocked up the passages, besieged the doors, and twice or thrice attacked them so violently as to induce a belief they were forced, and to excite apprehensions for the unfortunate family which had been consigned to the guardianship of the assembly. Henry Larivière, being dispatched with other commissioners to tranquillise the people, returned at this instant and exclaimed with a loud voice, "Yes, gentlemen, I know it, I have seen it—I assure you, the people are determined to perish a thousand times rather than dishonour liberty by any act of inhumanity; and most assuredly, there is not one person here present—and my words will be understood—that may not implicitly rely on French honour." This bold and encouraging speech was loudly applauded. Vergniaud spoke in his turn, and replied to the petitioners, who demanded that the suspension should be rendered a deposition. "I am delighted," said he, "that an occasion is afforded me to explain the views of the assembly in the presence of the citizens. It has decreed the suspension of the executive power, and convoked a convention to decide irrevocably on the great question of dethronement. In this it has kept within its powers, which do not permit it to sit in judgment on royalty; and it has provided for the safety of the state, by removing from the executive power the possibility of doing harm. It has thus satisfied all wants, without overstepping the limits of its functions." These words produced a favourable impression, and the petitioners themselves, struck by their force, undertook to instruct and appease the people.

It was at last felt indispensable to bring this prolonged sitting to a close. The assembly consequently ordered that the effects brought from the palace should be deposited with the commune; that the Swiss, and all other detained persons, should either be guarded at the Feuillants', or transferred to different places of confinement; and, lastly, that the royal family should be kept at the Luxumbourg until the meeting of the national convention, but that, whilst the necessary preparations were making for its reception, it should be lodged in the immediate locality of the assembly. At one o'clock in the morning of Saturday the 11th, the royal family was removed into the lodging destined for it, and which consisted of four cells belonging to the old Feuillants. The nobles who had kept by the king occupied the first; the king the second; the queen, his sister, and his children, the two others. The wife of the keeper attended upon the princesses, and officiated in lieu of that numerous train of ladies, who, the evening before, had emulated each other in zeal for their service.

At three in the morning the sitting was suspended. Uproar still prevailed throughout Paris. To avert riots, the environs of the palace were illuminated, and most of the citizens remained under arms.

Such was that celebrated day, and such its immediate results. The king and his family were prisoners at the Feuillants', and the three disgraced ministers replaced in office; Danton, burrowing the day before in an obscure club, was minister of justice; Pétion was consigned to his own house, but his name, proclaimed with enthusiasm, was gilded with the appellation of "Father of the people." Marat, arisen from the secret hole in which Danton had ensconced him during the attack, and armed with a sabre, paraded through Paris at the head of the Marseillese battalion. Robespierre, whom we have been unable to trace during those terrible scenes, harangued at the Jacobins', and discoursed to some members around him on the uses to be made of the victory, on the necessity of superseding the actual assembly, and of putting Lafayette under impeachment.

The following day, it was still found necessary to take measures for calming the excited populace, who continued to massacre all whom it took for fugitive aristocrats.* The assembly resumed its sitting at seven in the morning of the 11th. The royal family was replaced in the box of the Logographe, to witness the decrees that were about to be passed, and the scenes to be enacted in the legislative hall. Pétion, freed and escorted by a numerous mob, came to give an account of the state of Paris, which he had traversed, and where he had laboured to infuse the spirit of peace and order. Certain citizens had constituted themselves his guards, to protect a life deemed so precious. Pétion was warmly congratulated by the assembly, and took his departure to continue his pacific exhortations. The Swiss, remitted the evening before to the Feuillants', were threatened with imminent danger. The populace demanded their death with loud cries, calling them accomplices of the palace and assassins of the people. The assembly succeeded in quieting the popular wrath by an announcement that the Swiss would be tried, and that a court-martial was about to be formed for the punishment of those who were stigmatised as "the conspirators of the 10th August." "I demand," shouted the furious Chabot, "that they be conducted to the Abbey in order to be tried. In the land of equality, the law strikes at all persons, even those seated on a throne." The officers had been already transferred to the Abbey, and the soldiers were sent thither in their turn. This was accomplished with infinite difficulty, and the populace required repeated promises that they would be promptly judged.

Thus we see the idea of taking vengeance on all the defenders of royalty, and of visiting on them the dangers the insurgents had incurred, was already aroused in the public mind, and was shortly to originate rancorous divisions. In following the progress of the revolution, we have previously discerned the seeds of those differences which had begun to arise amongst the popular party. We have seen the assembly, composed of enlightened and sedate men, placed in a position of resistance to the clubs and municipalities, in which were congregrated men inferior in education and in talents, but who, from their very station, their less refined manners, and their inordinate ambition, were led to agitate and precipitate events. We have seen, that on the eve of the 10th August, Chabot differed in opinion with Pétion, who, in unison with the majority of the assembly, was desirous that a decree of deposition should be preferred to an attack by open force. Those men, therefore, who had recommended extreme measures of energy, were the following day in an attitude almost antagonistic to the assembly, elated with a victory gained in spite of it, as it were, and reminding it, in terms of equivocal respect, that it had absolved Lafayette, and must take care not again to compromise the safety of the people by any fresh weakness. They filled the commune, where they had as their colleagues ambitious citizens, subordinate agitators, and clubbists; they ruled at the Jacobins' and Cordeliers', and some amongst them sat on the extreme benches of the legislative body. The Capuchin Chabot, the most furious of all, passed alternately from the tribune of the assembly to that of the Jacobins, and talked incessantly of pikes and the tocsin.

* ["In the long list of the victims of this horrid day was M. de Clermont-Tonnerre, one of the members of the first assembly, most distinguished for his talents, his errors, and his endeavours to atone for them. M. Carle, colonel of the gendarmerie, also lost his life for the proofs of attachment he had given to the king. Bertrand, vol. vii. p. 199.]

The assembly had pronounced the suspension, and these more relentless characters claimed the deposition; by naming a governor for the dauphin, it had contemplated royalty, and they were eager for a republic; it held in its majority that an active defence should be made against foreigners, but that mercy should be shown to the vanquished; they maintained, on the contrary, that not only must the foreigner be resisted, but also vengeance wreaked on those, who, intrenched in the palace, had designed to massacre the people, and bring the Prussians to Paris. Rising in their ardour to the most extreme ideas, they argued that the electoral bodies were not necessary to form the new assembly, but that all the citizens ought to be deemed competent to vote. One Jacobin even proposed that political rights should be given to women. They proclaimed aloud, in short, that the people must appear in arms to manifest their wishes to the legislative body. Marat strove to stimulate this raging effervescence and the cry for vengeance, because he judged, according to his hateful system, that it was expedient to purge France. Robespierre, less from any system founded on the idea of purification, or from any innate thirst for blood, than from envy towards the assembly, heaped upon it reproaches of weakness and royalism. Extolled by the Jacobins, and proposed before the 10th August as the indispensable dictator, he was now proclaimed as the most eloquent and incorruptible defender of the rights of the people. Danton, concerning himself neither about being praised nor listened to, and without having ever aspired to the dictatorship, had nevertheless decided the day on the 10th August by his indomitable daring. And now, again, despising all parade, he thought only of swaying the executive council, of which he was a member, by overawing or leading his colleagues. Incapable of hatred or envy, he entertained no bad feeling against those deputies whose fame mortified Robespierre; but he contemned them as inert, and preferred those energetic men of the inferior classes, upon whom he placed greater reliance for maintaining and consummating the revolution.

These divisions were not suspected out of Paris. All that the public of France could discern was the resistance of the assembly to demands of too extreme a character, and the absolution of Lafayette, pronounced in spite of the commune and the Jacobins. But all was attributed to the royalist and Feuillant majority; the Girondists were still admired, Brissot and Robespierre equally esteemed, and Pétion especially adored as the mayor so maltreated by the court. It was not canvassed, for it was not known, that Pétion appeared too moderate to Chabot, that he wounded the pride of Robespierre, that he was viewed as a useless and honest man by Danton, and as a conspirator, amenable to purification, by Marat. Pétion was, indeed, still encompassed by the applauses of the people; but, like Bailly after the 14th July, he was soon to be considered vexatious and odious, by condemning excesses he was impotent to prevent.

The principal coalition of the new revolutionists was formed at the Jacobin Club and at the commune. All projects were proposed and discussed at the Jacobins'; and the same men afterwards came to execute at the town-hall, by means of their municipal functions, what they could simply propound in their club. The council-general of the commune composed of itself a species of assembly, equally numerous with the legislative body, having also its tribunes, its officers, its yet more vociferous applauders, and an actual power much more considerable. The mayor was its president, and the procurator-syndic its official spokesman, charged to submit all necessary requisitions. Pétion had already withdrawn his attendance, and confined himself to the superintendence of the subsistence department. The procurator Manuel, yielding more to the revolutionary flood, took a conspicuous part in its proceedings every day. But the person who exercised the greatest sway in this assemblage was Robespierre. Standing apart during the three first days succeeding the 10th August, he had repaired thither only after the insurrection was consummated; and, presenting himself at the table to have his powers verified, he seemed as if come to take possession of a rightful dominion, rather than to submit his qualification. His reserve, far from displeasing, only augmented the respect manifested towards him. His reputation for talents, integrity, and perseverance, invested him with a grave and respectable character, such as the assembled citizens were proud of possessing amongst them. During the interval to elapse before the meeting of the convention, of which he felt sure of being elected a member, he proceeded to exercise a power in the commune more substantial than the influence of opinion he already enjoyed at the Jacobin Club.

One of the first cares of the commune was to take the police department into its own hands; for in periods of civil strife, the power of arresting and criminating enemies is the most important and valued of privileges. The justices of peace, who had hitherto in part possessed it, had incurred odium by their proceedings against popular agitators, and thus stood, whether voluntarily or not, in hostility to the patriots. He especially was called to mind who, in the affair between Bertrand de Molleville and the journalist Carra, had dared to cite two deputies. The justices of peace, therefore, were dismissed, and all their functions relative to the police transferred to the municipal authorities. In agreement on this point with the commune of Paris, the assembly passed a decree, ordaining that the police, intituled "of general safety," should be vested in the departments, districts, and municipalities. This police was to consist in investigating all delinquencies endangering the internal and external safety of the state, in drawing up a list of citizens suspected on account of their opinions or their conduct, in arresting them provisionally, and in dispersing and disarming them, if any necessity for so doing should arise. The councils of the municipalities were the parties destined to exercise this ministry, and the entire mass of the citizens was thus called upon to observe, to denounce, and to persecute the hostile party. It may be conceived that this democratic police would necessarily be singularly active, but likewise rigorous and arbitrary. The whole council was to receive the denunciations, and a committee of surveillance to examine them, and order the arrests. The national guards were put in permanent requisition, and the municipalities of all towns containing upwards of 20,000 inhabitants were empowered to add peculiar regulations to this law of general safety. The Legislative Assembly, unquestionably, had no idea of preparing the way by this measure for the massacres which subsequently took place; but, surrounded by enemies within and without, it summoned all the citizens to keep watch upon them, in like manner as it had called them all to combat and participate in the administration.

The commune of Paris hastened to exercise these new powers, and made numerous arrests. Its members appeared in the light of conquerors still exasperated at the dangers just overcome, and at those yet greater they had to encounter, who seized upon their enemies, beaten down for the moment, but probably soon to rise again by the aid of foreigners. The surveillance committee of the commune of Paris was composed of the most violent persons. Marat, who, during the course of the revolution, had so recklessly thundered his anathemas, was the chairman of that committee, and of all men he was the most formidable when invested with such functions.

Besides this principal committee, the commune of Paris instituted a particular one in each section. It decreed that passports should be granted only upon the investigation of the sectional assemblies; that travellers should be accompanied, either to the municipality, or to the gates of Paris, by two witnesses, who should attest the identity of the person who had demanded the passport, with that of him who used it for departure. It thus endeavoured, by the most stringent means, to prevent the escape of the suspected under fictitious names. It subsequently ordered that a catalogue should be drawn up of the enemies of the revolution, and invited the citizens, by proclamation, to denounce the criminals of the 10th August. It caused the editors who had supported the royal cause to be arrested, and gave their printing-presses to the patriot editors. Marat got four presses restored to him in triumph, which he alleged had been taken from him by the orders of the traitor Lafayette. Commissioners visited the prisons to set at liberty those who were incarcerated for exclamations and harangues against the court. Lastly, always on the alert to extend its influence, the commune, after the example of the assembly, dispatched deputies to gain over the army of Lafayette, concerning which much uneasiness was felt.

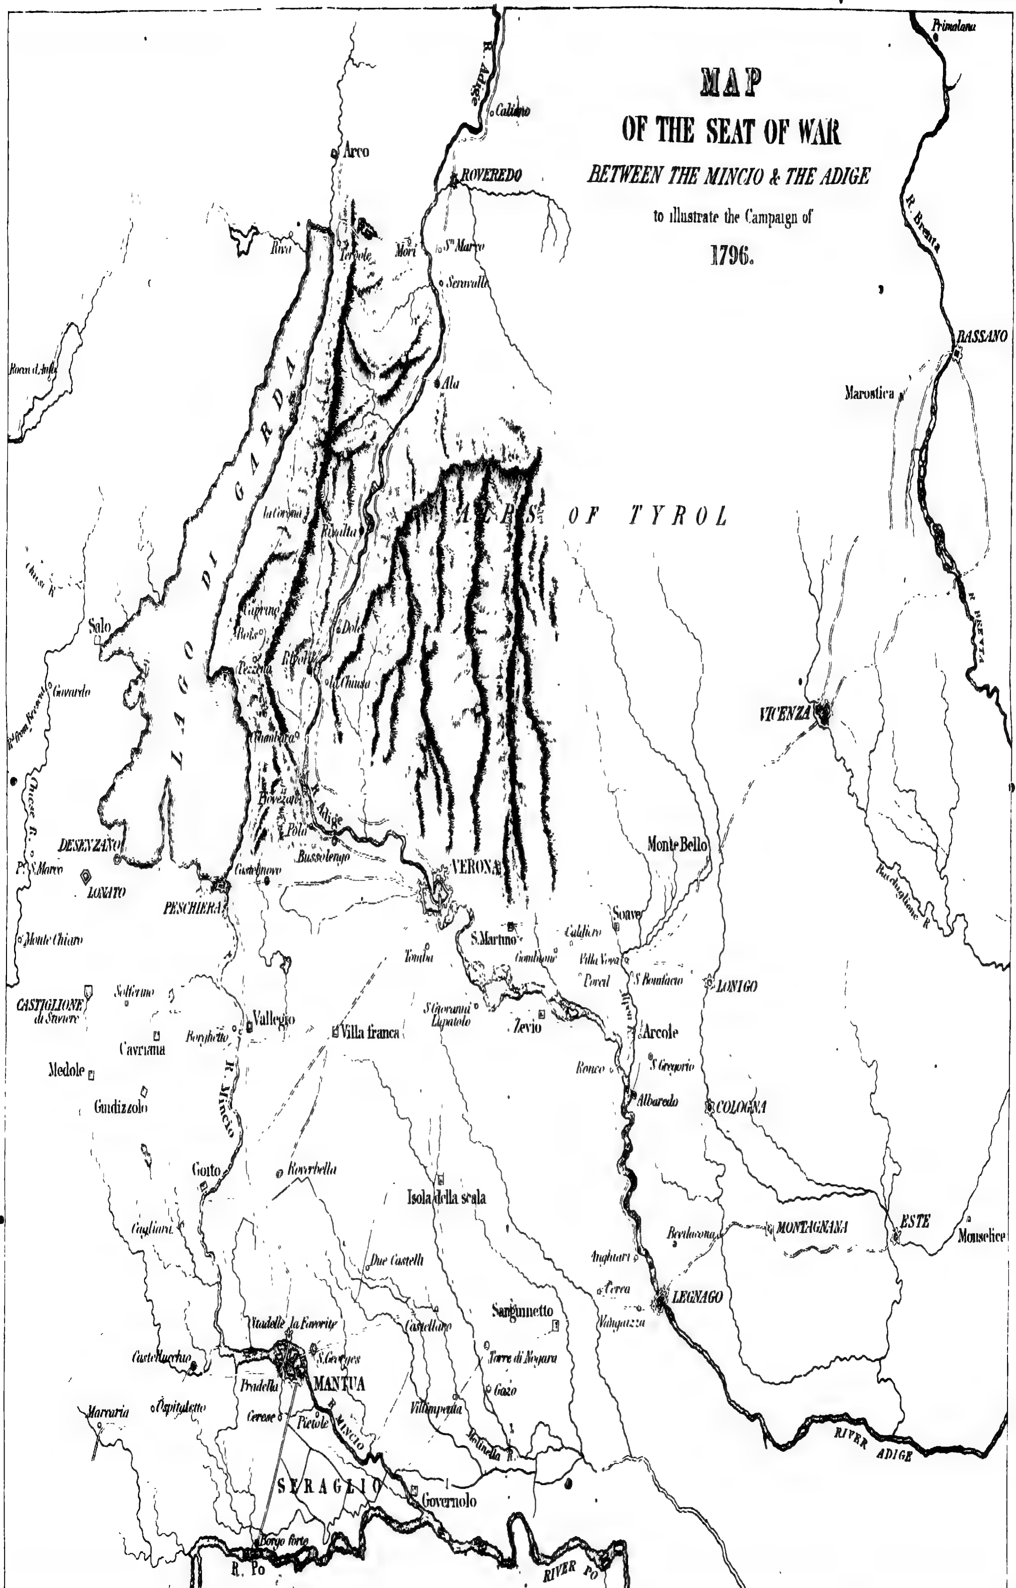
The commune was intrusted with a further charge, not less important, namely, that of guarding the royal family. The assembly had at first ordered its transference to the Luxumbourg, and on an objection being urged that that palace was difficult to guard, it decided for the mansion of the minister of justice. But the commune, holding now the police of the capital, and deeming itself, therefore, peculiarly charged with the safe keeping of the king, proposed the Temple, declaring it could not answer for his security unless enclosed within the tower of that ancient abbey. The assembly consented, and handed over the august prisoners to the mayor and the commander-in-chief Santerre, taking the guarantee of their personal responsibility.* Twelve commissioners from the council-general were appointed to keep watch without intermission at the Temple. Certain outer works had rendered this edifice a sort of fortress. Numerous detachments of the national guard formed its garrison by rotation, and no access was permitted, except by authority from the municipality. The assembly decreed that 500,000 francs should be taken from the treasury to provide for the maintenance of the royal family until the meeting of the National Convention.

The functions of the commune were, as may be gathered from the preceding relation, very extensive. Situated in the centre of the state, where sovereign powers were exercised, and urged by its ardour and energy to execute of itself whatever seemed to it too feebly attempted by the other authorities, it was led to make incessant encroachments. The assembly, discerning the necessity of restraining it within certain limits, decreed the election of a new departmental council, in lieu of that which had been dissolved on the day of the insurrection. The commune, perceiving itself threatened with the yoke of a superior authority, which would probably obstruct its course, as the old department had done, was furious at this decree, and ordered the sections to discontinue the election which had already commenced. The procurator-syndic Manuel was dispatched from the town-hall to the Feuillants', to present the remonstrances of the municipality. "The delegates of the citizens of Paris," said he, "require powers without limits: an authority placed between them and you will only sow the seeds of discord. It will compel the people, in order to deliver themselves from a power destructive of their sovereignty, once more to arm themselves for vengeance."

Such was the menacing language which the assembly had already to brook. It granted what was demanded; and, either because it deemed resistance impossible or imprudent, or because it considered it dangerous at the moment to shackle the energy of the commune, it decided that the new council should have no authority over the municipality, but simply constitute a committee of finance, intrusted with the superintendence of the public contributions in the department of the Seine.

Another much graver question occupied attention; one which was destined to elicit still more forcibly the different feelings which actuated the commune and the assembly. Loud clamours were raised for the punishment of those who had fired on the people, and who were alleged to be prepared for a fresh attack as soon as the enemy should draw nearer. These were alternatively styled the conspirators of the 10th August, and the traitors. The military commission, appointed on the 11th to try the Swiss, was deemed insufficient, because its powers were restricted to the prosecution of those military offenders. The criminal tribunal of the Seine seemed fettered by too tedious formalities; and besides, all authorities anterior to the 10th of August were looked upon with suspicion. The commune, therefore, demanded, on the 13th, the erection of a special tribunal to try the crimes of the 10th August, which should have sufficient powers to grasp all who were styled the traitors. The assembly referred the petition to its committee of twelve, appointed since the month of July for the purpose of devising and submitting measures of safety.



On the 14th, a fresh deputation from the commune appeared before the legislative body, in order to demand the decree relative to the extraordinary tribunal, declaring that, if it were not already passed, it was instructed to wait until that form was gone through. The deputy Gaston addressed some severe observations to the deputation, and it withdrew. The assembly persisted in refusing the creation of an extraordinary tribunal, and contented itself with authorising the established tribunals to take cognisance of the crimes of the 10th August.

A violent uproar broke out through Paris when intelligence of this resolution was disseminated. The section of the Quinze-Vingts appeared before the council-general of the commune, and announced that the tocsin would be rung in the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, unless the decree as solicited were immediately passed. The council-general thereupon dispatched a fresh deputation, at the head of which was Robespierre. He spoke in the name of the municipality, and made the most insolent remonstrances to the deputies. "The tranquillity of the people," said he to them, "depends on the punishment of the criminals, and yet you have done nothing to smite them. Your decree is insufficient. It fails to explain the nature and extent of the crimes to be punished, for it speaks only of the crimes of the 10th August, whereas the crimes of the enemies of the revolution extend far beyond the 10th August and the walls of Paris. Under such a phrase, the traitor Lafayette would escape the vengeance of the law! As to the form of the tribunal, the people can no longer tolerate that which you have continued to it. The double degree of jurisdiction causes interminable delays, and besides, all the old authorities are suspected; we must have new ones; it is essential that the tribunal asked for should be formed by deputies chosen in the sections, and should have the power of judging the culpable, supremely, and without appeal."

This imperious remonstrance was aggravated by the supercilious tone of Robespierre. The assembly replied to the people of Paris by an address, in which it repudiated the idea of an extraordinary commission or star-chamber (chambre ardente), as unworthy of liberty, and fit only for despotism.

These reasonable observations produced no effect; the irritation only became the greater. Throughout all Paris nothing was spoken of but sounding the tocsin; and the following day, a representative of the

* The king and his family were conducted to the Temple on the evening of the 13th August.

MAP OF THE SEAT OF WAR BETWEEN THE MINCIO & THE ADIGE to illustrate the Campaign of 1796.
R. Adige
Arco
ROVEREDO
Riva
Mori
Serravalle
Ala
R. Brenta
BASSANO Marostica LAGO DI GARDA
ALPS OF TYROL
La Corona
Rivalta
Caprino
Dolce
Rivoli
La Chiusa
Salo
Gavardo
VICENZA
DESENZANO
LONATO
PESCHIERA
Castelnovo
Bussolengo
VERONA
Pola
Monte Bello
Monte Chiaro
Soave
Caldiero
S. Martino
Tomba
Villa Nova
S. Bonifacio
LONIGO
CASTIGLIONE di Stiviere
Solferino
Vallegio
Borghetto
Villa franca
Zevio
Arcole
Cavriana
Medole
Guidizzolo
R. Mincio
Ronco
S. Gregorio
Albaredo
COLOGNA
Goito
Roverbella
Isola della scala
Cagliari
Bevilacqua
MONTAGNANA
ESTE
Monselice
Due Castelli
Cerea
LEGNAGO
Sanguinetto
Castellaro
Castellucchio
S. Georges
MANTUA
Pradella
Torre di Nogara
Gazo
Marcaria
Ospitaletto
Cerese
Pietole
Villimpenta
R. Mincio
SERAGLIO
Governolo
Borgo forte
R. Po
RIVER PO
RIVER ADIGE

commune, presenting himself at the bar, said to the assembly, "As a citizen, as a magistrate of the people, I come to announce to you that this very night the tocsin will ring, and the drums call to arms, at midnight. The people are weary of not being avenged. Tremble lest they take justice into their own hands.—I demand," cried the audacious petitioner, in conclusion, "that, without stirring, you decree that a citizen shall be named by each section to form a criminal tribunal."

This undisguised mandate aroused the assembly, and particularly the deputies Choudieu and Thuriot, who vehemently reprimanded the envoy of the commune. However, a debate commenced on the proposition of the commune, and being powerfully supported by the more violent members of the assembly, it was finally adopted and converted into a decree. An electoral body was thereby appointed to meet, in order to elect the members of an extraordinary tribunal, to be charged with the trial of the crimes committed during the era of the 10th August, and other crimes thereunto relative and appurtenant. This tribunal, divided into two sections, was to judge in the last resort, and without appeal. Such was the first formation of the revolutionary tribunal, and the first great impetus given by the spirit of vengeance to the forms of justice. It was called the tribunal of the 17th August.

The effect produced on the armies by the last revolution, and the manner in which they had received the decrees of the 10th, were still subjects of doubt at Paris. These were points of the utmost importance, on which, indeed, the fate of the last revolution mainly depended. The frontier continued distributed amongst three armies, called respectively, of the north, of the centre, and of the south. Luckner commanded the first, Lafayette the second, and Montesquiou the third. Since the unfortunate affairs of Mons and Tournay, Luckner, stimulated by Dumouriez, had again essayed the offensive towards the Low Countries; but he had been obliged to retreat, and on evacuating Courtray he had burnt the fauxbourgs, which act was made a serious ground of accusation against the ministry immediately previous to the king's suspension. Since then, the armies had remained in the most complete inaction, lying in intrenched camps, and confining themselves to slight skirmishes. Dumouriez, on quitting the ministry, had gone as lieutenant-general to Luckner, and had met with an unfavourable reception from the army, in which the spirit of the Lafayette party predominated. Luckner, wholly subject at that period to the same influence, dismissed Dumouriez to one of the intrenched camps, that of Maulde, and left him there with a small body of troops, to look after the defences and employ himself in forays.

Lafayette wishing, on account of the dangers which threatened the king, to be nearer Paris, was anxious to have the command of the north. He was unwilling, however, to quit his troops, by whom he was greatly beloved, and he arranged with Luckner to change positions, each with his own division; that is to say, both of them were to decamp, the one marching to the north and the other to the centre. This displacement of the armies in presence of an enemy might have been attended with danger, if the war had not fortunately been completely inactive. Luckner had consequently repaired to Metz, and Lafayette to Sedan. During this cross movement, Dumouriez, being ordered to follow the army of Luckner, to which he belonged, with his small corps, suddenly stopped in front of the enemy, who had made a feint to attack him, and he was compelled to remain in his camp, under fear of opening Flanders to the Duke of Saxe-Teschen. He called together the other generals who occupied separate camps near him, communicated with Dillon, who had arrived with a portion of Lafayette's army, and demanded a council of war at Valenciennes, to justify, on the ground of necessity, his disobedience to the orders of Luckner. In the mean time, Luckner had reached Metz, and Lafayette Sedan; and if the events of the 10th August had not opportunely happened, Dumouriez, in all probability, would have undergone arrest and military judgment for his refusal to march forward.

Such was the position of the armies, when intelligence of the overthrow of the throne was brought. One of the first cares of the Legislative Assembly had been, as we have seen, to depute three commissioners to the armies, bearing its decrees, and invested with authority to administer the new oath to the troops. The three commissioners, upon their arrival at Sedan, were received by the municipality, which held an order from Lafayette for their arrest. The mayor interrogated them upon the scenes of the 10th August, exacted a minute recital of all the events, and declared, according to secret instructions from Lafayette, that the Legislative Assembly was evidently no longer free, since it had pronounced the suspension of the king; that its commissioners were merely the emissaries of a factious band; and that they must be detained in the name of the constitution. They were, in fact, imprisoned; and Lafayette, in order to shield those who had simply executed his orders, took the act on his own head. Immediately subsequent to this proceeding, he administered to his army a renewed oath of fidelity to the law and the king, and issued a command that it should be repeated by all the divisions subject to his authority. He reckoned upon seventy-five departments, which had adhered to his letter of the 16th June; and he purposed to attempt a movement in opposition to that of the 10th August. Dillon, who was at Valenciennes under the orders of Lafayette, and held a superior command to Dumouriez, obeyed his general-in-chief, administered the oath of fidelity to the law and the king, and enjoined Dumouriez to do the same in his camp at Maulde. Dumouriez, judging more sagaciously of the future, and, furthermore, irritated against the Feuillants, under whose sway he now found himself, seized the opportunity to oppose them, and at the same time gain the favour of the new government, by repudiating the oath both for himself and his troops.

On the 17th, the very day on which the extraordinary criminal tribunal was so tumultuously established, a letter arrived at Paris, communicating the intelligence that the commissioners sent to the army of Lafayette had been arrested by his orders, and that the legislative authority was set at defiance. This information excited irritation rather than alarm, and the exclamations against Lafayette arose louder than ever. His impeachment was insisted upon, and the assembly reproached in no gentle terms for not having decreed it earlier. A condemnatory resolution was instantly passed against the department of the Ardennes; fresh commissioners were dispatched, with the same powers as their predecessors, and additionally commissioned to enlarge the prisoners. Other deputies were likewise sent to the army of Dillon. Lastly, on the morning of the 19th, the assembly declared Lafayette a traitor to the country, and pronounced against him a decree of impeachment.

The crisis was momentous, for if this resistance were not overcome, the new revolution would be utterly abortive. France, distracted between the republicans in the interior and the constitutionalists in the army, would be divided in front of the enemy, and lie exposed both to invasion and a fearful reaction. Lafayette naturally looked with disgust upon the revolution of the 10th August, involving as it did the abolition of the constitution of 1791, the accomplishment of all the aristocratic prophecies, and the justification of all the reproaches which the court had been wont to fulminate against liberty. It was impossible for him to see in this victory of democracy any thing but a bloody anarchy and an endless confusion. To us, this confusion has had its term, and the soil at least been defended against the enemy; but to Lafayette the future was unknown and portentous, the defence of the territory seemed scarcely practicable amidst political convulsions, and he must have felt an irresistible desire to oppose the threatened chaos, by taking a hostile position as well against internal as external foes. But his situation was one of great difficulty, and such as no mortal talents could probably have surmounted. His army was devoted to him—true; but armies have no individual will, and can have none but such as is communicated to them by superior authority. When a revolution explodes with the violence of 1789, then, blindly hurried away, they desert from the ancient authority, because the new impulse is irresistible: but at present circumstances were different. Proscribed and degraded by a decree, Lafayette was quite incapable of rousing his troops against the authority of the interior by his mere military popularity, and, upon an impulse derived from himself alone, of successfully combating the revolutionary stimulus of the metropolis. Placed likewise between two enemies, and uncertain as to his course of duty, he could not but hesitate. The assembly, on the contrary, hesitated not an instant, but sent forth decree upon decree, and, supporting them by energetic commissioners, was sure to gain the ascendant over the irresolution of the general, and to decide the army. In fact, the troops of Lafayette successively swerved, and manifested an intention of abandoning him. The civil authorities, also, yielded to intimidation, and surrendered to the new commissioners. The example of Dumouriez, who declared for the revolution of the 10th August, was only required to give the concluding blow; and the malecontent general remained alone with his staff, which was composed of Feuillants or constitutional officers.

Bouillé, whose energy is above all question, and Dumouriez, whose great talents none can contest, were unable to act otherwise at different periods, and found themselves compelled to take flight. Lafayette was not destined to be more happy. Writing to the various civil authorities which had seconded him in his resistance, he took upon himself the responsibility of the orders given against the commissioners of the assembly, and quitted his camp on the 20th August, with a few officers, his friends and companions in arms and sentiments. Bureau de Puzy, Latour-Maubourg, and Lameth, accompanied him. They abandoned the camp, carrying with them but one month's pay, and followed by a few domestics. Lafayette left every thing in order in his army, and took care to make the necessary dispositions for resisting the enemy, in case of an attack. He sent back some troopers who escorted him, determined not to rob France of a single arm which might be raised in her defence; and on the 21st, he took with his friends the route to the Low Countries. Having reached the Austrian advanced posts, after a ride which had exhausted their horses, these first emigrants of liberty were arrested, contrary to the laws of nations, and treated as prisoners of war. Great was the joy when the name of Lafayette echoed in the camp of the coalition, and it became known that he was a captive in the hands of the aristocratic league. The opportunity of exulting over one of the earliest friends of the revolution, and of charging upon the revolution itself the persecution of its first authors—to see verified all the excesses that malice had predicted—were gratifications indeed; and less would have sufficed to spread universal satisfaction amongst the European aristocracy.

Lafayette claimed for himself and his friends the liberty which was their undoubted right; but his appeals were in vain. It was offered him on condition of a recantation, not of all his opinions, but of one only—that relative to the abolition of nobility. He refused it on such terms, and threatened, if his words were falsely reported, to give the contradiction before a public officer. He received irons, therefore, as the reward of his constancy; and even when he was led to believe liberty stifled in Europe and in France. his mind was calm and sedate, and he never ceased to regard it as the most precious of blessings. He still asserted its sacred cause, both with the oppressors who immured him in a dungeon, and with his old associates who had remained in France. "Still love liberty," he wrote to the latter, "in spite of its storms, and serve your country." If we compare his defection with that of Bouillé, abandoning his country to re-enter it with hostile sovereigns, or with that of Dumouriez, quarrelling with the convention, under which he had served, not from any honest conviction, but from personal pique, we shall render justice to the man who forsook France only when the truth in which he put his faith was proscribed within it, and who submitted neither to execrate nor abjure it in foreign armies, but, on the contrary, professed and maintained it even amidst the horrors of a prison.

Let us not blame Dumouriez, however, too harshly, for we shall soon have reason to estimate his memorable services. This able and flexible man had perfectly comprehended the rising power. After having rendered himself almost independent by his refusal to obey Luckner, and to quit the camp at Maulde, after having rejected the oath enjoined by Dillon, he was now recompensed for his discernment by the command-in-chief of the armies of the north and centre. Dillon, brave, impetuous, but shortsighted, was at first deprived of his command for having obeyed Lafayette; but he was reinstated through the credit of Dumouriez, who, keeping a steadfast eye on his ultimate object, and anxious to alienate in his progress as few men as possible, warmly defended him to the commissioners of the assembly. Dumouriez then found himself general-in-chief along the whole frontier from Metz to Dunkirk. Luckner was at Metz with his army, formerly that of the north. Influenced at first by Lafayette, he had given tokens of a resistance to the 10th August; but, speedily yielding to his army and the commissioners of the assembly, he succumbed to the decrees, and, after a fresh shower of tears, gave in to the new impulse imparted to him.

The 10th August and the advanced season were motives for deciding the coalition at length to push the war with activity. The dispositions of the European powers were not changed with regard to France. England, Holland, Denmark, and Switzerland, still promised a strict neutrality. Sweden, since the death of Gustavus, had sincerely returned to a like policy. The Italian states were inimical enough, but fortunately pretty powerless. Spain did not yet declare herself, and continued distracted by conflicting intrigues. There remained as decided enemies, Russia and the two principal courts of Germany. But Russia still adhered to mere demonstrations of her high displeasure, and contented herself with dismissing the French ambassador. Prussia and Austria alone marched armies to the frontiers of France. Amongst the other German states, only the three ecclesiastical electors and the landgraves of the two Hesses had taken an active part in the coalition; the remainder were waiting to be constrained to that course.

In this state of things, 138,000 men, perfectly organised and disciplined, menaced France, which could oppose to them at the utmost but 120,000, scattered along an immense frontier, forming at no point a sufficient mass, deprived of their officers, without confidence either in themselves or their generals, and hitherto invariably worsted in the war of posts they had kept up. The plan of the coalition was to overpower France at once, by penetrating through the Ardennes and marching by Châlons upon Paris. The two sovereigns of Prussia and Austria had repaired in person to Mayence. Sixty thousand Pussians, full of the traditions and the glory of Frederick, advanced in a single column upon the French centre, marching by Luxumbourg upon Longwy. Twenty thousand Austrians, commanded by General Clairfayt, supported them on the right by the occupation of Stenay. Sixteen thousand Austrians, under the orders of the Prince of Hohenlohe-Kirchberg, and ten thousand Hessians, flanked the left of the Prussians. The Duke of Saxe-Teschen occupied the Low Countries, and threatened their fortresses. The Prince of Condé, with six thousand French emigrants, had proceeded towards Philipsbourg. Several other corps of emigrants were distributed in the various Prussian and Austrian armies. The foreign courts, unwilling to allow the emigrants, by a general union, to acquire too considerable an influence, had designed at first to incorporate them in the German regiments, and afterwards consented to let them exist as distinct corps, but with the precaution of dividing them amongst the armies of the coalition. These corps were chiefly composed of officers who had submitted to serve as private soldiers; they constituted a brilliant cavalry, but better suited to display a chivalric valour on a day of peril than to sustain the fatigues of a long campaign.

The French armies were disposed in the worst possible manner for resisting such a concentration of strength. Three generals, Beurnonville, Moreton, and Duval, commanded thirty thousand men in three separate camps, at Maulde, Maubeuge, and Lille. These comprised the whole resources of France on the frontier towards the north and the Low Countries. The army of Lafayette, disorganised by the departure of its general, and distracted by the greatest variety of sentiments, was encamped at Sedan, to the amount of twenty-three thousand men. Dumouriez was on the point of assuming the command of it. The army of Luckner, composed of twenty thousand men, occupied Metz, and had, like all the others, just received a new general, in the person of Kellermann. The assembly, though discontented with Luckner, had abstained nevertheless from dismissing him altogether. In transferring his command to Kellermann, it had preserved to him, under the title of generalissimo, the care of organising the new army of reserve, and the purely honorary charge of advising the generals. Lastly, there were Custine, who, with fifteen thousand men, occupied Landau; and Biron, who, stationed in Alsace with thirty thousand men, was too far removed from the principal theatre of the war to influence the fate of the campaign.

The only two collections of troops posted on the line of march of the grand army of the coalition, were the twenty-three thousand men forsaken by Lafayette, and the twenty thousand of Kellermann, ranged around Metz. If the grand army of invasion, adapting its movements to its main design, had marched rapidly on Sedan, whilst the troops of Lafayette, deprived of a general, a prey to disorder, and, not being yet joined by Dumouriez, without unity or direction, the principal defensive army had been forced, the Ardennes laid open, and the other generals obliged to retrograde with precipitation to effect a junction behind the Marne. It is possible they might not have had time to come from Lille and Metz to Chalons and Rheims; then Paris lying uncovered, there would have remained to the new government only the forlorn project of a camp under Paris or flight beyond the Loire.

But if France defended herself with all the disorder of a revolutionary convulsion, the foreign powers attacked with all the want of concert and divergent views of a coalition. The King of Prussia, intoxicated with the idea of an easy conquest, flattered and deceived by the emigrants, who depicted the invasion to him as a simple military promenade, was eager for the most daring enterprise. But he had too prudent a counsellor by his side in the Duke of Brunswick, for his presumption to have even the happy consequences of audacity and promptitude. The Duke of Brunswick, perceiving the season far advanced, the country very differently affected from what the emigrants had represented, and furthermore somewhat correctly appreciating the revolutionary energy by the insurrection of the 10th August, concluded that the most expedient course was to make sure of a solid base of operations on the Moselle, by laying siege to Metz and Thionville, and to defer until the following season the renewal of hostilities, with all the advantages of preceding conquests. This contest between the precipitation of the sovereign and the prudence of the general, joined to the tardiness of the Austrians, who appeared under the command of the Prince of Hohenlohe to the number of but eighteen thousand men instead of fifty thousand, prevented any decisive movement. However, the Prussian army continued to advance towards the centre, and came on the 20th before Longwy, one of the fortresses nearest the line of frontier.

Dumouriez, who had always believed that an invasion of the Low Countries would cause a revolution to break out, and that such a diversion would preserve France from the inroads of Germany, had made every preparation to push forward, the very day he received his commission of general-in-chief of the two armies. He was on the point of acting on the offensive against the Prince of Saxe-Teschen, when Westermann, who had evinced such energy on the 10th August, and was now one of the commissioners to the army of Lafayette, reached him with information of what was passing on the theatre of the grand invasion. On the 22d, Longwy had opened its gates to the Prussians, after a bombardment of a few hours. The disordered state of the garrison and the imbecility of the commandant, were the causes of its speedy surrender. Elated with this conquest, and the captivity of Lafayette, the Prussians were more than ever disposed to the plan of a prompt invasion. The army of Lafayette was lost, unless the new general came to encourage it by his presence, and to direct its movements in a beneficial manner. Such was the substance of Westermann's communication.

Dumouriez forthwith abandoned his favourite project, and on the 25th or the 26th, repaired to Sedan, where his first appearance provoked amongst the troops murmurs and reproaches. He was the enemy of Lafayette, whom they still regarded with affection. On him, likewise, was laid the odium of this unfortunate war, since it was under his ministry it had been declared; and furthermore, he was considered as a man of the pen rather than of the sword. Such objections were industriously circulated in the camp, and frequently reached the ears of the general. Dumouriez was not at all disconcerted. He began by cheering the courage of his troops, affecting himself a firm and tranquil demeanour; and he was not long in making them feel the influence of a more vigorous command. But the position of twenty-three thousand men, in deplorable disorganisation, was nearly desperate thus in presence of eighty thousand, perfectly disciplined. The Prussians, after taking Longwy, had blockaded Thionville, and were advancing on Verdun, which was much less capable of resistance than the fortress of Longwy.

The generals, called together by Dumouriez, were all of opinion that the Prussians should not be waited for at Sedan, but that a rapid retreat should be made behind the Marne, and intrenchments there thrown up as well as circumstances would permit, in order to await the junction of the other armies, and thus cover the capital, which only forty leagues separated from the enemy. They all held that if a defeat were sustained in attempting to oppose the invasion, the rout would be complete; the army, utterly disorganised, would not rally between Sedan and Paris itself; and the Prussians march thither directly, and at a conqueror's pace. Such was the military situation of France, and the opinion entertained of it by her generals.

The idea formed in Paris upon the subject was not more cheerful, and the sense of danger aggravated the exasperation of the public mind. And yet that immense metropolis, which had never seen an enemy within its precincts, and estimated its power in proportion to its extent and population, was led with difficulty to imagine the possibility of its forcible occupation: thus it dreaded the military dangers which were not perceived, and were still at a distance from it, infinitely less than the danger of a reaction on the part of the royalists, for the moment suppressed. Whilst on the frontier the generals saw only the Prussians, in the interior the people beheld only aristocrats silently conspiring for the destruction of liberty.

The people said amongst themselves that the king indeed was a prisoner, but that his party did not the less exist and conspire, as before the 10th August, to open Paris to the stranger. They pictured to themselves all the large mansions in the capital filled with armed bands, ready to issue forth on the first signal, to release Louis XVI., to seize upon all authority, and to deliver France a defenceless prey to the vengeance of emigrants and foreigners. This understanding between the internal and the external enemy was perpetually present to the minds of all. "We must," said they, "be delivered from traitors;" and the frightful idea was already generated of slaughtering the vanquished—an idea with the great majority a mere impulse of the imagination, but which, with certain men, more bloodthirsty, more enthusiastic, or more eager for action, might resolve itself into a real and deliberate plan.

We have already learnt that the question of avenging the people for the injuries received during the course of the 10th August had been canvassed, and that a warm altercation had arisen between the assembly and the commune on the subject of the revolutionary tribunal. This tribunal, which had already consigned to death Dangremont and the unfortunate Laporte, the intendant of the civil list, was not sufficiently speedy in its action to satisfy a furious and frantic populace, which beheld enemies in every quarter. It needed prompter forms to punish the traitors, and it especially clamoured for judgment on the prisoners transferred to the high court of Orleans. Those, for the most part, were ministers and distinguished functionaries, impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors. Delessart, the former minister of foreign affairs, was of the number. Cries were raised on all sides against the slowness of the processes; the transference of the prisoners to Paris was insisted upon, and their instant condemnation by the tribunal of the 17th August. The assembly, being petitioned on this subject, or rather summoned to yield to the general wish and pass at once a decree of transference, had made a courageous resistance. The high national court, it said, was a constitutional establishment, which it had no power to alter, inasmuch as it did not possess constituent functions, and because it was the right of every accused to be tried only according to existing laws. This question had once more stimulated crowds of petitioners; and the assembly had to resist the united clamours of a furious minority, of the commune, and of the outrageous sections. It contented itself, however, with rendering certain forms of process more expeditious, decreeing, at the same time, that the prisoners before the high court should remain at Orleans, and not be withdrawn from the jurisdiction secured to them by the constitution.

Thus two opinions were formed—the one in favour of sparing the vanquished, without, however, displaying less energy against the foreign enemy; and the other in favour of a preliminary extermination of secret foes before advancing against the armed enemies moving towards Paris. This latter was less an opinion than a blind and ferocious sentiment, compounded of terror and rage, and calculated to grow more intense with the increase of danger.

The Parisians were excited to greater fury from the consciousness of their city, the focus of all the insurrections, and the ultimate object of the foreign aggression, being exposed to the whole brunt of danger. They accused the assembly, composed as it was of deputies from the departments, of a desire to retreat into the provinces. The Girondists especially, who belonged for the most part to the southern districts of the kingdom, and formed that moderate majority so odious to the commune, were accused of a design to sacrifice Paris from hatred for the capital. They thus attributed to them sentiments sufficiently natural, and such as the Parisians might well imagine they had provoked; but the deputies in question loved their country and their cause too sincerely to dream of abandoning Paris. It is true, they had always held that if the north were lost they should fall back on the south; and it is also true, that at this very moment, some amongst them considered it prudent to transport the seat of government beyond the Loire; but an intention to sacrifice a hateful city, and transfer the government to a locality where they would be masters, never entered their minds. They had too much elevation of sentiment, were as yet too powerful, and relied too much on the approaching meeting of the convention, to think thus early of detaching themselves from Paris.

Accusations, therefore, were made at once against their indulgence towards traitors, and their indifference towards the interests of the capital. Exposed to a constant struggle with the most violent men, they could scarcely bear up against the activity and energy of their adversaries, even though they possessed the advantages of reason and numbers. In the executive council they were five to one; for besides the three ministers, Clavière, Servan, and Roland, selected from their very bosom, two others, Monge and Lebrun, were likewise men of their choosing. But the one Danton, who, without being their personal enemy, shared neither in their moderation nor in their opinions—the single Danton, we repeat, ruled the council, and destroyed all their influence. Whilst Clavière was labouring to scrape together some financial resources, Servan bustling to procure reinforcements for the generals, and Roland distributing sagacious missives, with a view to instruct the provincial public, to direct the local authorities, to prevent their abuses of power, and check violence of every description, Danton was engaged in filling the offices of administration with his creatures. He dispatched on all missions his faithful Cordeliers, procuring by such means numerous supporters for himself, and enabling his friends to partake of the profits of the revolution. Convincing or intimidating his colleagues, he experienced no obstacle but in the rigid inflexibility of Roland, who frequently repudiated the measures or the men he proposed. Danton was irritated at this opposition, without, however, coming to any open rupture with Roland; and he strove with the greater pertinacity to carry as many nominations and decisions as possible.

Danton, whose domination was centred in Paris, naturally desired its preservation, and was resolute in opposing any scheme for transferring the government beyond the Loire. Endowed with a wonderful audacity of mind, the man to proclaim the insurrection on the eve of the 10th August, when all besides drooped and hesitated, was not likely to recoil, or uphold any doctrine but the necessity of perishing in the ruins of the capital. Master of the council, closely allied with Marat and the surveillance committee of the commune, listened to in all the clubs, and living in the midst of the multitude as in an element he agitated at pleasure, Danton was the most powerful man in Paris; and this power, based on a natural violence of disposition, which brought him in unison with the passions of the people, boded little forbearance to the vanquished. In his revolutionary ardour, Danton inclined to all the ideas of vengeance which were so hateful to the Girondists. He was the chief of that Parisian party whose motto was, "We will not retreat; we will perish in the capital and beneath its ruins; but our enemies shall perish before us!" Thus the minds of men were trained to the contemplation of atrocious projects, and horrible scenes were destined to be the dismal consequence.

On the 26th, a rumour of the fall of Longwy spread with rapidity, and caused a general agitation in Paris. During the whole day its probability was disputed; but at length it was placed beyond all doubt, and it became known that the place had opened its gates after a bombardment of a few hours. So great a ferment ensued, that the assembly decreed the penalty of death against whomsoever should propose to surrender in a besieged fortress. On the demand of the commune, it was ordered that Paris and the contiguous departments should furnish, within a few days, thirty thousand men armed and equipped. The enthusiasm which reigned rendered such a muster easy; and the numbers who enrolled themselves lessened the apprehensions of danger. It was not to be imagined at the moment, that a hundred thousand Prussians would be able to prevail over several millions of men determined to defend themselves. Renewed activity was manifested in forming the camp under Paris; and all the women assembled in the churches to participate in preparing the materials of encampment.

Danton appeared at the commune, and on a proposition submitted by him, the adoption of certain extreme measures was voted. It was resolved to make in all the sections a list of the indigent, and to give them a pecuniary allowance and arms. By a second resolution, the disarming and arrest of all suspected persons were ordered; and under that designation were included the entire list of those who had signed the petitions against the events of the 20th June and the decree for the camp below Paris. To effect this sweeping measure of disarming and arresting, the expedient of domiciliary visits was suggested, and forthwith organised after a mode truly frightful. The barriers were appointed to be shut during forty-eight hours, commencing on the 29th August at sunset; and no permission to pass could be granted on any pretence. Guard-boats were stationed on the river, to prevent flight by that outlet. The surrounding communes were charged to apprehend whomsoever should be detected in the fields or on the roads. The roll of drums was to announce the coming visits, and at that signal every citizen was bound to repair to his own residence, under pain of being deemed suspected of assembling, if he were found at the house of another. For this reason, all the sectional assemblies, and the extraordinary tribunal itself, were to be suspended during those two days. Commissioners selected from the commune, accompanied by an armed force, were empowered to make the visits, to confiscate arms, and to apprehend the suspected; that is to say, the signers of the petitions already mentioned, the non-juring priests, the citizens who should prevaricate in their declarations, those against whom denunciations had been lodged, et cetera. At ten at night vehicles were to cease running, and the city was to be illuminated during all the hours of darkness.

Such were the measures resolved upon to secure the arrest of (as they were called) the bad citizens secreted since the 10th August. The visits were commenced on the evening of the 29th, and one party, abandoned to the mercy of another, was exposed to be cast wholesale into prison. All who had belonged to the court, either by holding offices, or by rank, or by attendance at the palace; all who had declared for it on occasion of the various royalist movements; all who had dastardly enemies capable of seeking vengeance by denunciation, were thrown into prison, to the number of twelve or fifteen thousand persons. It was the surveillance committee of the commune that presided over these arrests, and witnessed their execution. Those whom it designated for apprehension were first conducted from their residences to the committee of their section, and thence to the committee of the commune. There they were briefly questioned as to their opinions, and the acts which demonstrated their greater or less degree of energy. Frequently a single member of the committee interrogated them, whilst the other members, exhausted by a vigil of several days, were asleep on the chairs and tables. The individuals arrested were detained at the town-hall in the first instance, and subsequently distributed into the prisons where any room was yet to be found. In them were now incarcerated representatives of all the opinions that had successively reigned up till the 10th August, inheritors of distinctions levelled to the dust, and simple tradesmen, already deemed equally aristocratic with dukes and princes.

Consternation prevailed throughout Paris. The republicans felt themselves menaced by the Prussian armies; and the royalists were menaced by the republicans. The committee of general defence, appointed by the assembly to advise on measures for resisting the enemy, met on the 30th, and called to its aid the executive council, in order to hold a solemn deliberation on the means of public safety. The meeting was numerous; for to the actual members of the committee were added a great many deputies, who had desired to attend that sitting. Various opinions were expressed. The minister Servan stated he had no confidence in the armies, and that he held it impossible for Dumouriez, with the twenty-three thousand men Lafayette had left him, to stop the Prussians. He saw no position between them and Paris sufficiently strong to take up and check their march. Every one agreed with him on this point; and after having resolved to concentrate the whole population under the walls of Paris, there to sustain the combat of despair, the retreat to Saumur in the last extremity was spoken of, as a plan for interposing between the enemy and the authorities invested with the national sovereignty a fresh interval and fresh obstacles. Vergniaud and Guadet opposed the idea of quitting Paris. After them, Danton spoke:—

"It is proposed to you," said he, "to quit Paris. You are not ignorant that, in the opinion of our enemies, Paris represents France, and that to yield them this position is to abandon the revolution. To retreat is to ruin ourselves. We must, therefore, maintain ourselves here at all hazards, and save ourselves by audacity. Amongst the measures proposed, none has seemed to me effective. We ought not to dissemble the situation in which the 10th August has placed us. It has divided us into republicans and royalists; the first scanty, the latter abundant, in numbers. In this state of weakness, we republicans are exposed to two fires—that of the enemy situated without, and that of the royalists situated within. There is a royal directory which sits secretly at Paris, and corresponds with the Prussian army. To tell you where it meets, who are its members, is out of the power of the ministers. But in order to disconcert it, and to prevent its disastrous correspondence with the enemy, it is necessary, it is indispensable, to strike terror into the royalists!"

At these words, accompanied by a gesture significant of extermination, horror was depicted on every countenance. "It is indispensable, I tell you," resumed Danton, "to strike terror into the royalists. It is in Paris, above all things, it behoves you to maintain yourselves; and it is not by exhausting your strength in uncertain combats that you will succeed." A sudden stupor spread over the council. Not a word of rejoinder was given to Danton; and all moved away without any precise comprehension—without venturing, indeed, to form any surmise of what projects were devising by the minister.

He immediately proceeded to the committee of surveillance at the commune, which arbitrarily disposed of the persons of all citizens, and in which Marat reigned supreme. The colleagues of Marat, his ignorant and blind instruments, were Panis and Sergent, already signalised on the 20th June and the 10th August, and certain persons respectively named Jourdeuil, Duplain, Lefort, and Lenfant. There, during the night between Thursday the 30th and Friday the 31st August, horrible schemes were meditated against the unfortunate persons detained in the prisons of Paris. A deplorable and terrible example of political passion. Danton, whom we have always represented as without hatred against his personal enemies, and frequently accessible to emotions of pity, lent his daring spirit to the infernal reveries of Marat. They arranged in conjunction a project, such as several earlier ages have witnessed, but which, at the end of the eighteenth century, cannot be explained by the ignorance of the times or the ferocity of manners. We have seen, three years previously, a certain Maillard figuring at the head of some infuriated women, during the famous days of the 5th and 6th October. This Maillard, formerly a tipstaff, a clever but bloodthirsty personage had drawn together a band of brutal men, fit for any desperate deed, and such as are found in those classes amongst which education has not corrected the impulses by improving the understanding. He then was known to be the leader of such a band; and if we may credit a recent publication, he was instructed "to hold himself in readiness to act on the first signal, to plant himself in an effective and sure manner, to prepare instruments, to arrange precautions for preventing the shrieks of victims, to provide vinegar, birch-brooms, quick-lime, covered carts, et cetera."

In the mean time, a rumour of some terrible execution was silently disseminated. The relatives of the prisoners were in mortal agony, and the plot, like those of the 10th August, the 20th June, and other eras, transpired beforehand through sinister portents. On all sides were men repeating that it was necessary, by a terrible example, to paralyse the conspirators, who, from the depths of prisons, were in correspondence with the foreigner. They complained of the dilatoriness of the tribunal erected to punish the criminals of the 10th August, and demanded, with cries of fury, prompt justice. On the 31st, the ex-minister Montmorin was acquitted by the tribunal of the 17th August; and it was forthwith proclaimed to the outermost suburb that treason was rampant every where, and that impunity to the guilty was assured. The same day it was confidently asserted that a condemned prisoner had made revelations. These revelations imported that, during the night, the prisoners were to escape from the jails, seize upon arms, spread themselves through the city, wreak a full measure of vengeance, then release the king, and open Paris to the Prussians. Meanwhile, the captives thus accused were trembling for their lives; their relatives were in the utmost consternation, and the royal family itself expected nothing but death in the recesses of the Temple donjon.

At the Jacobin Club, in the sections, in the council of the commune, and in the majority of the assembly, were many men who implicitly believed in these plots imputed to the captives, and scrupled not to assert their extermination to be lawful and right. Surely nature does not produce so many monsters for one moment of time, and it is the spirit of party alone which can warp the intellect of so many men at once! How mournful a lesson for nations! A belief in dangers is prevalent, a strong conviction of the necessity of repelling them is felt; this cry is incessantly repeated; frenzy is engendered; and whilst certain men lightly say that some blow ought really to be struck, others strike the blow with sanguinary daring.

On Saturday the 1st September, the forty-eight hours fixed for the closing of the barriers and the execution of the domiciliary visits had elapsed, and the communications were re-established. But a sudden report was spread during the day of the capture of Verdun. That fortress was only invested, but it was currently believed that it had fallen, and that a fresh treason had delivered it, like Longwy. Danton caused it to be immediately decreed by the commune that on the following day, the 2d of September, the muster-drums should be beat, the tocsin sounded, the alarm-guns fired; and that all the disposable citizens should assemble in arms on the Champ de Mars, there bivouac during the rest of the day, and depart the next morning to plant themselves under the walls of Verdun. From such portentous stimulants it was evident that something more than a general levy was contemplated. Relatives ran in haste, and used every effort to obtain the enlargement of prisoners dear to them. Manuel, the procurator-syndic, being entreated by a generous female, set at liberty, it is said, two captives of the family of Latrémouille. Another woman, Madame Fausse-Lendry, obstinately desiring to follow her uncle, the Abbé de Rastignac, into captivity, was answered by Sergent in these words, "You are very imprudent; the prisons are not safe."

The following day, the 2d September, was a Sunday, and the prevailing idleness augmented the popular ferment. Numerous groups were gathered at all points, and it was loudly proclaimed that the enemy might be at Paris in three days. The commune informed the assembly of the measures it had taken to raise a general levy of the citizens. Vergniaud, giving way to a patriotic enthusiasm, instantly mounted the tribune, congratulated the Parisians on their courage, and applauded them for converting the barren zeal of speech into the more active and beneficial zeal of martial heroism. "It appears," said he, "that the plan of the enemy is to march straight upon the capital, leaving the fortifications behind him. So be it!—such a project will be our salvation and his ruin. Our armies, too weak to resist him, will be at least strong enough to harass him in the rear; and when he arrives, followed by our battalions, he will find himself in presence of the Parisian army, drawn up in battle array under the walls of the capital; and then, enveloped on all sides, he will be exterminated by the land he has profaned. But amidst these flattering hopes, there is one danger which must not be dissembled, and it is that of panics. Our enemies count upon them, lavish gold to produce them; and you are aware there are men kneaded of so slimy a mud, that they decompose at the slightest shock of danger. I wish this race without souls, but with the human form, could be distinguished, all its members gathered into one town—Longwy, for example—to be called the town of poltroons; and there, the objects of contumely, they could no longer diffuse alarm amongst their fellow-citizens, no longer lead them to take dwarfs for giants, or the dust flying before a company of Hulans for embattled battalions!

Parisians! it is now you are called upon to display a grand energy. Why are the intrenchments of the camp not more advanced? Where are the spades and mattocks which reared the altar of the federation and levelled the Champ de Mars? You have manifested an exemplary ardour for festivals; you will doubtless not evince less for battles. You have celebrated and sung the songs of liberty; how you must defend it! We have no longer mere kings of brass to cast down, but kings living, and armed with all their power. I therefore move that the national assembly gives the first example, and sends twelve commissioners, not to make exhortations, but to labour and hew with their own hands, in the face of all the citizens."

This proposition was adopted with the greatest enthusiasm. Danton followed Vergniaud; he expatiated upon the measures already adopted, and proposed additional ones. "One part of the people," said he, "is about to depart for the frontiers, another to dig intrenchments, and a third with pikes will defend the interior of our towns. But this is not enough; we must dispatch into all quarters commissioners and couriers to bring the whole of France into an imitation of Paris: we must pass a decree by which every citizen shall be obliged, under penalty of death, to serve i person or to furnish his arms." He added, in conclusion: "The guns you will shortly hear are not the guns of alarm—they are to sound the charge upon the enemies of the country. To vanquish them, to overwhelm them, what is needed? Boldness! still boldness, for ever boldness!"

The words and gestures of the minister produced a profound sensation amongst all present. His suggestion was acceded to, and a decree passed in accordance he then left and repaired to the committee of surveillance. All the authorities, all the bodies—the assembly, the commune, the sections, the clubs—were sitting. The ministers, assembled at the office of the admiralty, were waiting for Danton to hold a council. The entire city was agitated. Profound terror pervaded the prisons. At the Temple, the royal family, which every commotion was calculated to alarm more than any other prisoners, inquired with great anxiety the cause of so much agitation. In the various prisons, the jailors were themselves dismayed. The governor of the Abbey had early in the morning sent away his wife and children. Dinner had been served to the prisoners two hours before the accustomed time, and all the knives removed from their napkins. Struck with these circumstances, they urgently questioned their keepers, but could elicit no reply. At length, as the clocks tolled two, the drums began to beat, the tocsin was rung, and the alarm-guns resounded through the capital. Groups of citizens repaired to the Champ de Mars; others surrounded the commune and the assembly, and blocked up the public places.

At the town-hall were twenty-four priests, arrested for their refusal to take the oath, who were intended to be transferred from the room of provisional detention to the dungeons of the Abbey. Either intentionally or otherwise, this moment was chosen for their removal. They were placed in six hackney-coaches, escorted by Breton and Marseillese federalists, and conducted at a slow pace towards the Faubourg Saint-Germain, along the quays, the Pont Neuf, and the Rue Dauphine. A mob surrounded and overwhelmed them with execrations. "These are the conspirators," said the federalists, "who are to murder our wives and children whilst we are absent on the frontiers!" These words tended still more to increase the tumult. The doors of the vehicles were opened; the unfortunate ecclesiastics attempted to shut them, so as to shelter themselves from injurious treatment, but they were prevented, and compelled to suffer with patience the blows and curses showered upon them. At length they reached the court of the Abbey, where an immense crowd was already congregated. This court led to the cells, and communicated with the room in which the committee of the section Quatre-Nations held its sittings. The first coach stopped before the door of the committee-room, and was immediately surrounded by a horde of infuriated men. Maillard was present. The carriage-door was thrown open; the nearest of the prisoners advanced to alight and enter the committee, but he was instantly pierced with a thousand daggers. The second threw himself back in the coach, but he was pulled out by main force, and slaughtered like the first. The two others met with the same fate in their turn; and the assassins abandoned that vehicle to attack those which followed. They arrived one after the other in the fatal court; and the last of the twenty-four priests was murdered amidst the yells of the furious populace.*

At this moment hastily arrived Billaud-Varennes, a member of the communal council, and the only one amongst the organisers of these massacres who constantly defended them, and witnessed their perpetration with intrepid cruelty. He appeared wearing his official scarf, made his way through the blood and over the corpses, and addressed the mob of murderers in terms of approbation. "People," said he, "you exterminate your enemies; you do your duty." A voice was raised after Billaud had ceased; it was the voice of Maillard. "There's nothing more to be done here," he cried; "let us go to the Carmelites'." His band followed him; and all rushed tumultuously towards the church of the Carmelites, in which two hundred priests had been imprisoned. They broke into the church, and killed those unfortunate ecclesiastics as they prayed to Heaven, and embraced each other under impending death. They then raised loud shouts for the Archbishop of Arles, sought for, discovered, and dispatched him by cleaving his skull with a sabre. After wielding their swords in the slaughter, they levelled their fire-arms, and poured general volleys into the chambers and the garden, upon the walls and the trees, where many of the victims had fled to save themselves.

Whilst this massacre was proceeding at the Carmelite Church, Maillard returned to the Abbey with a part of his gang. Covered with blood and sweat, he entered the committee of the section of the Quatre-Nations, and demanded wine for the brave labourers who were delivering the nation from its enemies. The affrighted committee granted them twenty-four quarts.

The wine was served in the court, upon tables surrounded by the victims of the afternoon's massacre. After drinking, Maillard suddenly exclaimed, pointing to the prison, "To the Abbey!" At these words a new impulse was imparted to the assassins, and they commenced an attack upon the gate. The trembling prisoners heard the howls, and knew them to be the signals of death. The jailor and his wife fainted away. The doors were forced open; the first captives that offered were seized, dragged by the feet, and thrown all bleeding into the court. Whilst these were being slaughtered without distinction, Maillard and his associates demanded the prison register and the keys of the different wards. One of them, advancing towards the wicket, mounted on a stool, and commenced an harangue. "My friends," said he, "you are anxious to destroy the aristocrats who are the enemies of the people, and who designed to cut the throats of your wives and children whilst you were on the frontiers. You have good reason, doubtless; but you are good citizens, who love justice, and would be torn by remorse if you steeped your hands in innocent blood." "Yes! yes!" shouted the assassins. "Very well; then, I ask you, when you are thus rushing like infuriated tigers, without inquiry or discrimination, upon men who are unknown to you, do you not run the risk of confounding the innocent with the guilty?" The speaker was interrupted by one of his hearers, who, holding a sword in his hand, exclaimed in his turn, "Do you also wish to set us asleep? If the Prussians and Austrians were at Paris, would they seek to distinguish the guilty? I have a wife and children whom I will not leave in danger. If you please, you can give arms to these rascals, and we will fight them with equal numbers; but before we depart, Paris must be purged." "He is right—we must enter!" said the others, and they pushed forward. They were stopped, however, and compelled to consent to a species of trial. It was agreed that the prison register should be consulted, and that one of the assailants should perform the functions of a president, read aloud the names, the causes of detention, and pronounce upon the spot the fate of each prisoner. "Maillard! Maillard for president!" cried several voices, and that person immediately assumed the office. This terrible president seated himself at a table, spread before him the prison records, called around him some men selected at hazard to assist with their counsel, appointed others to bring forth the prisoners from the cells, and disposed the rest at the door to finish the murders. In order to avoid scenes of agony and despair, it was arranged that he should pronounce these words, "The gentleman to La Force," when the prisoner, being pushed through the wicket, would be delivered over, without suspecting it, to the swords awaiting him.

* Excepting one only, the Abbé Sicard, who was saved by a miracle.

The first brought forward were the Swiss detained at the Abbey, their officers having been conducted to the Conciergerie. "It was you," said Maillard to them, "who assassinated the people on the 10th August." "We were attacked," replied the wretched captives, "and we obeyed our leaders." "Well," coolly observed Maillard, "we only intend to conduct you to La Force." But the unfortunate Swiss had got a glimpse of the threatening swords on the other side of the wicket, and could not be deceived. They were urged to advance, but they recoiled and fell back. One of them, with a firmer spirit, asked where it was intended they should pass. The door was opened before him, and, lowering his head, he precipitated himself into the midst of the swords and pikes. The others rushed after him, and all suffered a like fate.

The executioners returned to the cells, collected the women into one chamber, and brought out fresh prisoners. Some amongst them, accused of forging assignats, were the first to fall. After them came the celebrated Montmorin, whose acquittal had caused so great a tumult, but had not procured him his freedom. Conducted before the blood-stained president, he declared, that having pleaded before a regular tribunal, he could not recognise any other. "In that case," replied Maillard, "you must go to La Force to await a new trial." The ex-minister, effectually deceived, craved a coach. He was informed he would find one at the gate. He made a fresh request for some effects, proceeded to the door, and received immediate death.

Thierry, the king's valet-de-chambre, was afterwards led out. "Like master, like servant," said Maillard; and the wretched man was dispatched. Subsequently came the justices of peace Buob and Bocquillon, accused of having formed part of the secret committee at the Tuileries, upon which ground they were killed. The night thus advanced, and each prisoner, as he heard the yells of the assassins, deemed his last hour at hand.

And what were the constituted authorities, the assembled bodies, the citizens of Paris, doing at this moment? In so immense a capital, silence and tumult, security and terror, may prevail at the same time, so distant is one part from another. It was late before the assembly heard of the outrages at the prisons, and, struck with dismay, it had forthwith sent a deputation to appease the people and save the victims. The commune had commissioned some of its members to deliver prisoners for debt, and distinguish between those who were called the innocent and the guilty. The Jacobins, although assembled, and well aware of all that was passing, observed a silence apparently studied. The ministers, sitting at the office of the marine in order to form a council, were as yet ignorant of the scenes enacting, and awaited the arrival of Danton, who was busy at the committee of surveillance. The commander-in-chief Santerre had, as he stated to the commune, issued orders, but they were not obeyed; and, besides, almost all his grenadiers were occupied with the guard of the barriers. It is certain there were furtive and contradictory commands, and all the evidences of some secret authority in opposition to the public authority were manifested. A piquet of national guards was stationed at the court of the Abbey, holding orders to give entrance but allow no exit. At other posts the men stood waiting for instructions, but received none. Santerre had either lost his presence of mind, as on the 10th August, or was in the plot. Whilst commissioners, publicly dispatched by the commune, came to preach tranquillity and stay the populace, other members of the same commune appeared before the committee of the Quatre-Nations, which was sitting close beside the scene of massacre, and said, "Is all going well here as at the Carmelites? The commune sends us to offer you assistance if you require any.

The commissioners sent by the assembly and the commune to put a stop to the murders, were quite powerless. They had found an immense crowd besieging the environs of the prison, and witnessing the frightful spectacle, with cries of "The nation for ever!" The aged Dusaulx, mounted on a chair, endeavoured to utter a few words of clemency, but was unable to obtain a hearing. Bazire, with greater tact, feigned to partake the resentment of the multitude, but was no longer listened to when he strove to awaken sentiments of compassion. Manuel, the procurator of the commune, stimulated by pity, ran the greatest risks without succeeding in saving a single victim. When these tidings were communicated, the commune, somewhat more roused in feeling, dispatched a second deputation "for the purpose of calming the excitement, and instructing the people as to their real interests." This deputation, equally impotent with the first, was merely able to release a few women and debtors.

The massacre continued during the whole night. The assassins at times changed characters, those at the wicket taking the place of those on the judgment-seat, and thus becoming alternately judges and executioners. Meanwhile they drank abundantly, setting their glasses, stained with blood, on the table. In the midst of this terrible carnage, however, they spared some victims, and experienced an inconceivable joy in granting them life. A young man, claimed by a section, and declared free from aristocracy, was acquitted to the shouts of "The nation for ever!" and borne in triumph on the bloody arms of the executioners. The venerable Sombreuil, governor of the Invalids, was brought forth in his turn, and condemned to be transferred to La Force. His daughter had perceived him from the depths of the prison; she sprang through swords and pikes, pressed her father in her arms, clung to him with such force, and supplicated the murderers with so many tears and in so heart-rending an accent, that their fury was arrested by amazement. Then, as if to test by further proof a sensibility which began to affect them, "Drink," they cried to the generous girl —"drink of the blood of aristocrats!" and they presented to her a goblet full of blood. She drank, and her father was saved. The daughter of Cazotte likewise succeeded in clasping her father in her arms; she entreated like the young and noble Sombreuil, was irresistible like her, and more happy, since she obtained the safety of her parent without any revolting test being imposed on her affection. Tears flowed from the eyes of these ferocious men, and then they returned to demand more victims! One of them, going back into the prison to bring out prisoners for slaughter, learnt that the unfortunate persons whose throats he came to cut had been without water during twenty-two hours, and he wished to put the jailor to death for his neglect. Another felt interested in a prisoner whom he was conducting to the wicket, because he heard him speak the dialect of his department. "Why art thou here?" said he to M. Journiac de Saint-Méard. "If thou art not a traitor, the president, who is not a fool, will render thee justice. Be firm, and answer without trembling." M. de Journiac was presented to Maillard, who inspected the register. "Ah!" said Maillard, "it is you, M. Journiac, who wrote in the Journal of the Court and the City?" "No," replied the prisoner, "it is a calumny; I never wrote in it." "Take care how you deceive us," observed Maillard, "for every falsehood is here punished with death. Have you not recently absented yourself for the purpose of joining the army of emigrants?" "That is also a calumny; I have a certificate attesting that I have not quitted Paris during twenty-three months." "From whom is the certificate? Is the signature authentic?" Luckily for M. de Journiac, there was a man in the sanguinary auditory to whom the signer of the certificate was personally known. The signature was accordingly verified, and declared genuine. "You see now," quoth M. de Journiac, "I have been calumniated." "If the calumniator were here," replied Maillard, "a terrible retribution would be inflicted on him. But say, was there no motive for imprisoning you?" "Yes," responded M. de Journiac, "I was known for an aristocrat." "An aristocrat!" "Yes, an aristocrat; but you are not here to try opinions, you can only judge conduct. Mine is without reproach: I have never conspired: my soldiers, in the regiment I commanded, adored me, and they besought me at Nanci to go and seize upon Malseigne." Struck with so undaunted a firmness, the judges looked at each other, and Maillard gave the signal of pardon. Instantly shouts of "The nation for ever!" resounded from all sides. The prisoner was embraced. Two individuals took hold of him, and, shielding him with their arms, carried him in safety through the fearful forest of pikes and sabres. M. de Journiac wished to give them money, but they refused it, and asked only to embrace him. Another prisoner, likewise saved, was conducted to his own house with equal fervour. The executioners, all steeped in blood, requested to be witnesses of the joy of his family, and immediately afterwards they returned to the carnage. In so convulsive a state, all the emotions successively beat in the human heart. Alternately a mild and savage animal, the man weeps or slays. Plunged in blood, he is suddenly touched by some noble instance of devotion or firmness; he is sensible of the honour of appearing just, alive to the vanity of seeming honest and disinterested. If, during these deplorable days of September, some of the savages acted both as murderers and robbers, others were seen coming to deposit on the desk of the committee at the Abbey the bloody jewels found on the slain.

But during this frightful night, the gang had devided, and carried carnage into the other prisons of Paris. At the Châtelet, La Force, La Conciergerie, the Bernardins, Saint-Firmin, La Salpêtrière, and the Bicêtre, the like slaughter had been perpetrated, and torrents of blood had flowed as at the Abbey. The following day, Monday the 3d September, the sun made manifest the atrocious deeds of darkness, and Paris looked on in stupor. Billaud-Varennes appeared again at the Abbey, where the evening before he had encouraged those he called the labourers. He again addressed them:—"My friends," said he, "by slaying the traitors, you have saved the country. France owes you an eternal gratitude, and the municipality is sensible of the obligation it has contracted towards you. It offers twenty-four livres to each of you, and that sum will be immediately paid." These words were received with unanimous applause; and those to whom they were spoken followed Billaud-Varennes into the committee, in order to obtain the payment that was promised them. "Where do you intend us to find funds for this outlay?" said the president to Billaud. He thereupon, pronouncing a fresh eulogy upon the massacres, replied to the president that the minister of the interior ought to provide them for such a purpose. The murderers hastened to Roland, who had learnt with the daylight the crimes of the night, and who rejected the demand with indignation. Returning to the committee, the assassins claimed, under pain of death, the wages of their infamous labours, and each member was obliged to empty his pockets to pay them. Ultimately the commune discharged the debt; and in the register of its expenses may be found several items of sums paid to the executioners of September. Under date of the 4th September especially, is marked a sum of one thousand four hundred and sixty-three livres as applied in that channel.

The tale of so many horrors had traversed all Paris, and diffused the utmost consternation. The Jacobins continued in their pristine silence. At the commune, men began to be moved with grief; but they did not fail to add that the people were justified, that they had struck none but criminals, and that in their vengeance they had only erred in anticipating the sword of the laws. The council-general had sent new commissioners "to calm the effervescence, and bring back to principles those who had been misled." Such were the expressions of the public authorities. Every where men were abroad, who, albeit lamenting the sufferings of the slaughtered, added: "If they had been left alive, they would have cut our throats in a few days." Others said: "If we be conquered and massacred by the Prussians, they at least will have fallen before us." Such are the dismal fruits of the fear mutually inspired by parties, and of the hatred engendered by that fear.

The assembly, in the midst of these frightful disorders, was grievously afflicted. Decree upon decree it passed, calling upon the commune to give an account of the state of Paris, to which the commune answered that it was applying all its energies to re-establish order and law. However, the assembly, composed of those Girondists who so intrepidly denounced the assassins of September, and died so nobly for having attacked them, was not inspired with the idea of proceeding in a body to the prisons, and interposing between the murderers and the victims. If that generous idea came not to tear the members from their benches, and impel them to the scene of carnage, it must be attributed to surprise, to the feeling of their utter powerlessness, perhaps also to that slender emotion evoked by the perils of enemies, and to that fatal conviction, partaken by several deputies, that the victims were only so many conspirators, from whom death would have been received if it had not been given.

One man displayed that day great magnanimity of character, and arose with noble energy against the assassins. In their reign of three days he entered his protest on the second. On the morning of Monday the instant he was apprised of the crimes of the night, he wrote to the mayor Pétion, who was as yet ignorant of them, and to Santerre, who remained inactive, addressing to them both the most urgent remonstrances. At the same moment he sent a letter to the assembly, which elicited great applause. This man of honesty and courage, so unworthily traduced by party-spirit, was the minister Roland. In his letter he denounced all kinds of disorders, the usurpations of the commune, and the outrages of the populace, saying nobly that he knew how to die at the post the law had assigned him. But we may form an idea of the disposition of the public mind, of the fury which raged against those who were called traitors, and of the caution it was needful to observe in speaking to the outrageous passions of the moment, by reflecting upon the following passage. Assuredly the courage of the man who, singly and publicly, threw the responsibility of the massacres upon all the authorities, cannot be questioned; and yet such is the manner in which he was obliged to express himself in that respect.

"Yesterday was a day over whose occurrences we ought perhaps to cast a veil. I know that the people, terrible in their vengeance, still observe in its exaction a species of justice; they do not render victims all who come in the way of their fury; they direct it upon those whom they believe to have been too long spared by the sword of the law, and whom the threatening aspect of affairs persuades them ought to be sacrificed without delay. But I know that it is easy for ruffians and traitors to take advantage of this ferment, and that it must be allayed; I aver that we owe to all France the declaration that the executive power could neither foresee nor prevent these excesses; I aver that it is the bounden duty of the constituted authorities to put a period to them, or to consider themselves as annihilated. I am well aware that this declaration will expose me to the rage of certain agitators. So be it! Let them take my life: I desire to preserve it only for liberty and equality. If they be violated, destroyed, either by the sway of foreign despots or the aberrations of a deluded people, I have lived long enough; but to my last sigh I shall have done my duty. That consciousness is the only possession I covet, and no power on earth shall take it from me."

The assembly greeted this letter with infinite applause; and, on the motion of Lamourette, ordained that the commune should render an account of the state of Paris. The commune rejoined that tranquillity was re-established. On learning the bold exhortations of the minister of the interior, Marat and his committee were moved with wrath, and audaciously directed against him a warrant of arrest. Such was their blind fury, that they dared to attack a minister, and a man who at the moment was still in the enjoyment of all his popularity. Danton, when he heard of their proceedings, exclaimed with vehemence against those members of the committee whom he called madmen. Although thwarted daily by the inflexibility of Roland, he was far from hating him; besides, he discountenanced, in his terrible policy, all that he deemed useless; and he looked upon it as a pure extravagance to seize the first minister of the state in the midst of his functions. He repaired to the municipality, burst into the committee-room, and inveighed with warmth against Marat. However, the others succeeded in appeasing him, and inducing a reconciliation between him and Marat. The warrant of arrest was put into his hands, and he proceeded forthwith to show it to Pétion, relating at the same time what he had done. "See," said he to the mayor, "of what these madmen are capable! But I know how to bring them to reason." "You have done wrong," coldly observed Pétion; "that act would have simply ruined its authors."

Pétion, likewise, though cooler in temperament than Roland, had evinced equal courage. He had written to Santerre, who, from impotence or collusion, merely replied that his heart was torn, but that he could not enforce the execution of his orders. He had subsequently repaired in person to the different scenes of the carnage. At La Force, he had dragged from their blood-stained seat two municipal officers, who, in their official scarfs, were performing the functions that Maillard exercised at the Abbey. But he had scarcely departed to visit the other prisons, than those municipal officers returned and resumed their executions. Pétion, every where powerless, ultimately repaired to the house of Roland, whom grief had thrown into a fit of illness. The Temple alone, against which the popular rage was strongly excited, on account of the important inmates it shielded, was secured from outrage. At that spot the armed force had been more respected; and a tricoloured ribbon, stretched between the walls and the populace, had sufficed to keep it back, and to save the royal family.

The monstrous beings who, since Sunday, had been shedding blood, had grown enamoured of their horrible task, and contracted a habit for it which they were unable to shake off. They had even established a certain regularity in their massacres: they suspended them, to remove the dead bodies and to take refreshments. Women, carrying food, went to the prisons and furnished dinner to their husbands, who, as they said, "were employed at the Abbey."

At La Force, Bicêtre, and the Abbey, the slaughter continued longer than elsewhere. It was at La Force that the unfortunate Princess de Lamballe was imprisoned—she who had been so idolised at court for her beauty and influence with the queen. She was led in a dying state to the fatal wicket. "Who are you?" asked the executioners in scarfs, addressing her. "Louisa of Savoy, Princess de Lamballe." "What part did you play at court? Are you acquainted with the plots of the palace?" "I never knew of any plot." "Take an oath to love liberty—take an oath to hate the king, the queen, and royalty." "I will take the first oath; I cannot take the second, it is not in my heart." "Swear, then" said one of the assistants, who desired to save her. But the unfortunate captive was no longer able to see or to hear. "Let the lady be released," said the foreman of the gang. Here, as at the Abbey, a phrase had been fixed upon to serve as the signal of death. They led away this forlorn female, whom they did not intend, some writers allege, to put to death, but actually to release. However, she was received at the door by some ruffians thirsting for carnage. A sabre-cut upon the back of her head made the blood spout forth. She still advanced, nevertheless, supported by two men, who possibly wished to save her; but she fell, a few paces farther, under a second blow. Her beautiful form was lacerated and hacked. The assassins outraged and mutilated her body, and divided its portions. Her head, her heart, and other parts of the corpse, stuck on the points of pikes, were paraded through the streets of Paris. It was but proper, said these persons, in their atrocious language, to carry them to the foot of the throne. They ran to the Temple, and startled with frightful howls the wretched captives, who inquired with terror what was their cause. The municipal officers strove to prevent their seeing the horrible procession pass beneath their window, and the bleeding head elevated on the end of the pike. A national guard at length said to the queen, "It is the head of Lamballe they wish to prevent you seeing." At these words the queen fainted. The Princess Elizabeth, the king, and the valet-de-chambre Cléry, removed in their arms the unfortunate queen; but the yells of the ferocious crowd continued for a length of time to echo around the walls of the Temple.

The day of the 3d, and the night between the 3d and 4th, were stained with a continuance of these murders. At Bicêtre especially the carnage was longer and greater than at the other prisons. There, several thousand prisoners were confined for every variety of offence. They were attacked, and endeavoured to defend themselves. Cannon was brought up to reduce them. A member of the communal council-general scrupled not to come and ask assistance to overpower the prisoners who were guilty of defending themselves. He was not listened to. Pétion again repaired to Bicêtre, but could effect nothing. An insatiate thirst for blood infuriated the multitude; a frenzy for combat and slaughter had succeeded with the populace to political fanaticism, and they slew for the pleasure of slaying. The massacre lasted at Bicêtre until Wednesday the 5th of September.

At last, almost all the destined victims had perished; the prisons were empty; the furious demanded more blood, but the sombre instigators of so many murders seemed to evince some return to pity. The expressions used by the commune began to breathe gentler sentiments. Deeply afflicted, it said, at the rigours exercised against the prisoners, it issued fresh orders to suppress them, and was now better obeyed. At the same time there remained but few individuals to whom its mercy could be available. The estimate of the number of victims differs in all the accounts of the time, ranging from six to twelve thousand as the amount of those who were massacred in the prisons of Paris.*

* The following extracts give some curious details respecting the days of September, and pourtray those frightful scenes in their true aspect. It was at the Jacobin Club the most important revelations were made, in consequence of the disputes which arose in the convention.

(SITTING OF MONDAY 29TH OCTOBER 1792.)

Chabot.—"This morning Louvet has asserted a fact which it is essential to review. He said it was not the men of the 10th August who acted on the day of the 2d September; and I, as an eyewitness, tell you it was the same men. He said there were not two hundred acting persons, and I tell you that I passed under an arch of steel formed by ten thousand sabres: I appeal to Bazire, Colon, and other deputies who were with me: between the Court of the Monks and the prison of the Abbey they were obliged to press close in order to allow us room to pass. I recognised, for my own

But if the executions spread consternation, the audacity requisite to avow and recommend an imitation of them is a phenomenon not less surprising than the executions themselves. The committee of surveillance did not shrink from distributing a circular through all the communes of France, which history is bound to preserve, with the seven signatures attached to it. This astounding record is as follows:—

"Paris, 2d September 1792.

Brothers and Friends—A detestable plot, hatched by the court, for murdering all the patriots of the French empire—a plot in which a great number of members of assembly are compromised, having reduced the commune of Paris, on the 9th of last month, to the cruel necessity of using the force of the people to save the nation, it neglected nothing to deserve well of the country. After the testimonies borne to its vigilance by the national assembly itself, could it have been imagined that fresh plots were brewing in silence at the very time, and that they should burst forth precisely as the national assembly, forgetting it had just declared the commune of Paris to have saved the country, determined upon superseding it as the reward of its intense civicism? At this intelligence, the public clamour, which arose on every side, convinced the national assembly of the urgent necessity of uniting with the people, and of restoring to the commune, by the repeal of the decree of deprivation, the power with which it had invested it.

Proud of enjoying in full plenitude the national confidence, which it will endeavour to merit more and more—placed in the centre of all conspiracies, and determined to perish for the public safety, it will plume itself on having done its duty only when it shall have obtained your approbation, which is the object of all its hopes, and of which it will be assured only when all the departments have sanctioned its measures for the public safety. Professing the principles of the most perfect equality, and desiring no other privilege than that of being the first to mount the breach, it will joyfully lower itself to the level of the smallest commune in the empire, so soon as there shall be nothing more to dread.

Aware that barbarian hordes are advancing against it, the commune of Paris hastens to inform its brethren in all the departments that a part of the ferocious conspirators detained in the prisons has been put to death by the people: an act of justice which appeared to them indispensable for restraining by force of terror the legions of traitors contained within their walls, at the moment they were about to march against the enemy; and doubtless the nation, after the long series of treasons which has conducted it to the edge of the abyss, will freely adopt a measure so useful and necessary; and all the French will say like the Parisians—'We march to meet the enemy, but we leave not behind us brigands to cut the throats of our wives and children!'

(Signed) DUPLAIN, PANIS, SERGENT, LENFANT, MARAT, LEFORT, JOURDEUIL, Administrators of the Committee of Surveillance constituted at the Municipality."

A perusal of this document will serve to demonstrate to what a height of fanaticism the approach of danger had driven a vast proportion of the people. But it is time to revert to the theatre of the war, where more glorious recollections are to be found.

part, one hundred and fifty federalists. It is impossible but that Louvet and his adherents were present at those popular executions. At the same time, any one who could coolly pronounce such a discourse as that of Louvet, cannot have much humanity; I know that, since his speech, I would not like to sleep by his side for fear of being assassinated. I call upon Pétion to declare if it be true that there were not more than two hundred men at those executions: but it is natural that intriguers should fasten on that day, respecting which France has yet much to learn. They wish to cut off the patriots in detail; they are about to decree impeachment against Robespierre, Marat, Danton, Santerre. They will soon add to the number, Bazire, Merlin, Chabot, Montaut, even Grangeneuve, if he had not become reconciled with them. Then they will propose a decree against the whole Faubourg Saint-Antoine, against the forty-eight sections; and we shall be eight hundred thousand men decreed for impeachment! They ought, however, to be pretty sure of their power, since they demand an ostracism."

(SITTING OF MONDAY 5TH NOVEMBER.)

"Fabre d'Eglantine offers remarks on the day of the 2d September. He affirms that it was the men of the 10th August who broke open the prisons of the Abbey, those of Orleans, and those of Versailles. He says, that, in those critical moments, he saw the same men come to the house of Danton, and evince their gratification by rubbing their hands; that one amongst them expressed a keen desire that Morande should be immolated. He adds, that he saw, in the garden of the minister for foreign affairs, the minister Roland, pale, dejected, his head leaning against a tree, and demanding the removal of the convention to Tours or Blois. The speaker says, further, that Danton alone showed great energy of character during that day; that he never despaired of the safety of the country; that, by striking the earth with his foot, he made thousands of defenders start up; and that he had sufficient moderation not to abuse the species of dictatorship with which the national assembly had invested him, by its decree that those who should impede the ministerial operations should be punished with death. Fabre afterwards declares that he has received a letter from Madame Roland, in which she, the wife of the minister of the interior, begs him to give his aid to a particular line of tactics, in order to carry some decrees in the convention. The speaker demands that the society order the framing of an address, which shall contain all the historical details of the events which have occurred since the period of Lafayette's acquittal up till this day."

Chabot.—"Here are the facts it is important to know. On the 10th August, the people in insurrection determined to sacrifice the Swiss; at that epoch, the Brissotins did not deem themselves the men of the 10th, for they came to implore us to have pity on them; such were the expressions of Lasource. I was a god upon that day: I saved one hundred and fifty Swiss; I stopped by myself alone, at the door of the Feuillants, the people who wished to penetrate into the hall, to sacrifice to their vengeance those unfortunate Swiss: the Brissotins were afraid lest the massacre should extend to them. From what I had done on the 10th August, I expected on the 2d September that I should be deputed to the people; no! the extraordinary commission, with the supreme Brissot for its president, did not choose me! Whom did it select? Dusaulx, to whom, it is true, Bazire was joined. It was not ignorant, however, what men were alone capable of influencing the people, and stopping the effusion of blood. I encountered the deputation on the way; Bazire urged me to accompany him; he induced me to accede. Had Dusaulx any particular instructions? I know not; but this I know, that Dusaulx would not allow any one to speak. Amidst an assemblage of 10,000 men, amongst whom were 150 Marseillese, Dusaulx mounted on a chair; he was much confused; he had to speak to men armed with daggers. When he at length gained silence, I addressed him rapidly in these words, "If you have self-possession, you will stop the effusion of blood; tell the Parisians it is their interest the massacre should cease, in order that the departments may not conceive apprehensions relative to the safety of the national convention about to assemble at Paris." Dusaulx heard me; but, from insincerity or the vanity of old age, he did nothing as I told him; and yet it is M. Dusaulx who is proclaimed as the only honest man in the deputation of Paris! A second fact, not less essential, is, that the massacre of the prisoners at Orleans was not perpetrated by Parisians. That massacre ought to be esteemed the more odious, since it was longer after the 10th August, and was committed by a less number of men. But the intriguers never speak of it; they say not a word about it, because an enemy of Brissot perished on that occasion—the minister of foreign affairs, who had dismissed his protegé Narbonne. If I, of myself, at the door of the Feuillants, stopped the people who wished to slay the Swiss, how much more ought the Legislative Assembly to have prevented the effusion of blood! If, then, any crime were committed, it must be charged upon the Legislative Assembly, or rather upon Brissot, who then managed it."

CHAPTER XIII.

CAMPAIGN OF THE ARGONNE.—VICTORY OF VALMY.—RETREAT OF THE ALLIES.

We have already seen that Dumouriez had held council of war at Sedan. Dillon had there delivered an opinion in favour of a retreat to Châlons, in order to place the Marne in front of the French army, the passage of which river he proposed to defend. The disorganised condition of the 23,000 men left to Dumouriez; the impossibility of their resisting 80,000 Prussians, exactly disciplined and inured to war; the plan attributed to the enemy of making a rapid invasion without stopping before fortresses—were the reasons which led Dillon to believe that the French could not retard the Prussians, and that they ought to retire in all haste before them in quest of stronger positions, and thereby make amends for the weakness and inefficient state of their forces. The council was so struck with these reasons, that it unanimously adhered to Dillon's opinion, and Dumouriez, with whom the decision lay as general-in-chief, replied that he would take time to consider.

It was on the evening of the 28th August that a resolution was taken which saved France. Several have laid claim to the honour of it, but it is quite clear that it belongs to Dumouriez. At all events, the execution renders it exclusively his, and ought to secure him all the glory. France, as the reader is aware, is defended to the east by the Rhine and the Vosges, and to the north by a series of fortresses, monuments of the genius of Vauban, and by the Meuse, the Moselle, and various streams of water, which, in conjunction with the fortresses, present a combination of obstacles sufficient to protect that frontier. The enemy had penetrated into France by the north, and directed his march between Sedan and Metz, leaving the siege of the strong places in the Low Countries to the Duke of Saxe-Teschen, and masking Metz and Lorraine by a body of troops. To follow up this plan, he ought to have advanced rapidly, to profit by the disorganisation of the French, strike them with terror by decisive attacks, and overwhelm, in fact, the 23,000 men of Lafayette, before a new general had imparted to them unity and confidence. But the contest between the presumption of the King of Prussia and the circumspection of Brunswick, retarded every resolution, and prevented the allies from being seriously either daring or prudent. The capture of Verdun tended to excite the vanity of Frederick William and the ardour of the emigrants, but gave no stimulus to the activity of Brunswick, who strongly disapproved of the invasion with the means intrusted to him, and with the dispositions of the invaded country. After the fall of Verdun, on the 2d September, the allied army lay extended for several days over the plains bordering on the Meuse, contenting itself with the occupation of Stenay, and not making a step in advance. Dumouriez was at Sedan, and his army encamped in the environs.

From Sedan to Passavant stretches a forest, whose name ought to be for ever famous in French annals. It is the forest of the Argonne, which covers a space of from thirteen to fifteen leagues, and which, from the inequalities of surface, and the mixture of wood and water, is completely impassable to an army, except at certain principal avenues. By this forest it was necessary for the enemy to penetrate in order to reach Châlons, and afterwards pursue the route to Paris. Holding such a scheme, it is surprising he had not yet thought of occupying its principal passes, and therein anticipating Dumouriez, who in his position at Sedan was distant from them by the whole length of the forest. In the evening after the sitting of the council of war, the French general examined the map with an officer in whose talents he placed the firmest confidence—Thouvenot. Pointing out to him with his finger the Argonne, and the openings by which it is traversed, he said to him, "There is the Thermopylæ of France: if I can get there before the Prussians, all is saved!"

These words warmed the genius of Thouvenot, and the two generals set seriously about the details of this admirable project. The advantages it held out were very considerable. Not only did it obviate the necessity of a retreat, and of making the Marne a last line of defence, but it caused the enemy to lose some very precious time; it would oblige him to remain in the Champagne-Pouilleuse, the wasted, swampy, and barren soil of which was incapable of supporting an army; it would save abandoning to him, as in the case of a retreat to Châlons, the three bishoprics, rich and fertile districts, where he might winter in excellent quarters, supposing even that he should fail in forcing the Marne. If the enemy, after having lost some time before the forest, should determine upon turning it, and proceeding towards Sedan, he would find in front of him the fortresses of the Low Countries; and it was beyond supposition that they would all fall before him. If he ascended towards the other extremity of the forest, he would encounter Metz and the army of the centre; in which case Dumouriez would put himself in pursuit, and, effecting a junction with Kellermann, might form a mass of 50,000 men, resting on Metz and various fortified places. In every case, it would cause the purpose of the enemy's march to fail, and ensure the loss of the campaign; for it was already September, and it was still usual at that season to put armies into winter quarters. The project, therefore, was excellent; but obstacles stood in the way of its execution. The Prussians, extending along the Argonne, whilst Dumouriez was at one of its extremities, could easily have occupied its passes; consequently the fate of this grand scheme, and of France, depended upon a chance and an oversight of the enemy.

Five defiles, called the Chêne-Populeux, the Croix-aux-Bois, Grand-Pré, La Chalade, and Les Islettes, intersected the Argonne. The most important were Grand-Pré and Les Islettes; and, unfortunately, they were the farthest from Sedan, and the nearest to the enemy. Dumouriez resolved to proceed thither himself with all his army. At the same time he ordered General Dubouquet to quit the department of the North, and occupy the avenue of the Chêne-Populeux, which was of great importance, but very near Sedan, and consequently its occupation was less urgent. Two routes offered themselves to Dumouriez to reach Grand-Pré and Les Islettes; the one behind the forest, the other before it and in face of the enemy. The first, passing in the rear of the forest, was the safest but also the longest; it would expose the plan to the enemy, and give him time to counteract it. The second was shorter; but it likewise betrayed the object, and exposed the march to the attacks of a formidable army. It would be necessary, in fact, to skirt the length of the forest, and pass before Stenay, where Clairfayt and his Austrians were stationed. Dumouriez, however, preferred the latter route, and adopted the boldest course. He concluded, that, with the usual Austrian prudence, the general would not fail, when he saw the French, to intrench himself in the excellent camp of Brouenne; and that, whilst he was so doing, they would slip past him, and push forward to Grand-Pré and Les Islettes.

Accordingly, on the 30th, Dillon was set in motion, and departed with 8000 men for Stenay, marching between the Meuse and the Argonne. He encountered Clairfayt, who occupied the two banks of the river with 25,000 Austrians. General Miaczinsky attacked with 1500 men the advanced posts of Clairfayt, whilst Dillon, stationed in the rear, marched to his support with his whole division. A smart firing ensued; and Clairfayt, immediately repassing the Meuse, proceeded to fix himself at Brouenne, as Dumouriez had very exactly forethought. In the mean time, Dillon boldly continued his route between the Meuse and the Argonne. Dumouriez closely followed him with the 15,000 men who formed his main army, and they both advanced towards the positions prescribed for them. On the 2d September Dumouriez was at Beffu, and had only one march to make to reach Grand-Pré. Dillon was the same day at Pierremont, and still drawing nearer the Islettes with exemplary intrepidity. Fortunately for him, General Galbaud, who had been sent to reinforce the garrison of Verdun, had arrived too late, and fallen back on the Islettes, which he consequently held in advance. Dillon arrived there on the 4th with his 10,000 men, forthwith established himself, and furthermore sent a detachment to seize La Chalade, another secondary pass which was confided to him. At the same time, Dumouriez reached Grand-Pré, found the post vacant, and took possession of it on the 3d. Thus on the 3d and 4th, the passes were occupied by the French, and the safety of the country was materially secured.

It was by this daring march, at least as meritorious as the idea of occupying the Argonne, that Dumouriez put himself in a state to resist the invasion. But much more was required; it was necessary to render these passes impregnable, and for that end to make a variety of dispositions, the success of which depended on a multitude of chances.

Dillon intrenched himself at the Islettes: he felled trees, raised excellent intrenchments, and, skilfully disposing his artillery, which was numerous and efficient, planted batteries in such a manner as to render the pass inaccessible. He occupied, likewise, La Chalade; and was thus master of the two routes which conducted to Sainte-Menehould, and from Sainte-Menehould to Châlons. Dumouriez established himself at Grand Pré, in a camp which nature and art had combined to render formidable. The army was stationed on heights, extending in the form of an amphitheatre. At the base of these heights stretched vast pasture-lands, in front of which ran the Aire, forming the tête-du-camp. Two bridges were thrown over the Aire; two strong advanced guards were posted on them, with orders to retreat in case of attack, and burn the bridges. The enemy, after dislodging these advanced troops, would have to effect a passage across the Aire without the aid of bridges, and exposed to the fire of the whole French artillery. After clearing the river, he would have to traverse a basin of meadows with a thousand cross-fires, and finally carry steep and almost inaccessible intrenchments. Supposing all these obstacles should be overcome, Dumouriez, retiring by the heights he occupied, could descend on their opposite flanks, take at their base the Aisne, another water-course skirting them in the rear, cross two other bridges he would take care to destroy, and thus again place a river between him and the Prussians. This camp might indeed be deemed impregnable, and there the French general was in sufficient security to enable him to attend in tranquillity to the whole theatre of the war.

On the 7th, General Dubouquet occupied with 6000 men the pass of the Chêne-Populeux. The only avenue that remained free was the comparatively unimportant one of the Croix-aux-Bois, situated between the Chêne-Populeux and the Grand-Pré. Dumouriez, after breaking up the road and felling trees, had posted there a colonel with two battalions and two squadrons. Thus, placed in the centre of the forest, and in an impregnable camp, he defended the principal defile with 15,000 men, having on his right, at a distance of four leagues, Dillon, who guarded the Islettes and La Chalade with 8000 men, on his left Dubouquet, defending the Chêne-Populeux with 6000, and in the interval between the Chêne-Populeux and Grand-Pré, a colonel watching with a few companies over the route of the Croix-aux-Bois, which had been considered of very secondary importance.

His entire defence being thus constituted, he was in a condition to wait for reinforcements, and he hastened to give orders with reference to that object. He directed Beurnonville to quit the frontiers of the Low Countries, where the Duke of Saxe-Teschen was attempting nothing of moment, and to be at Rethel on the 13th September with 10,000 men. He assigned Châlons as the depôt for provisions and munitions, and the rendezvous for recruits and reinforcements dispatching to him. He thus concentrated behind him all the means available for an effectual resistance. At the same time, he apprised the executive power that he had occupied the Argonne. "Grand-Pré and Les Islettes," he wrote, "are our straits of Thermopylæ; but I will be more fortunate than Leonidas." He required that some regiments should be detached from the army of the Rhine, which was not menaced, and added to the army of the centre, previously intrusted to Kellermann. As the plan of the Prussians evidently was to march on Paris, from their masking Montmedy and Thionville, without stopping before them, he desired that Kellermann should be ordered to skirt their left by Ligny and Bar-le-Duc, and thus take them in flank and in rear during their offensive march. According to all these dispositions, if the Prussians, renouncing the idea of forcing the Argonne, should proceed higher up, Dumouriez might reach Revigny before them, and there meet Kellermann coming from Metz with the army of the centre. If they went down towards Sedan, Dumouriez would still follow them, join the 10,000 men under Beurnonville, and await Kellermann upon the banks of the Aisne. In both cases, the junction would concentrate a mass of 60,000 men, capable of appearing in the open field.

The executive power omitted nothing to second Dumouriez in his skilful dispositions. Servan, the minister at war, though suffering from illness, gave unremitting attention to the provisioning of the armies, to the transport of stores and ammunition, and to the assembling of the new levies. He dispatched every day from Paris from 1500 to 2000 volunteers. A general feeling towards the army had set in, and people flocked to it in multitudes. The patriotic societies, the communal councils, and the national assembly, were continually interrupted by companies spontaneously levied parading through their halls before they departed for Châlons, the general rendezvous for volunteers. Nothing was wanting to these young soldiers but discipline and the habit of war, which, although at present not possessing, they might soon acquire under an able general.

The Girondists were personal enemies of Dumouriez, and placed but a small share of confidence in him ever since he had driven them from the ministry; they had even purposed superseding him in the general command in favour of an officer named Grimoard. But they cordially united with him so soon as the destinies of the country seemed greatly to depend upon him. Roland, the purest and most magnanimous amongst them, wrote to him a touching letter, in which he assured him that all was forgotten, and that all his friends wished only to have his victories to celebrate.

Dumouriez, then, had energetically seized upon the threatened frontier, and made himself the focus of great movements, hitherto too slow and disunited. He had happily occupied the defiles of the Argonne, and taken up a position which afforded the armies time to unite and organise themselves in his rear. He brought up in succession all the various corps, in order to form one imposing mass, and placed Kellermann under the necessity of receiving his orders from him. His command was distinguished for vigour and celerity; and he imparted courage to his soldiers by appearing in the midst of them, testifying unlimited confidence in them, and inspiriting them with ardour for speedy combat with the enemy.

Such was the state of affairs on the 10th September. The Prussians attempted all the French posts, skirmished in front of all their intrenchments, and were every where repulsed. Dumouriez had cut secret communications in the interior of the forest, and was thus enabled to bring unexpected forces upon menaced points, which, in the opinion of the enemy, doubled the actual strength of the French army. On the 11th, there was a general attack against Grand-Pré, but General Miranda, stationed at Mortaume, and General Stengel at Saint-Jouvin, repelled all the attempts. The soldiers, encouraged by their position, and the firm attitude of their leaders, leapt over the intrenchments at several points, and advanced with bayonets fixed to meet the assailants in their approach. These combats served to keep the army occupied: at the same time it often wanted provisions, on account of the inevitable disorder attendant upon a volunteer enrolment. But the gaiety of the general, who fared no better than his soldiers, induced all to bear privations with resignation; and, in spite of a dysentery which began to prevail, a gratifying contentment reigned in the camp of Grand-Pré. The superior officers alone, who doubted the possibility of a long resistance, and the ministry, whose faith was not more confirmed, spoke of a retreat behind the Marne, and pestered Dumouriez with their forebodings. He, on his part, wrote stimulating letters to the ministers, and imposed silence upon his officers, telling them that when he desired to hear their opinions he would convoke a council of war.

The most brilliant qualities of a man are unavoidably accompanied by certain drawbacks. The very promptitude of Dumouriez's genius often blinded him to reflection. His ardour in conception had already sometimes led him to overlook material obstacles to his projects, a signal instance of which occurred when he ordered Lafayette to proceed from Metz to Givet. He here again committed a capital blunder, which, if he had been endowed with less strength of character and cool determination, would have caused the loss of the campaign. Between the Chêne-Populeux and Grand-Pré was, as we have stated, a secondary avenue, the importance of which had been deemed inconsiderable, and it was consequently defended by but two battalions and two squadrons. Overpowered with urgent demands upon his attention, Dumouriez had not gone in person to estimate the value of this defile. Besides, having but few men at disposal to station there, he had too readily adopted the idea that a few hundred men would suffice to guard it. To increase the mischief, the colonel who commanded at that post persuaded him that a part even of the troops already there might be withdrawn, and that, by breaking up the roads, a few volunteers would be able to maintain the defensive. Dumouriez allowed himself to be deceived by this colonel, who was an old soldier, and held worthy of confidence.

In the mean time, Brunswick had examined the different French positions, and for a moment entertained the project of skirting the forest as far as Sedan, with the view of turning it at that extremity. Whilst preparing for this movement, it would seem that his scouts acquainted him with the negligence of the French general. The Croix-aux-Bois was attacked by some Austrians and emigrants commanded by the Prince de Ligne. The intrenchments of felled trees had scarcely been commenced, the roads were not broken, and the pass was occupied without resistance on the morning of the 13th. The instant Dumouriez learnt this disastrous intelligence, he sent General Chasot, a man of distinguished bravery, with two brigades, six squadrons, and four eight-pounders, to dislodge the Austrians and again occupy the pass. He directed they should be attacked with the utmost promptitude at the point of the bayonet, before they should have time to intrench themselves. The 13th and 14th September both elapsed ere General Chasot could execute his orders. At length, on the 15th, he attacked with vigour, and drove back the enemy, who lost both the post and its commander, the Prince de Ligne. But, attacked two hours later by a very superior force, and before he could intrench himself, he was repulsed in his turn, and entirely dispossessed of the Croix-aux-Bois. He was furthermore cut off from Grand-Pré, and unable to retire towards the main army, which was thus weakened to the extent of his force. He accordingly fell back on Vouziers. General Dubouquet, commanding at the Chêne-Populeux, and hitherto successful in his resistance, seeing himself separated from Grand Pré, conceived that he ought not to expose himself to the risk of being enveloped by the enemy, who, having pierced the line at the Croix-aux-Bois, was about to debouch in mass. He resolved, therefore, to decamp, and retreat by Attigny and Somme-Puis upon Châlons. Thus the fruit of so many bold combinations and auspicious accidents was lost; the only obstacle in the way of the invasion, the Argonne, was overcome, and the route to Paris laid open.

Dumouriez, severed from Chasot and Dubouquet, had no more than fifteen thousand men; and if the enemy, debouching rapidly by the Croix-aux-Bois, turned the position of Grand-Pré and occupied the passages of the Aisne, which, as we have stated, served for outlet at the rear of the camp, the French general was undone. With forty thousand Prussians in front and twenty-five thousand Austrians in rear, thus hemmed in with fifteen thousand men by sixty-five thousand, by two streams of water and the forest, he could have done nothing more than lay down his arms or perish uselessly to the last man. The only army upon which France relied was in that case annihilated, and the allies were at full liberty to march upon Paris.

In this desperate situation, the general's courage was dauntless as ever, and he preserved an admirable coolness. His first care was that very day to take measures for securing a retreat, since the most pressing matter on his hands was to free himself with all dispatch from the Caudine forks. He reflected that by his right he touched Dillon, still master of the Islettes and of the route to Sainte-Menehould; that by falling back upon his rear, and resting his army back to back with him, they would both face the enemy, the one at the Islettes and the other at Sainte-Menehould, and thus present a double intrenched front. There they might await the junction of the two generals, Chasot and Dubouquet, now detached from the main body; that of Beurnonville, ordered from Flanders to be at Rethel on the 13th; and, lastly, that of Kellermann, who, having been already upwards of ten days on the march, could not be long in arriving. This plan was the best and the most consistent with the system adopted by Dumouriez, which was not to retreat into the interior towards an open country, but to keep in a difficult country, in which to temporise and put himself in a position to effect his junction with the army of the centre. If, on the contrary, he had fallen back on Châlons, he would have been pursued as a fugitive, executing, under every disadvantage, a retreat he might have made more advantageously at first, and debarring himself, above all, from the possibility of an union with Kellermann. It evinced great hardihood, after a mischance such as that of the Croix-aux-Bois, to persist in his system; and it needed at the moment equal genius and energy to avoid yielding to the counsel, so oft repeated, to retire behind the Marne. But, after all, how many fortunate chances were requisite to effect successfully a retreat so difficult, so harassed, and to be made with so small a body of troops in the face of so powerful an enemy!

Without a moment's delay, he sent orders to Beurnonville, previously directed upon Rethel, to Chasot, from whom he had just received some cheering news, and to Dubouquet, retiring upon Attigny, enjoining all of them to muster at Sainte-Menehould. At the same time, he again sent a message to Kellermann to continue his march, for he was reasonably apprehensive lest Kellermann, when he learnt the loss of the defiles, should return to Metz. After having made all these dispositions, and receiving a Prussian officer who requested a parley, to whom he showed the camp in the highest order, he struck his tents at midnight, and marched in silence towards the two bridges which served for communication to the camp of Grand-Pré. Luckily for him, the enemy had not yet thought of penetrating by the Croix-aux-Bois and turning the French positions. The sky was stormy, and covered with its shadows the retreat of the French. They marched all night over deplorable roads; and the army, which had not been allowed time to take alarm, retired without knowing the reason that induced its commander to change his position. The next day, the 16th, at eight in the morning, all the troops had crossed the Aisne; Dumouriez had escaped, and he halted in battle-array upon the heights of Autry, four leagues from Grand-Pré. He was not pursued; concluding himself safe, he advanced to Dammartin-sur-Hans, in order to select an encampment for the day, but was suddenly startled by fugitives crying out that all was lost, and that the enemy, having fallen on the rear, had put the army to rout. Dumouriez hastened to his rearguard, and found the Peruvian Miranda and old General Duval stopping the fugitives, and reforming, with exemplary fortitude, the ranks of the army, which the Prussian hussars had for a time surprised and broken. The inexperience of these young troops, and the fears of treachery which then filled all minds, rendered panics easy and frequent. However, all was remedied by the exertions of the three generals, Miranda, Duval, and Stengel, who were stationed in the rearguard. The army bivouacked at Dammartin, with hopes of soon reaching the back of the Islettes, and happily terminating its perilous retreat.

Dumouriez had been on horseback twenty hours. At six in the evening he was dismounting, when he again suddenly heard cries of terror and dismay, imprecations against generals who were traitors, and especially against the commander-in-chief, who had gone over, it was said, to the enemy. The artillery was horsed, and about to be driven off to a height for safety. All the troops were thrown together and confounded. He caused large bonfires to be lighted, and gave orders that the army should remain on the spot all night. Ten hours were thus passed in mud and darkness. Upwards of fifteen hundred fugitives, escaping across the fields, spread the intelligence at Paris, and through all France, that the army of the north, the last hope of the country, was lost, and delivered into the hands of the enemy.

The next day all was repaired. Dumouriez wrote to the national assembly with his accustomed confidence. "I have been obliged to abandon the camp of Grand-Pré," said he. "The retreat was effected, when a panic seized upon the army, and 10.000 men fled before 1500 Prussian hussars. The loss does not exceed fifty men and some baggage. ALL IS REMEDIED, AND I ANSWER FOR ALL." Nothing less than such assurances would have sufficed to calm the terrors of Paris and the executive council, which was again moved to enjoin upon the general the passage behind the Marne.

Sainte-Menehould, whither Dumouriez was marching, is situated on the Aisne, one of the two rivers which enclosed the encampment at Grand-Pré. Dumouriez, therefore, had to ascend its course, and before reaching it, had to pass three tolerably deep streams which fall into it, namely, the Tourbe, the Bionne, and the Auve. Beyond these three streams was the camp he intended to occupy. In front of Sainte-Menehould rise in circular form some heights for three-quarters of a league. At their base stretches a sunken plain, in which the Auve forms marshes before discharging its waters into the Aisne. This hollow is bounded on the right by the heights of L'Hyron, in front by those of La Lune, and on the left by those of Gisaucourt. In the centre of the basin are different elevations, lower, however, than those of Sainte-Menehould. The hill of Valmy is one of them, and immediately fronts the eminence of La Lune. The high road from Châlons to Sainte-Menehould passes across this basin, almost parallel to the course of the Auve. It was at Sainte-Menehould, and above this basin, that Dumouriez planted himself. He took possession of all the most important positions around him, and rested his rear against Dillon, whom he urged to hold firm against the enemy. He thus occupied the high road to Paris upon three points—Les Islettes, Sainte-Menehould, and Châlons.

It was possible, however, for the Prussians, if they penetrated by Grand-Pré, to leave him at Sainte-Menehould, and make a rapid advance to Châlons. Consequently Dumouriez ordered Dubouquet, whose happy arrival at Châlons he had learnt, to occupy with his division the camp of L'Epine, and collect there all the volunteers recently arrived, in order to cover Châlons from a sudden attack. He was subsequently joined by Chasot, and ultimately by Beurnonville. The latter had come in sight of Sainte-Menehould on the 15th. Perceiving an army in excellent position, he had supposed it to be the enemy, for he could not imagine that Dumouriez, who was reported vanquished, had so speedily and successfully extricated himself from the embarrassments by which he was understood to have been paralysed. Under this impression, he had fallen back on Châlons, when, being informed of the real state of the case, he had returned and taken up a position on the 19th at Maffrecourt, on the right of the camp. He brought with him those 10,000 men whom Dumouriez had ably trained, during a month in the camp at Maulde, by a constant war of posts. When strengthened by Chasot and Beurnonville, Dumouriez could muster 35,000 men. Thus, owing to his firmness and presence of mind, he again found himself in a very strong position, and in a capacity to temporise nearly at pleasure. But if the enemy, acting promptly, should leave him behind, and push rapidly forward to Châlons, what became of his camp at Sainte-Menehould? The same fear was always present; and his precautions, by the camp at L'Épine, were quite inefficient to obviate such a danger.

Two movements were progressing leisurely in his vicinity—that of the Duke of Brunswick, who hesitated in his march, and that of Kellermann, who, having left Metz on the 4th, had not yet arrived at the stipulated point, after being fifteen days on the road. But if the slowness of Brunswick availed Dumouriez, that of Kellermann seriously compromised him. This general, prudent and irresolute, though of undoubted gallantry, had alternately advanced and receded, according to the marches of the Prussian army; and so lately as the 17th, on learning the loss of the defiles, he had made a retrograde movement. At length, on the evening of the 19th, he apprised Dumouriez that he was within two leagues of Sainte-Menehould. Dumouriez had reserved for him the heights of Gisaucourt, situated on his left, and commanding the road to Châlons, and the rivulet of the Auve. He had communicated to him, that in case of a battle, he might deploy on the secondary heights, and plant himself on Valmy, on the opposite side of the Auve. He could not spare time to go in person and post his colleague. Kellermann, passing the Auve during the night of the 19th, fixed himself on Valmy, in the centre of the basin, and neglected the heights of Gisaucourt, which formed the left of the camp of Sainte-Menehould, and commanded those of La Lune, upon which the Prussians were arriving.

At this moment, in fact, the Prussians, debouching by Grand-Pré, had arrived in sight of the French army, and scaling the heights of La Lune, obtained a view for the first time of the ground whose summit was occupied by Dumouriez. Renouncing the idea of a forced march on Châlons, they were rejoiced, it i; said, to find the two French generals together, an thus to have an opportunity of overwhelming them both at one blow. Their design was to render them selves masters of the route to Châlons, occupy Vitry, force Dillon at the Islettes, thus surround Sainte-Menehould on all sides, and oblige the two armies tc lay down their arms.

At daylight on the 20th, Kellermann, who, instead of occupying the heights of Gisaucourt, had fixed himself in the centre of the basin on the hill of Valmy, saw himself commanded in front by the heights of La Lune, occupied by the enemy. On one side, h had L'Hyron, which the French held in possession, but might easily be dislodged, and on the other, Gisaucourt, which he had omitted to seize, and where the Prussians were proceeding to establish themselves. In case of a defeat, he would be forced into the marshes of the Auve, stretching behind the eminence of Valmy, and might be overpowered before he could join Dumouriez in the hollow of that amphitheatre. He accordingly sent to his colleague, desiring him to join him. But the King of Prussia, perceiving a great stir in the French army, and concluding that the design of the generals was to retire upon Châlons, instantly resolved to block up the way, and ordered an attack. The Prussian advanced guard encountered Kellermann's advanced guard on the Châlons road, the general himself being with his main body on the height of Valmy. A warm engagement took place, and the French, at first repulsed, were rallied, and afterwards supported by the carbineers of General Valence. From the heights of La Lune a cannonade opened on the hill of Valmy, and the French artillery briskly responded to the Prussian.

The position of Kellermann, however, was highly dangerous. His troops were all heaped confusedly on the eminence of Valmy, and too much exposed to combat with effect. From the heights of La Lune a cannonade played upon him; from those of Gisaucourt a fire established by the Prussians incommoded his left; L'Hyron, which flanked his right, was certainly occupied by the French, but Clairfayt might readily attack that post with his 25,000 Austrians, and inevitably gain possession of it; and then Kellermann, battered from all quarters, might be driven from Valmy into the Auve, without Dumouriez being able to assist him. The latter hastened to dispatch General Stengel with a strong division to support the French on L'Hyron, and secure the right of Valmy; he ordered Beurnonville to aid Stengel with sixteen battalions; and he sent Chasot, with nine battalions and eight squadrons, by the Châlons road, to occupy Gisaucourt and flank Kellermann's left. But Chasot, when he came near Valmy, sought orders from Kellermann instead of advancing upon Gisaucourt, and thus gave the Prussians time to occupy it, and establish a murderous fire from its elevation. However, supported on the right and left, Kellermann was able to maintain himself on the hill of Valmy. Unfortunately, a howitzer falling on an ammunition-waggon, blew it up, and put the infantry into disorder; the firing from La Lune increased it, and the first line already began to give way. Kellermann, perceiving this recoil, flew into the ranks, rallied them, and restored order. At this moment, Brunswick conceived the time arrived for scaling the eminence, and driving off the French at the point of the bayonet.

It was now noon. A thick mist, which, up to this moment, had covered the two armies, cleared away, and they had a distinct view of each other—the young French soldiers beholding the Prussians advancing upon them in three columns, with the firm assurance of veteran and disciplined troops. This was the first time they had been on a field of battle with a hundred thousand combatants, or on the point of crossing bayonets. As yet they knew neither themselves nor the enemy, and they looked round upon each other with anxiety and doubt. Kellermann jumped upon the intrenchments, disposed his troops in columns, with a battalion to face, and ordered them, when the Prussians were within a certain distance, not to wait for them, but meet and charge them with the bayonet. Then he raised his voice and cried: "The nation for ever!" The moment was decisive either for bravery or cowardice. The cry of "The nation for ever!" inspirits valour alone; and the young soldiers of France, with their enthusiasm quickened, marched forward, repeating the cry of "The nation for ever!" At this spectacle, Brunswick, who instituted the attack with reluctance, and with considerable doubts as to the result, hesitated, stopped his columns, and finally ordered them into the camp.

This trial was decisive. Thenceforth a higher estimate was formed of those cobblers and tailors who composed the French army, according to the scornful emigrants. These had beheld men equipped, arrayed, and valorous; they had seen officers wearing older decorations and full of experience—General Duval, whose upright form and blanched hairs commanded respect; in a word, Kellermann and Dumouriez, displaying admirable constancy and talent in presence of an enemy much superior in number. At this instant, the French revolution was appreciated, and its chaos, hitherto the subject of derision, henceforth appeared more truly as a terrible outburst of national energy.

At four o'clock, Brunswick attempted a fresh attack. The confident aspect of the French again disconcerted him, and he drew back his columns a second time. Having encountered on his march a series of disappointments, ever finding things most falsely represented to him, the Prussian general made his advances with the greatest circumspection; and although he has been censured for not having pushed the attack with more spirit, and dislodged Kellermann, very excellent judges consider that he acted rightly. Kellermann, supported on the right and left by the whole French army, was not a powerless antagonist; and if Brunswick, entangled in a gorge and a detestable ground, had been once repulsed, the chances were in favour of his utter destruction. Besides, he had occupied, as the result of the day, the route to Châlons; and the French being consequently cut off from their depôt, he anticipated compelling them to quit their position within a few days. He did not consider that, being masters of Vitry, they had only to make a longer circuit and suffer a little extra delay in obtaining their convoys.

Such was the celebrated day of the 20th September 1792, on which more than twenty thousand cannon-balls were fired, and since called THE CANNONADE OF VALMY. The loss was equal on both sides, amounting in each army to eight or nine hundred men. But cheerfulness and confidence reigned in the French camp, discontent and recrimination in the Prussian. It is stated, on good authority, that the King of Prussia directed some severe remonstrances to the emigrants that very evening, and henceforth the influence of Calonne was judged on the wane—he who of all the emigrant ministers was the most presumptuous, the most profuse in exaggerated promises, and the most ready with tidings belied by the result.

During the same night, Kellermann silently repassed the Auve, and proceeded to encamp on the heights of Gisaucourt, which he ought to have occupied at first, and from which omission the Prussians had profited materially in the battle. The latter remained on the heights of La Lune. In the opposite background was Dumouriez, and on his left Kellermann, on the heights he had just seized. In this singular position, the French, looking towards France, seemed the invading force, and the Prussians, leaning upon her, seemed drawn up to defend her from aggression. At this period, Dumouriez commenced a fresh series of firm and energetic measures, both against the enemy and against his own officers and the executive authority. With nearly 70,000 troops, intrenched in a good encampment, and with no, or a very rare, deficiency of provisions, he could temporise with eminent composure. The Prussians, on the contrary, were at a loss for subsistence; diseases began to prevail in their army, and in such a situation inactivity was disastrous to them. An inclement season, besides, acting on a swampy and humid soil, rendered it impossible for them to remain any length of time. And then, should they thus late resume the promptitude and vigour befitting an invasion, and march upon Paris, Dumouriez was in force to follow, and close upon them when engaged in front.

Such deductions were consistent with reason and prudence. But in the camp, where the officers were growing weary of privations, and where Kellermann was dissatisfied with subjection to a superior authority; at Paris, where they felt themselves separated from the principal army, and could perceive no obstacle between them and the Prussians—where, in fact, they saw the Hulans approach within fifteen leagues, since the forest of Argonne was laid open—the views of Dumouriez excited disapprobation. The assembly and the council inveighed against his obstinacy, and wrote him the most imperative letters to abandon his position and repass the Marne. The camp at Montmartre, and an army between Châlons and Paris, were the double ramparts essential in the estimation of affrighted citizens. "The hulans pester you," wrote Dumouriez: "well! kill them; the affair does not concern me. I will not change my plan for skirmishers." Entreaties and commands, however, did not the less continue to pour in upon him. In the camp, the officers were free and pertinacious in their remarks. The soldiers alone, cheered by the gaiety of the general, who was unremitting in going through their ranks, in encouraging them, and in explaining to them the critical position of the Prussians, patiently endured the rain and the privations to which they were exposed. On one occasion, Kellermann resolved to leave, and Dumouriez was compelled, like Columbus stipulating for a few days more from his crew, to promise he would decamp, if within a certain number of days the Prussians did not beat a retreat.

The fine army of the allies was truly in a very deplorable condition; it was perishing by famine, and still more by the afflicting consequences of dysentery. The dispositions of Dumouriez had powerfully contributed to produce this dismal emergency. The sharpshooting in front of the camp being deemed useless, because it conduced to no result, it was agreed between the two armies to suspend it; but Dumouriez stipulated that the intermission should be confined to the front alone. Accordingly, he detached all his cavalry, especially that of the new levy, into the surrounding country, in order to intercept the convoys of the enemy, who, having arrived by the defile of Grand-Pré, and ascended the course of the Aisne in pursuit of the French retreat, was obliged to bring his stores by the same tedious circuit. The French troopers grew enamoured of so lucrative a warfare, and prosecuted it with signal success. In this position of affairs, September drew to a close; the evil became intolerable in the Prussian army, and officers were sent to the French camp to hold a parley. At first an exchange of prisoners was the only question mooted: the Prussians demanded the benefit of the exchange for the emigrants, but it was refused them. A refined politeness marked the intercourse on both sides. From the topic of exchanging prisoners, conversation proceeded to the motives of the war; and, on the part of the Prussians, it was almost avowed that the war had been impolitic. The character of Dumouriez here appeared in full relief. Relieved from the cares of fighting, he composed memorials for the King of Prussia, and demonstrated to him how little he could gain by uniting with the house of Austria against France. At the same time he sent him twelve pounds of coffee, the last that remained in both camps. His memorials, which could not fail to be appreciated, were nevertheless ungraciously received, and could scarcely be otherwise. Brunswick replied, in the name of the King of Prussia, by a declaration as arrogant as his first manifesto, and all negotiation was broken off. The assembly, when consulted by Dumouriez, returned the answer of the Roman senate, that it would not treat with the enemy until he had removed from the soil of France.

These negotiations were attended with no other effect than affording ground of calumny against the general, who was thenceforth suspected of holding secret relations with the enemy; and drawing upon him the affected disdain of a haughty monarch, soured by the result of the war. But such was Dumouriez; possessing all the attributes of courage and mind in their highest developments, he was deficient in that reserve and dignity which awes men, whilst genius does but excite their admiration. Be that as it may, it came to pass as the French general had foreseen; for, on the 1st October, the Prussians, unable to bear up any longer against the combined evils of hunger and disease, began to decamp. It was a grand subject of amazement, conjecture, and fabulous narration for all Europe, to behold so puissant and much-vaunted an army retreating in humiliation before those patriotic artisans and shopkeepers, who were to have been driven back into their towns by beat of drum, and chastised for having left them. The feebleness with which the Prussians were pursued, and the impunity seemingly accorded them as they repassed the defiles of the Argonne, gave rise to the supposition of secret stipulations, and even of a bargain with the King of Prussia. The military considerations will account, better than all such vague allegations, for the retreat of the allies.

To remain in so disastrous a position was no longer possible. To invade had become altogether inopportune in a season so far advanced and so inclement. The only resource, therefore, was to retire into Luxumbourg and Lorraine, and there form a strong basis of operations, with a view to recommence the campaign the following year. Besides, there are grounds for believing that at this moment Frederick William was revolving in his mind the assumption of his part of Poland; for, after having stimulated the Poles against Russia and Austria, that prince now evinced a readiness to share in their spoliation. Thus the state of the season and of the localities; disgust at an abortive enterprise; regret at having allied himself against France with the house of Austria; and, lastly, new interests in the north, were with his majesty of Prussia motives amply sufficient to determine his retreat. It was effected in perfect order, for the enemy, who consented to depart, was not a whit the less formidable on that account. To attempt blocking up his retreat and compelling him to open a passage by a victory, was an imprudence Dumouriez would not commit. It was incumbent on him to be contented with harassing it; and this he did with too little activity; in which negligence both he and Kellermann were to blame.

The danger being past, and the campaign finished, each reverted to himself and his own projects. Dumouriez thought of his enterprise into the Low Countries, Kellermann of his command at Metz; and the pursuit of the Prussians failed to obtain from the two generals the attention it required. Dumouriez dispatched General d'Harville to the Chêne-Populeux to fall upon the emigrants, and ordered General Miaczinski to wait for them at Stenay, at the outlet of the pass, to complete their destruction; he sent Chasot in the same direction, to occupy the road to Longwy; stationed the generals Beurnonville, Stengel, and Valence, with upwards of twenty-five thousand men, on the rear of the grand army, with orders to pursue it with vigour; and at the same time forwarded an injunction to Dillon, who had throughout maintained himself at the Islettes with perfect success, to advance upon Clermont and Varennes, in order to cut off the route to Verdun. These dispositions were doubtless good, but they ought to have been executed by the general himself; he ought, according to the very just and intelligent opinion of M. Jomini, to have pushed directly upon the Rhine, and afterwards descended it with all his army. In that moment of success, overthrowing all before him, he would have conquered Belgium in a single march. But he resolved upon going to Paris, with the view of arranging an invasion by Lille. On their part, too, the three generals, Beurnonville, Stengel, and Valence, did not act in concert sufficiently, and but feebly pursued the Prussians. Valence, who served under Kellermann, suddenly received an order to join his general at Châlons, in order to resume the route to Metz. It must be allowed that this movement was strangely imagined, since it conducted Kellermann into the interior, to turn afterwards into the route to the Lorraine frontier. The rational course was in front, by Vitry or Clermont, and that coincided with the pursuit of the Prussians in the manner directed by Dumouriez. The instant the latter heard of the order given to Valence, he laid fresh injunctions upon that officer to pursue his march, stating that so long as the junction of the armies of the north and centre continued, the supreme command belonged to him alone. He remonstrated very warmly with Kellermann, who ultimately recalled his previous determination, and consented to take his course by Sainte-Menehould and Clermont. However, the pursuit was conducted with the same faintness as before. Dillon alone harassed the Prussians with impetuous ardour, and narrowly escaped severe treatment, by darting too rashly on their track.

The want of concord amongst the generals, and their personal estrangements after the danger, were evidently the sole causes of so easy a retreat being granted to the Prussians. It has been asserted that their departure was purchased, and the price defrayed by the produce of a theft, to which we shall subsequently refer; that it was arranged with Dumouriez, one of the stipulations in the bargain being the free passage of the Prussians; and, lastly, that Louis XVI. had solicited it from the recesses of his prison. We have just seen that this retreat may be sufficiently accounted for by natural causes; but several other reasons demonstrate the absurdity of such suppositions. Thus, it is not credible that a monarch, whose failing was not that of a vile cupidity, should allow himself to be bought; we cannot see why, if there were a convention, Dumouriez should not have justified himself in the eyes of military men for not having pursued the enemy, by avowing a treaty which had nothing discreditable in it, so far as he was concerned; lastly, the king's valet-de-chambre, Cléry, assures us that nothing similar to the pretended letter addressed by Louis XVI. to Frederick William, and transmitted by the attorney of the commune, Manuel, was ever written, or given to that personage. The whole relation, therefore, is but a tissue of falsehood; and the retreat of the allies was simply the natural consequence of the campaign. Dumouriez, in spite of his faults, of his oversight at Grand-Pré, and of his negligence with regard to the retreat, was nevertheless the preserver of France, and of a revolution which has probably advanced Europe by several centuries. It was he who, taking the command of an army disorganised, distrustful, and discontented; restoring to it unity and confidence; establishing along the whole of that frontier a concentrated and vigorous action; never yielding to despair amidst the most disastrous circumstances; displaying, after the loss of the defiles, an almost unexampled instance of undaunted coolness; persisting in his original system of temporising, in spite of all perils—in spite of his army and of his government—with a firmness which proves the vigour of his judgment and his character;—it was he, we assert, who saved France from the stranger and counter-revolutionary wrath, and offered the imposing spectacle of a man saving his fellow-citizens in spite of themselves. No conquest, howsoever vast it might be, could be more glorious, or produce, in its moral results, a more decisive influence.

CHAPTER XIV.

MASSACRES AT VERSAILLES.—OPENING OF THE NATIONAL CONVENTION, 20TH SEPTEMBER 1792.—ESTABLISHMENT OF THE REPUBLIC.

WHILST the French armies were engaged in repelling the march of the allies, Paris was in a continual state of disorder and confusion. We have already witnessed the encroachments of the commune, the prolonged abominations of September, the impotency of the authorities, and the inertness of the public force during those disastrous days; we have also seen with what cool audacity the committee of surveillance avowed the massacres, and recommended an imitation of them to the other communes of France. However, the commissioners accredited by the commune had been every where repudiated, for France did not partake the furious spirit which a sense of danger had aroused in the capital. But in the vicinity of Paris, even all the murders of which we have read do not close the list. There had been formed in that city a troop of assassins, whom the massacres of September had familiarised with blood, and who longed to shed more. Some hundreds of persons had previously departed from Paris, bent upon the project of dragging from the prisons of Orleans those under impeachment for high-treason. Those unfortunate captives, by a final decree of the assembly, were appointed to be conveyed to Saumur. Nevertheless, their destination was altered on the route, and they were escorted in the direction of Paris. On the 9th September, it was reported that they were to arrive at Versailles on the 10th. Consequent upon those tidings, either from fresh orders being issued to the gang of murderers, or from the mere mention of such an arrival sufficing to awaken their bloodthirsty mania, they flocked to Versailles from the 9th to the 10th. A dull rumour immediately pervaded that town that fresh massacres were about to be committed. The mayor of Versailles took every precaution to prevent additional disasters. The president of the criminal tribunal hastened to Paris, in order to apprise the minister Danton of the dangers that threatened the prisoners; but he obtained one invariable answer to all his applications: "Those men are highly criminal!" "Possibly," retorted the president Alquier; "but the law alone ought to inflict punishment upon them." "What! do you not see," cried Danton, in a terrible voice, "that I would have answered you in another manner if I could? What have you to do with those prisoners? Go back to your business, and take no farther heed concerning them!" Alquier obeyed, in trepidation.

The next day the prisoners arrived at Versailles. A horde of unknown ruffians rushed upon the vehicles, surrounded and separated them from the escort, knocked the commander Fournier from horseback, carried off the mayor, who announced a generous resolution to die at his post, and massacred the unfortunate prisoners, to the number of fifty-two. Amongst them perished Delessart and D'Abancourt, placed under impeachment as ministers, and Brissac, as commander of the constitutional guard, disbanded under the Legislative Assembly. Immediately after this execution, the assassins flew to the prisons of the town, and renewed the scenes of the first days of September, employing the same means, and parodying, as at Paris, the judicial forms. This event, occurring after an interval of five days from the former, carried the universal terror to its height. At Paris, the committee of surveillance, however, halted not an instant in its action; when the prisons were emptied by death, it began again to fill them by issuing fresh warrants of arrest. These warrants were so numerous, that the minister of the interior, Roland, denouncing to the assembly these new acts of arbitrary injustice, was enabled to lay between five and six hundred of them on the table, some signed by a single person, others by two or three at most, the major part void of motive, and a great proportion founded on the mere suspicion of incivism.

Whilst the commune was making its power felt at Paris, it sent commissioners into the departments to justify its conduct, exhort them to follow its example, recommend to the electors deputies of its nomination, and depreciate those who opposed it in the Legislative Assembly. It subsequently secured immense funds by seizing the money found with the treasurer of the civil list, Septeuil; by appropriating the plate in the churches, and the rich moveables of the emigrants; and, lastly, by obtaining from the exchequer several considerable sums, under the pretext of supporting the assistance-fund, and completing the works of the camp. All the effects of the unhappy persons massacred in the prisons of Paris and on the route to Versailles, had been sequestered, and deposited in the spacious halls of the committee of surveillance. The commune constantly refused to produce either the objects themselves or their value, and even to give any answer upon the subject to the minister of the interior or to the directory of the department, which, as has been previously mentioned, had been converted into a mere commission of finance. It went yet farther, and proceeded to sell, by its own authority, the furniture in large mansions, upon which seals had been affixed since the departure of the proprietors. It was in vain that the superior administration issued prohibitions; the entire body of subordinates, upon whom the execution of those orders was imposed, either belonged to the municipality, or had no means of vindicating their authority. The orders consequently met with no attention.

The national guard, reconstructed under the influence of the armed sections, and filled with men of all grades, was in complete disorganisation. Sometimes it was accessory to mischief, sometimes it simply allowed its perpetration from carelessness. Many of the posts were altogether abandoned, because the men on guard, not being relieved even after forty-eight hours' watch, retired exhausted with fatigue and wrath. All the peaceable citizens had quitted the corps, formerly so regular and useful; and Santerre, who now commanded it, was of too feeble and uncultivated a character to re-organise it.

The tranquillity of Paris was therefore abandoned to hazard; and on one hand the commune, on the other the populace, had the field open for any enterprise. Amongst the spoils of royalty, the most precious, and consequently the most coveted, were those contained in the Garde-Meuble, the rich deposit of all the effects which formerly lent a splendour to the throne. Since the 10th August, this collection had aroused the cupidity of the multitude, and more than one significant symptom had excited the vigilance of the inspector of the establishment. He had made requisition upon requisition to obtain a sufficient guard; but from the prevalent confusion, or from the difficulty of filling all the posts, or, in short, from studied indifference, he was not furnished with the force he demanded. During the night of the 16th September, the Garde-Meuble was robbed, and the greatest part of its contents passed into unknown hands, which the authorities subsequently made fruitless efforts to discover.* This fresh outrage was attributed to the men who had secretly directed the massacres. But in this instance they could be instigated by neither fanaticism nor a sanguinary policy; and, supposing them actuated by rapacity, they had in the vaults of the commune wherewithal to satisfy such a passion to the fullest extent. It has been said, indeed, that this spoliation was effected in order to buy the retreat of the King of Prussia, which is absurd, and to supply the expenses of the party, which is more probable, but rests upon no proof. At the same time, the robbery of the Garde-Meuble ought to have but little influence on the judgment to be formed of the commune and its leaders. It is unquestionably true, however, that the commune, as the depositary of vast wealth, never rendered any account of it; that the seals upon the chests were broken, without the locks being forced, which indicates an abstraction and not a popular pillage; and that so large a collection of precious moveables disappeared for ever. A portion was audaciously stolen by certain subordinates, such as Sergent, surnamed the Agate, on account of a rich jewel with which he decked himself; and another portion served to defray the charges of the extraordinary government instituted by the commune. It was a war waged against the old society; and every war is sullied by murder and pillage.

Such was the situation of Paris whilst the elections were proceeding for the National Convention. It was from that new assembly honest citizens anticipated the force and energy necessary to restore order; they hoped the forty days of confusion and crime, elapsed since the 10th August, would be but an accident of the revolution—a deplorable accident assuredly, but transitory. The deputies themselves, sitting with such impotence in the Legislative Assembly, prorogued their energy to the meeting of that convention, which was the common hope of all parties.

All France was the scene of agitation directed to influence the elections. The clubs exercised great sway in that respect. The Jacobins of Paris had printed and distributed a list of all the votes recorded during the legislative session, to serve as references for the electors. The deputies who had voted against the laws proposed by the popular party, and especially those who had absolved Lafayette, had particular attention drawn to them. Nevertheless, in the provinces, where the dissensions of the capital had not yet penetrated, the Girondists, even the most odious to the agitators of Paris, were chosen on account of their acknowledged talents. Almost all the members of the late assembly were re-elected. A great many ex-constituents, whom the self-denying ordinance had excluded from the legislative body, were nominated to form part of the convention. In the number were Buzot and Pétion. Amongst the new members naturally appeared the men who had distinguished themselves in their departments by their energy and ardour; or authors, who, like Louvet, had gained renown by their talents both in the capital and the provinces.

At Paris, the violent faction which had domineered since the 10th August completely controlled the elections, and carried all the men of its party. Robespierre and Danton were the first named. The Jacobins and the council of the commune hailed this result with acclamations. After them were chosen Camille-Desmoulins, famous by his writings; David, by his pictures; Fabre-d'Eglantine, by his dramatic productions and hearty participation in the revolutionary troubles; Legendre, Panis, Sergent, and Billaud-Varennes, by their services at the commune. To them were added the procurator-syndic Manuel; Robespierre the younger, brother of the celebrated Maximilian; Collot-d'Herbois, an ex-comedian; and the Duke of Orleans, who had abdicated his titles, and called himself Philip-Egalité. After all these names, great astonishment was manifested at the election of the aged Dusaulx, one of the electors of 1789, who had so often opposed the furious outbursts of the populace, and so often shed tears over its excesses, and who was named as a last memento of '89, and as an honest inoffensive man, distasteful to no party. To this strange collection was only wanting the cynical and sanguinary Marat.

That singular man had, from the surpassing audacity of his writings, something of the astounding, even in the eyes of those who had witnessed the days of September. The capuchin Chabot, who exercised great influence at the Jacobins' by his vehemence, and there obtained the triumphs which were denied him in the Legislative Assembly, was obliged to pronounce an apologetic harangue for Marat; and, as it was amongst the Jacobins that every thing was arranged beforehand, his election, being sanctioned by them, was soon completed in the electoral assembly. Marat, Fréron, likewise a journalist, and some obscure individuals, completed that famous deputation, which, including a few traders, a butcher, a comedian, an engraver, a painter, an advocate, three or four writers, and a despoiled prince, adequately represented the confusion and the variety of existences in conflict within the immense capital of France.

The deputies arrived successively at Paris, and in proportion as their number swelled, and the events which had produced so universal a terror grew distant, they began to take courage and deprecate the disorders of the capital. The fear of the enemy was diminished by the firm position of Dumouriez in the Argonne the hatred for aristocrats was changed into pity, since the horrible slaughter that had been made of them in Paris and Versailles. Those crimes, which had found so many delirious applauders or timid censors, had become more hideous by the robbery recently added to murder, and excited general reprobation. The Girondists, indignant at such atrocities, and exasperated at the personal oppression they had endured during a whole month, became more firm and energetic. Resplendent for talent and courage in the eyes of France, invoking justice and humanity, public opinion could scarcely fail to be with them; and already they openly threatened their adversaries with its visitation.

At the same time, if the Girondists were all equally decisive against the excesses of Paris, they did not all experience and excite those personal resentments which envenom party strife. Brissot, for example, by pertinaciously contesting the palm of eloquence at the Jacobin Club with Robespierre, had inspired him with profound hatred. Possessed of great information and talent, Brissot produced considerable effect; but he had neither the personal consideration nor sufficient tact to be the leader of a party; and the hatred of Robespierre unduly exalted him, by imputing that character to him. When, on the eve of the insurrection, the Girondists wrote a letter to Bose, the king's painter, rumours of a treaty with the court were spread abroad, and Brissot was charged with a design to escape to London, with a vast booty. There was no truth in such allegations; but Marat, to whom the most insignificant reports, and even those, indeed, distinctly disproved, were sufficient for grounding accusations, did not the less issue a warrant of arrest against Brissot, during the general incarceration of the pretended conspirators of the 10th August. A great sensation had followed this step, and the warrant of arrest was not executed. But the Jacobins adhered to the assertion that Brissot was sold to Brunswick; Robespierre repeated it and believed it, so readily did his distorted mind conclude those guilty whom he hated. Louvet had inspired him with equal abhorrence, by seconding Brissot at the Jacobins' and in the journal La Sentinelle. Louvet, replete with talent and boldness, made direct attacks on men. His virulent personalities, continued from day to day in the pages of his journal, had made him the most feared and the most detested enemy of the Robespierre faction.

The minister Roland had displeased the whole Jacobin and municipal party by his courageous letter of the 3d September, and by his steadfast resistance to the encroachments of the commune; but having no rivalry with any individual, he excited only a certain anger of opinion. He had personally offended Danton alone, by opposing him in the council, which was not attended with much danger, for of all men there was none whose resentment was less to be feared than Danton's. But in the person of Roland it was principally his wife who was detested; a woman proud, severe, courageous, and intellectual, gathering around her those enlightened and brilliant Girondists, animating them by her looks, rewarding them with her esteem, and preserving in her circle, amidst a republican simplicity, a politeness odious to obscure and uncultivated men. These already endeavoured to circulate vulgar ridicule against Roland. His wife, they said, governed for him, directed his friends, and recompensed them even by her favours. In his ignoble language, Marat called her the Circe of the party.

Guadet, Vergniaud, and Gensonné, though they had gained great lustre in the Legislative Assembly, and had set themselves in opposition to the Jacobins, had not yet aroused all that venom they excited at a later date. Guadet had even gratified the energetic republicans by his attacks against Lafayette and the court. Prompt to show himself in the van, Guadet could pass at pleasure from the highest excitement to the most perfect coolness; and thus master of himself in the tribune, he shone there by the pertinence and vigour of his remarks. Thus, he naturally liked an exercise in which he excelled, used it perhaps too freely, and took more pleasure than was prudent in triumphing by words over a party which was speedily to retort upon him by death.

Vergniaud had not succeeded so well as Gaudet with the violent spirits of the time, because he never showed so much ardour against the court; but he had been less exposed, likewise, to wound them, because, in his carelessness and supineness, he offended persons less than his friend Guadet. Passions had little effect in rousing this speaker; permitting him to slumber amidst the storms of party, and not driving him in the face of men, their hatred was greatly blunted against him. Still he was not indifferent. He possessed a noble heart, a fine and lucid intellect; and the dormant fire of his soul, blazing up at intervals, warmed and roused him to sublime energy. He had not the vivacity in repartee of Guadet, but he grew animated in the tribune, discoursed with a copious eloquence, and, such was his extraordinary ductibility of organ, that he poured out his thoughts with a facility and fecundity of expression such as no man hath ever surpassed. The elocution of Mirabeau was, like his character, unequal and powerful; that of Vergniaud, always elegant and dignified, became at times grand and energetic. But all the exhortations of Roland's consort did not always succeed in rousing this champion, often disgusted with mankind, often opposed to the indiscreet courses of his friends, and, above all, not very confident in the efficacy of words against force.

Gensonné, a man of sense and probity, but gifted with only a moderate fluency of speech, and mainly adapted for drawing up reports, had not yet made a figure in the tribune. However, strong passions and an obstinate temper sufficed to procure for him considerable influence with his friends, and amongst his enemies the hatred which attaches to character much more than talent.

Condorcet, formerly a marquis, and always a philosopher, lofty and unbiassed in his speculations, discerning clearly the faults of his party, and little fitted for the terrible agitations of democracy, rarely put himself in the foreground, and had as yet no immediate enemy on his own account, reserving himself principally for those various labours which required deep meditation. Buzot, endowed with intelligence, and elevation of mind and courage, uniting with the graces of person a firm and simple eloquence, bespoke attention by all the dignity of address, and exercised high moral ascendancy around him.

Barbaroux, elected by his fellow-citizens, had just arrived from the south with one of his friends, a deputy like himself to the National Convention. This friend was called Rebecqui. He was a man of indifferent culture, but bold, enterprising, and wholly devoted to Barbaroux. It will be remembered that the latter idolised Roland and Pétion; that he regarded Marat as an atrocious madman, and Robespierre as actuated by ambition, especially since Panis had designated him as the indispensable dictator. Loathing the crimes committed during his absence, he readily imputed them to men whom he already detested; and he expressed himself on his arrival with an energy that precluded the possibility of reconciliation. Inferior to his friends in mental accomplishments, but possessing a fair proportion of intelligence and readiness, handsome and chivalric withal, he freely scattered menaces, and in a few days earned for himself a hatred equal to that which attended many, who, during the whole legislative session, had never ceased their assaults on opinions and persons.

The individual around whom the entire party rallied, and who enjoyed universal consideration, was Pétion. Mayor during the Legislative Assembly, he had, by his contest with the court, acquired a boundless popularity. True, he had on the 9th August recommended a debate in preference to a combat; since then he had declared against the September deeds, and withdrawn from the commune, as Bailly in 1790; but his opposition had been quiet and silent, and, without yet actually embroiling him with the faction, had rendered him formidable to it. With a well-stored mind, calm in temper, rarely speaking, never attempting a rivalry of display with any one, he exercised over all, and over Robespierre himself, the ascendancy of a cool, dispassionate, and universally revered sense. Although reputed a Girondist, all parties sought his suffrage, all stood in awe of him, and, in the new assembly, he had with him not only the right side, but the whole intermediate body, and several even of the left side.

Here then was the situation of the Girondists in front of the Parisian faction: they had for them the general opinion, which reprobated the excesses; they had won to themselves a great number of the deputies who were daily entering Paris; they had all the ministers, except Danton, who often ruled the council, but never made use of his power against them; finally, they exhibited at their head the Mayor of Paris, the most respected man of the moment. But at Paris they were not amongst friends, but found themselves in the very centre of their foes; and they had to dread the violence of the inferior classes which surged beneath them, and, moreover, the violence portended by the future, fanned by revolutionary passions.

The first accusation levelled against them was a design to sacrifice Paris. They had formerly been charged with intending to take refuge in the departments, and beyond the Loire. The wrongs of Paris, as regarded them, being aggravated since the 2d and 3d September, the imputation of a wish to abandon that city was fixed with the greater pertinacity, and it was confidently asserted that they had attempted to assemble the convention elsewhere. By degrees, these suspicions settling down, took a more regular form. They were reproached with desiring to break the national unity, and compose of the eighty-three departments so many separate states, all equal amongst themselves, and connected by a simple federative bond. By this scheme, it was added, they contemplated the destruction of the Parisian predominance, and the possession of a personal sway in their respective departments. It was thus the calumny of federalism originated. It is true, that when France was threatened by the invasion of the Prussians, they had thought of intrenching themselves, at the last extremity, in the southern departments; it is also true, that, beholding the excesses and the tyranny of Paris, they had sometimes rested their hopes on the departments; but between such speculations and a scheme for a federal system there was a considerable interval. And yet, all the difference between a federal government and a single central government consisting in the greater or less degree of influence in the local institutions, the criminality of such an idea, if it existed at all, was singularly vague. The Girondists, in fact, perceiving nothing very culpable in it, took no pains to repudiate it; and many amongst them, irritated at the absurdity manifested in decrying such a system, asked if North America, Holland, and Switzerland, were not, after all, free and happy under a federal government; and if it would be any signal error or high crime to confer a similar boon on France. Buzot, especially, often upheld such opinions, and Brissot, who was an ardent admirer of the Americans, likewise defended them, rather as the result of a philosophic deduction, than as embracing a project applicable to France. Such conversations being divulged, gave greater weight to the calumny of federalism. At the Jacobin Club, the question of federalism was gravely discussed, and a thousand outrageous invectives were launched against the Girondists. The clamour arose that they designed to crush the nucleus of the revolutionary power; to wrest from it that unity which constituted its strength; and that this fell scheme was hatched to render themselves kings in their provinces.

The Girondists retorted on their side by invectives somewhat more substantial, but which unfortunately were likewise exaggerated, and consequently lost in force what they lacked in truth. They reproached the commune with having rendered itself supreme; with having by its usurpations encroached on the national sovereignty, and arrogated to itself an authority which belonged only to France in the aggregate. They charged upon it a design to domineer over the convention as it had before oppressed the Legislative Assembly; they said that in sitting beside it, the national delegates were not in security, since they would sit amongst the assassins of September. They accused it of having dishonoured the revolution during the forty days which followed the 10th August, and of having stocked the deputation of Paris with men notorious for their participation in those infernal scenes. Thus far they were within the bounds of truth. But they added reproaches as vague as those of federalism directed against themselves. They loudly accused Marat, Danton, and Robespierre of aspiring to supreme power—Marat, because he daily published that a dictator was needed to purge society of the impure members who corrupted it; Robespierre, because he had dogmatised at the commune and spoken with insolence to the assembly, and because, on the eve of the 10th August, Panis had proposed him to Barbaroux for dictator; lastly, Danton, because he wielded over the ministry, over the people, wheresoever he appeared, indeed, the influence of a mighty being. They called them triumvirs; and yet there was no union amongst them. Marat was but a systematic maniac; Robespierre as yet merely a jealous struggler, who had not sufficient elevation of mind to be ambitious; Danton a man of active mind, ardent and zealous for the goal of the Revolution, and extending his interference to all things, more from restless energy than from ambition. But amongst these three men there was as yet no usurper, nor did any two of them conspire in concert; and it was imprudent in the Girondists to give their adversaries, already more powerful than they, the advantage of being unjustly accused. At the same time, they were less acrimonious against Danton, because there was no personal animosity between him and them, and they held Marat in too great contempt to accuse him directly; but they railed unmercifully against Robespierre, because the renown of what was called his virtue and his eloquence irritated them to a greater extent; they bore towards him the resentment felt by genuine superiority against a vain and inflated mediocrity.

Attempts, nevertheless, were made to arrive at an understanding before the opening of the National Convention, and divers meetings held, in which frank explanations on both sides were proposed and recommended as a means for terminating baneful disputes. Danton was cordially disposed to such a course,* because he was not restrained by a morbid pride, and had the success of the revolution, above all things, at heart. Pétion evinced infinite coolness and sound sense; but Robespierre was sulky, like one personally wronged; the Girondists were haughty and stern, as men innocent and indignant, who deemed certain vengeance in their power. Barbaroux said there was no alliance possible between crime and virtue; and on both sides they retired more distant from a reconciliation than before they met. All the Jacobins rallied around Robespierre; the Girondists, and the prudent and moderate mass, around Pétion. The opinion of the latter, and of all sensible men, was in favour of dropping accusations, since it was impossible to apprehend the authors of the September massacres and the robbery of the Garde-Meuble; of ceasing to speak of triumvirs, since their ambition was neither sufficiently proved nor sufficiently manifest to support a prosecution; of despising a score of worthless characters introduced into the assembly by the elections of Paris; and, in short, of proceeding with all dispatch to fulfil the objects of the convention, by forming a constitution and deciding the fate of Louis XVI. Such was the counsel of dispassionate men; but others, less calm, indulged as usual in projects which, being as yet incapable of execution, had the demerit of warning and exasperating their adversaries. They proposed to cashier the municipality, remove the convention in emergency, transfer its sittings from Paris, constitute it as a court of justice for the trial without appeal of all conspirators, and finally raise for its protection a peculiar guard, selected from the eighty-three departments. These projects had no result, and served only to irritate the passions. The Girondists relied upon the public feeling, which, as they imagined, would kindle into indignation at the accents of their eloquence and the recital of the crimes they were prepared to denounce. They would meet, therefore, at the tribune of the convention, said they, and crush their foes.

At length, on the 20th September, the deputies to the convention met together at the Tuileries, to constitute the new assembly. Their number being sufficient, they resolved themselves into legal constitution, verified their powers, and immediately proceeded to the nomination of officers. Pétion was almost unanimously proclaimed president. Brissot, Condorcet, Rabaud Saint-Etienne, Lasource, Vergniaud, and Camus, were elected secretaries. These selections prove the influence then possessed by the Girondist party in the assembly.

The Legislative Assembly, which since the 10th August had been sitting permanently, was informed on the 20th, by a deputation, that the National Convention was formed, and the legislature terminated. The two assemblies had merely to resolve the one into the other, and the convention proceeded to occupy the hall of the legislative.

Manuel, procurator-syndic of the commune, who had been suspended after the 20th June with Pétion, and become extremely popular on account of that suspension; who had subsequently taken office with the furious usurpers of the commune, but retreated from them, and drawn towards the Girondists at sight of the massacres in the Abbey—Manuel, so early as the 21st, made a proposition which excited murmurs amongst the enemies of the Gironde. "Citizen-representatives," said he, "it is fitting that every thing here bear a character of dignity and grandeur calculated to awe the universe. I move that the president of France be lodged in the national palace of the Tuileries; that he be preceded by the public force and the symbols of the law; and that the citizens rise at his approach." At these words, the Jacobin Chabot, and Tallien, the secretary of the commune, protested with vehemence against a ceremonial imitated from royalty. Chabot said that the representatives of the people ought to assimilate themselves to the citizens from whose ranks they came—to the sans-culottes, who formed the majority of the nation. Tallien added, that the president of the convention should be sought for in a garret, since it was in such abodes that genius and virtue dwelt. The proposition of Manuel was rejected, and the enemies of the Gironde asserted that it had intended to decree sovereign honours to its chief, Pétion.

After this motion had been disposed of, a multitude of others succeeded, without pause or order. On all sides the wish was expressed to record by authentic declarations the sentiments which animated the assembly and France. Various demands were made, to the effect that the new constitution should be based on absolute equality, the sovereignty of the people decreed, hatred sworn to royalty, to a dictatorship, to a triumvirate, to every individual authority; and the penalty of death pronounced against whomsoever should propose any project with that tendency. Danton put an end to all these motions, by procuring a decree that the new constitution should be valid only after being sanctioned by the people. It was subjoined that the existing laws should provisionally continue to have effect; the authorities, not displaced, be provisionally maintained; and the taxes levied as before, until the new systems of contribution were organised. After these motions and decrees, Manuel, Collot-d'Herbois, and Gregoire, entered upon the question of royalty, and demanded that its abolition should be forthwith pronounced. The people, said they, had just been declared sovereign, but they could not really be so until they were delivered from a rival authority—that of kings. The assembly, all the galleries, rose with one accord to express an unanimous reprobation of royalty. But Bazire wished a solemn discussion upon so momentous a question. "What occasion is there to discuss," exclaimed Gregoire, "when every one is of the same opinion? Courts are the workshops of crime, the furnace of corruption. The history of kings is the martyrology of nations. Since we are all equally impressed with these truths, what need of discussion?"

The debate was in fact closed. A profound silence prevailed, and, according to the unanimous declaration of the assembly, the president pronounced royalty abolished in France. This decree was hailed with universal acclamation; its publication was instantly voted, as likewise its transmission to the armies and all the municipalities.

When the institution of a republic was thus proclaimed, the Prussians still menaced the country. Dumouriez, as we have related, had fixed himself at Sainte-Menehould, and the cannonade of the 21st, so auspicious for the French arms, was not yet known at Paris. The next day, the 22d, Billaud-Varennes proposed to date, no longer from the year 4 of liberty, but from the year 1 of the republic. This proposition was adopted. The year 1789 was no longer considered as the commencement of liberty, and the new republican era opened that very day, the 22d September.

In the evening the cannonade of Valmy was reported, and joy beamed on every countenance. On the petition of the citizens of Orleans, who complained of their magistrates, it was decreed that all the members of administrative bodies and tribunals should be re-elected, and that the conditions of eligibility, as fixed by the constitution of 1791, should be deemed null. It was declared no longer necessary to select the judges from lawyers, nor the administrators from a certain class of proprietors. The Legislative Assembly had already abolished the mark of silver, and conferred upon all citizens at the age of majority the electoral franchise. The convention effaced the last traces of distinction, by calling all the citizens to all, the most diverse, functions. Thus was commenced the system of absolute equality.

* See Durand-Maillanne, Dumouriez, Meilhan, and all the contemporaries.

On the 23d, all the ministers were heard. The deputy Cambon made a report upon the state of the finances. The preceding assemblies had decreed the fabrication of two thousand seven hundred millions of assignats; two thousand five hundred millions had been expended; there remained two hundred millions, of which one hundred and seventy-six were still to manufacture, and the remaining twenty-four were in the exchequer. The taxes were detained by the departments for purchases of grain ordered by the last assembly; and the public exigencies required some new extraordinary resources. The mass of national property augmenting every day by emigration, no fears were entertained from the issue of paper representing it, nor hesitation felt at making the experiment: a fresh creation of assignats was accordingly ordered.

Roland was heard upon the state of France and the capital. Equally severe, but bolder than on the 3d September, he set forth in energetic terms the disorders of Paris, their causes, and the means of preventing them. He recommended the prompt institution of a strong and vigorous government, as the only guarantee of order in free states. His report was favourably heard, and crowned with applause, failing to excite any explosion on the part of those who considered themselves as accused when the troubles of Paris were alluded to.

But scarcely had this first glance been cast over the situation of France, than news arrived of the spread of disorder in certain departments. Roland wrote a letter to the convention, denouncing these new excesses, and demanding their repression. The instant the letter was read, the deputies Kersaint and Buzot sprang to the tribune, to inveigh against the violences of all descriptions in progress of commission. "The assassinations," said they, "are imitated in the departments. It is not anarchy we can charge with them, but tyrants of a new order, who are arising in scarcely emancipated France. It is from Paris that these fatal instigations to crime are daily sent. On all the walls of the capital we read placards stimulating to murder, burning, pillage; and lists of proscription, in which fresh victims are daily pointed out. How are the people to be preserved from wretchedness, if so many citizens are condemned to shroud their existence? How can France hope for a constitution, if the convention which is appointed to frame it deliberates beneath the points of daggers? It is necessary, for the honour of the revolution, to suppress all these excesses, and draw the distinction between the civic gallantry which braved despotism on the 10th August, and the savage cruelty which ministered to a still and hidden tyranny on the 2d and 3d September."

In consequence, the orators demanded the appointment of a committee, charged—

1st, To render an account of the state of the republic, and of Paris in particular.

2d, To present a project of law against instigators to murder and assassination.

3d, To draw up a statement of the means adapted for raising a public force, to be placed at the disposition of the National Convention, and taken from the eighty-three departments.

At this proposition, all the members of the left side, on which were ranged the most violent spirits of the new assembly, uttered tumultuous cries. The evils of France were exaggerated, they said. The hypocritical wailings they had just heard, came from the depths of the dungeons, into which those had been cast who, for the last three years, had been invoking the horrors of civil war upon their country. The disorders complained against were inevitable; the people were in a state of revolution, and they must of necessity adopt energetic measures for their security. At present those critical moments were past, and the declarations already made by the convention would suffice to allay all commotions. Besides, why an extraordinary jurisdiction? The ancient laws existed, and met the case of instigations to murder. Was a new martial law sought to be established?

By a very usual contradiction amongst parties, those who had demanded the extraordinary jurisdiction of the 17th August, those who were soon to demand the revolutionary tribunal, rose indignantly against a law which they denounced as a law of blood! "A law of blood!" exclaimed Kersaint in reply: "why, I desire, on the contrary, to prevent its being shed!" An adjournment was strenuously insisted upon. "To adjourn the suppression of murders," cried Vergniaud, "is to legalise them! The enemies of France are in arms on our frontiers, and you desire that the citizens of France, instead of meeting them in combat, should slay each other like the soldiers of Cadmus!"

At length, the motion of Kersaint and Buzot was adopted without modification. It was resolved that laws should be framed for the punishment of instigators to murder, and for the organisation of a departmental guard.

This debate of the 24th had caused great excitement amongst the members; still, no name had been mentioned, and the accusations remained general. The next day they met with all the resentments evoked by the previous sitting still rankling; on one side they murmured against the decrees that had been passed, and on the other felt regret at not having been sufficiently severe upon the faction they stigmatised as disorganising. Whilst one party was attacking the decrees, and the other defending them, Merlin, formerly a tipstaff and municipal officer at Thionville, and lately a deputy to the legislative body, where he signalised himself amongst the most uncompromising patriots—Merlin, renowned for his ardour and temerity, demanded to be heard.

"The order of the day," said he, "is to elucidate, whether, as Lasource assured me yesterday, there exists in the heart of the National Convention a faction labouring to establish a dictatorship or a triumvirate: either these suspicions should cease, or Lasource be called upon to mark the guilty; and I swear to poniard them in face of the assembly." Lasource, thus emphatically summoned to explain himself, related his conversation with Merlin, and again described, without naming them, those ambitious characters who were striving to raise themselves upon the ruins of prostrated royalty. "They are those who have stimulated murder and robbery; who have issued warrants of arrest against members of the legislature; who point out for daggers the courageous members of the convention; and who impute to the people the excesses which they themselves order. When the time comes, I will tear the veil which I now merely raise, should I perish beneath their blows."

Still the triumvirs were not expressly named. Osselin scaled the tribune, and spoke with reference to the Parisian deputation, of which he was one. He said it was against the metropolitan deputies distrust was intended to be excited, but that they were neither so profoundly ignorant, nor so atrociously wicked, as to have formed projects for a triumvirate or a dictatorship; that he was ready to take an oath to the fact, and demanded anathema and death against the first who should be found meditating such schemes. "Let each," he added, "follow me to the tribune, and there make the same declaration." "Yes!" exclaimed Rebecqui, the courageous friend of Barbaroux; "yes! that party accused of tyrannical projects exists, and I proclaim it: it is the Robespierre party! Marseilles knows it, and has sent us here to combat it."

This bold apostrophe caused a great sensation in the assembly. All eyes were turned on Robespierre. Danton hastened to the tribune in order to appease these divisions, and dispel accusations which he knew to be partly directed against himself. "That will be," said he, "a glorious day for the republic, on which a frank and amicable explanation shall allay all these suspicions. You speak of dictators, of triumvirs; but such an accusation is vague, and ought to be signed." "I will sign it!" exclaimed Rebecqui, darting to the table. "Good," replied Danton; "if there be traitors, let them be immolated, were they the dearest of my friends. For myself, my life is known. In the patriotic societies, on the 10th August, and in the executive council, I have served the cause of liberty without any personal views, and with the energy of my temperament. I do not fear accusations for myself, therefore; but wish to avert them from all. There is, I grant, a man in the deputation of Paris, who may be called the Royou of republicans: I mean Marat. I have been often charged as the instigator of his placards; but I appeal to the testimony of the president, and I call upon him to declare, whether, in the commune and in the committees, he has not often seen me in altercation with Marat. At the same time, this writer, so denounced, has passed a portion of his life in cellars and dungeons; sufferings have soured his temper, and his resentment may be excused. But let us leave these discussions, purely individual, and endeavour to promote the public good. Decree the pain of death against any who shall propose a dictatorship or triumvirate.' This recommendation was warmly applauded. "That is not all," resumed Danton; "there is another apprehension rife in the public mind, and it is expedient to dissipate it. It is alleged that a number of the deputies contemplate the federal system, and the division of France into a multitude of sections. It behoves us to form but one aggregate. Declare, therefore, by another decree, the unity of France and its government. These points determined, let us cast aside our suspicions; let us be united, and advance to our common aim."

Buzot replied to Danton that a dictatorship is seized, but not solicited, and that to pass laws against such a request was mere delusion; that, as to the federal system, no person had ever dreamt of it; that the proposition of a departmental guard was a means of unity, since all the departments would be called to guard the national representation in common; but that, at the same time, it might be advisable to pass a law upon the subject, which, however, ought to be maturely weighed; and that, in consequence, the propositions of Danton should be referred to the committee of six, appointed the previous day.

Robespierre, being personally accused, demanded to be heard in his turn. In commencing, he asserted it was not himself he was about to defend, but the public weal, attacked in his person. Turning to Rebecqui, "Citizen," said he to that deputy—"you who have not feared to accuse me—I thank you. I recognise in your courage the renowned city that has deputed you. The country, you, and I, will all gain by this accusation.

A party is mentioned," he continued, "which is alleged to be meditating a new tyranny, and I am named as its head. The accusation is vague; but thanks to all I have done for liberty, it will be easy for me to refute it. It was I who, in the Constituent Assembly, combated for three years all the factions, whatsoever names they assumed; it was I who fought against the court, and disdained its presents; it was I"—— "That is not the question," exclaimed several deputies. "He must be allowed to justify himself," cried Tallien, in reply. "Since I am accused," resumed Robespierre, "of betraying the country, have I not a right to set my whole life in opposition to the charge?" He thereupon recommenced the enumeration of his double services against aristocracy and against the false patriots who took the mask of liberty. In saying these words, he pointed to the right side of the convention. Osselin himself, fatigued with this egotistical review, interrupted Robespierre, and enjoined him to give a frank explanation. "The question is not what thou hast done," added Lecointe-Puyravaux, "but what thou art accused of doing at this present time." Robespierre then tauntingly expatiated on the freedom of opinion, on the sacred right of defence, on the public safety, equally compromised with himself in this accusation. He was again requested to be more precise; but he continued in the same discursive strain. Recalling the famous decrees he was instrumental in passing against the re-election of constituent members, and against the nomination of deputies to offices in the gift of the government, he asked if those were proofs of ambition. Then, recriminating upon his adversaries, he reiterated the imputation of federalism; and concluded by demanding the adoption of the decrees proposed by Danton, and a rigorous examination into the charges brought against him.

Barbaroux, out of all patience, rushed to the bar. "Barbaroux of Marseilles," he exclaimed, "presents himself to sign the denunciation made by Rebecqui against Robespierre." He then recounted a very insignificant and often-repeated tale, to wit, that previous to the 10th August, Panis conducted him to the house of Robespierre, and that, on the termination of their interview, Panis represented Robespierre to him as the only man, the only dictator, capable of saving the commonwealth; to which communication he, Barbaroux, had replied, that the Marseillese would never bow the knee before either king or dictator.

We have already recorded this circumstance, and our readers may judge whether those vague and trivial expressions of Robespierre's friends were sufficient to support such an accusation.

Barbaroux proceeded, and took up, one by one, the charges brought against the Girondists. He moved that federalism should be proscribed by a decree, and that all the members of the National Convention should swear to endure a blockade in the capital, and to die within its walls rather than forsake it. After the cheering provoked by this proposition had subsided, Barbaroux resumed his discourse, and said that it was impossible to deny the existence of projects for a dictatorship; that the usurpations of the commune, the warrants directed against members of the national representation, the commissioners sent into the departments, all proved a scheme for domination; but that the city of Marseilles kept a watchful eye upon the safety of its deputies, and, always prompt to anticipate patriotic decrees, it had dispatched a battalion of federalists, in spite of the royal veto, and was now sending forth eight hundred of its citizens, to whom their parents had given a brace of pistols, a sabre, a musket, and an assignat for five hundred livres; that to them were added two hundred cavalry, perfectly equipped; and that this force would give a commencement to the departmental guard proposed for the security of the convention. "As to Robespierre," concluded Barbaroux, "I feel much regret at having accused him, for I formerly loved and esteemed him. Yes! we all loved and esteemed him, and yet we have accused him! But let him acknowledge his errors and we will desist. Let him cease to complain; for if he has saved liberty by his writings, we have vindicated it by our persons. Citizens, when the day of peril shall arrive, you will duly estimate us; and we shall then see whether the fabricators of placards will have the courage to die with us!" Loud acclamations accompanied Barbaroux even to his seat.

At the mention of placards, Marat claimed the right of speaking. Cambon likewise sought it, and obtained the preference. He denounced certain placards in which the dictatorship was recommended as indispensable, and which were signed with the name of Marat. At this specific charge, every one moved away from that personage, who retorted the scorn evinced towards him by a derisive scowl. Other accusers of Marat and the commune succeeded Cambon. Marat made strenuous efforts to obtain a hearing; but Panis once more procured a preference, to enable him to repel the allegations of Barbaroux. Panis, with great lack of discretion, denied actual but irrelevant facts, which it would have been more advantageous to avow, relying upon their want of purpose. He was interrupted by Brissot, who asked him the occasion of the warrant of arrest issued against his person. Panis recurred in vindication to circumstances which, he said, had been too readily overlooked; to the disorder and terror which prevailed at that time in all minds; to the multitude of denunciations against the conspirators of the 10th August; to the strength of the rumours current against Brissot, and to the necessity of investigating them.

After these tedious explanations, every moment interrupted and resumed, Marat, still insisting upon being heard, at length obtained the right when it was no longer possible to refuse it to him. It was the first time he had appeared at the tribune. His appearance provoked a burst of indignation, and a terrible shout arose against him. "Down! down!" was the general cry. Indifferently clad, wearing a cap, which he laid upon the tribune, and passing over his auditory a convulsive and defying grin, he said: "I have a great number of personal enemies in this assembly"—— "All! all!" exclaimed the majority of the deputies. "I have in this assembly," resumed Marat, with imperturbable assurance, "a great number of personal enemies, whom I invite to the observation of decency. Let them spare their infuriated clamours against a man who has served liberty and themselves more than they imagine.

You speak of a triumvirate, of a dictatorship, and attribute the design to the Parisian deputation; but I owe it to my colleagues, and especially Robespierre and Danton, to declare that they have always opposed it, and that I have always had to combat them on that point. I first and singly, amongst all the political writers in France, advocated such a measure, as the only means of crushing traitors and conspirators. It is I alone who am amenable to punishment; but before striking, deign to hear me." Here some applause was faintly manifested. He resumed. "Amidst the eternal machinations of a perfidious king, of a detestable court, and of false patriots, who, in both assemblies, sold the public liberty, can you impute it to me as a crime that I conceived the only means of safety, and invoked vengeance upon the heads of the guilty? No! for if you did so, the nation would disavow you. It felt that this means was the only one reserved to it; and it was by constituting itself dictator that it has delivered itself from traitors.

I have shuddered more than any other at the idea of those terrible movements, and it was because I desired they might not be perpetually fruitless that I maintained they should be directed by a firm and equitable hand. If the necessity of this step had been perceived at the taking of the Bastille, five hundred reprobate heads would have fallen at my voice, and peace have been established at that epoch. But in consequence of not having displayed an energy equally sagacious and necessary, one hundred thousand patriots have been murdered, and one hundred thousand are menaced with the like fate. At the same time, as a proof that I did not wish to render this species of dictator, tribune, triumvir (the name is of little moment), a tyrant such as stupidity has imagined, but a victim offered up to the country, whose lot no ambitious man would have envied, I intended that his authority should continue only a few days; that it should be restricted to the power of condemning traitors; and even that a cannon-ball should be fastened to his ankle, so that he might be always under the control of the people. My ideas, however revolting they may have appeared to you, were directed to the public good alone. If you were not sufficiently elevated to comprehend me, so much the worse for yourselves!"

The profound silence which had hitherto reigned was here broken by laughter, which in no way disconcerted the speaker, infinitely more terrible than ridiculous. He continued: "Such was my opinion, written, signed, publicly asserted. If it were wrong, you ought to have combated it, shown me that I erred, and not have denounced me to despotism. I am accused of ambition!—but hear and judge me. If I had been willing to put a price on my silence, I might have been gorged with gold, and I am poor! Persecuted without intermission, I have wandered from cellar to cellar, and preached truth with my head upon the block! Open, then, your eyes; instead of consuming your time in scandalous discussions, consummate the declaration of rights, establish the constitution, and settle the basis of a just and free government, which is the true object of your labours."

Universal attention had been conceded to this singular person, and the assembly, astounded at a system so frightful and so studied, had observed a deep silence. Some partisans of Marat, emboldened by this silence, had applauded; but they were not imitated, and Marat resumed his seat without receiving either cheers or marks of anger.

Vergniaud, the purest and most discreet of the Girondists, deemed himself called upon to kindle the indignation of the assembly. Mounting the tribune, he deplored the misfortune of having to answer a man convicted of crimes. Chabot and Tallien remonstrated against the use of such words, and asked whether they referred to the sentence passed by the Châtelet for having unmasked Lafayette. Vergniaud persisted, and re-asserted his deep regret at having to answer a man who had not cleared himself from the judgments recorded against him—a man all steeped in calumny, malice, and blood. The murmurs were renewed, but he continued with firmness; and after excepting from the general Parisian deputation David, Dusaulx, and some other members, he took in his hands the famous circular of the commune, which we have already quoted, and read it word for word. As it was already known, however, it did not produce so material an effect as another paper, which the deputy Boileau read in the course of his speech. It was an article published by Marat that very day, in which he said: "A single reflection oppresses me, namely, that all my efforts to save the people will result in nothing without a fresh insurrection. From the sort of men who compose the majority of the National Convention, I despair of the public safety. If, in the first eight sittings, the foundations of the constitution are not laid, expect no good from that assembly. Fifty years of anarchy await you, and you will avert them only by a dictator—a genuine patriot and statesman. Oh ye generation of prattlers! did ye but know how to act!"

The reading of this article was repeatedly interrupted by cries of indignation. Scarcely was it concluded, than a large body of the members rose in fury against Marat. Some openly threatened him, and shouted, "To the Abbey! To the guillotine!"—others overwhelmed him with epithets of scorn. He replied to all the attacks levelled against him simply by his old grimace. Boileau moved a decree of impeachment, and the majority of the assembly called eagerly for the votes. Marat insisted, with great self-possession, upon being heard. It was proposed that he be heard only at the bar, but he ultimately secured the tribune. According to his usual expression, he recalled his enemies to decency. As to the judgments they had not blushed to upbraid him with, he gloried in them, as the rewards of his courage. Besides, the people, by sending him into the national assembly, had wiped away those decrees, and decided between his accusers and him. As to the article that had just been read, he was far from disavowing it, inasmuch as falsehood never polluted his lips, and fear was a stranger to his heart. "To ask from me a retractation," he added, "is to require me not to see what I have before my eyes—not to feel what I am deeply sensible of; and there is no power under the sun capable of thus subverting my ideas. I can answer for the purity of my heart, but I cannot change my thoughts; they are such as the nature of things suggests to me."

Marat proceeded to inform the assembly that the article in question, published ten days ago as a placard, had been republished against his wish by his bookseller, but that he had just given a new exposition of his principles in the first number of the Journal of the Republic, with which the assembly would be assuredly well satisfied, if it would vouchsafe to hear it read.

The assembly agreed to allow its perusal, and, appeased by the moderate expressions of Marat in the article entitled "Its new progress," treated him with less bitterness; he even obtained some marks of satisfaction. But he remounted the tribune with his usual effrontery, and ventured to administer a severe rebuke to his colleagues upon the dangers of passion and prejudice. He told them that if his journal had not appeared that very day, opportunely to exculpate him, they would have blindly consigned him to irons. "But," said he, drawing forth a pistol, which he always carried in his pocket, and now pointed to his forehead, "I had the means of securing freedom; and if you had decreed me under impeachment, I would have blown my brains to atoms in this very tribune. Behold the reward of my labours, of my perils, of my sufferings! But now I will remain amongst you to brave your fury!" At this last expression of Marat, his colleagues, moved with all their former indignation, shouted out that he was a fool and a villain, and gave way to a prolonged tumult.

The debate had lasted several hours, and what, after all, had been elicited? Nothing upon the alleged project of a dictatorship for the dominion of a triumvirate, but much upon the character of parties, and on their respective strength. Danton had shown himself moderate, and full of kindness for his colleagues, provided his conduct were not too severely handled; Robespierre vindictive and sullen; Marat astounding by his cynicism and cool audacity, repudiated even by his own party, but striving to inculcate his atrocious system, and habituate the mind to its contemplation;—all three prospering in the revolution by different faculties and vices; not acting in concert, on the contrary disavowing each other, and evidently impelled simply by that desire for influence which is natural to all men, but which has not yet ripened into a project of tyranny. Public opinion went with the Girondists in execrating September and its horrors; it granted them the estimation due to their talents and probity; but it deemed their accusations exaggerated and imprudent, and held it as but too palpable that certain personal feelings mingled in their indignation.

From this day, the assembly was divided into a right side and left side, as at the opening of the first Constituent Assembly. On the right side were ranged all the Girondists, and those who, without being personally linked to their destinies, partook, nevertheless, their generous indignation. In the centre were gathered in considerable number all those honest but peaceable deputies, who, moved neither by character nor talents to take part in the contest of factions otherwise than by silent votes, sought obscurity and safety by merging in the multitude. Their numerical force in the assembly, the great respect still entertained for that body itself, and the pains taken by the Jacobin and municipal party to justify itself in their eyes, all tended to give them confidence. They loved to believe that the authority of the convention would suffice in time to subdue the agitators; nor were they sorry to have a plea for deferring the display of energy, and charging the Girondists with hazarding rash accusations. As yet they were principally distinguished for a laudable spirit of justice and impartiality, at times betraying a certain jealousy of the too frequent and too brilliant eloquence of the right side; but they were speedily to become feeble and cowardly in presence of tyranny. They were called the Plain, and in opposition, the left side was denominated the Mountain, on which all the Jacobins were heaped one above the other. Upon the tiers of this Mountain were perceived the deputies of Paris, and such provincial representatives as owed their election to the correspondence of the clubs, or had been gained since their arrival by the opinion that no quarter ought to be granted to the enemies of the revolution. On them might be likewise discerned certain distinguished characters, men of the exact, rigorous, and positive order of minds, by whom the theories and philanthropy of the Girondists were contemned as idle abstractions. However, the Mountaineers were few in number at this time. The Plain, united with the right side, composed an immense majority, which had given the presidency to Pétion, and approved of the attacks made by the Girondists against September, save the personal denunciations, which seemed too premature, and too insufficiently grounded.*

* The following is the picture which the minister Garat, who studied the characters of the revolution with the most observant eye, has drawn of the two sides of the convention:—

"In the right side of the convention were included almost all the men of whom I have just spoken: I could not discern any other spirit amongst them than such as I had always recognised in them. There, then, I perceived both that republicanism of sentiment which only consents to obey a man when that man speaks in the name of the nation and as the law, and that still more rare republicanism of the mind which has taken to pieces and put together again all the springs of organisation in a society of men alike in rights as in nature; which has discovered by what happy and profound artifice there may be associated in a great republic those things that appear incapable of association—equality, and submission to the magistrates; a beneficial agitation in opinion and discussion, and a constant, immoveable order; a government whose power may always be absolute over individuals and the multitude, and still amenable to the nation; an executive power whose outward forms and pomp, of an useful splendour, may always support the idea of the majesty of the republic, but never that of the greatness of an individual.

On the same side I saw seated the men most fully versant in those doctrines of political economy which teach the policy of opening and enlarging the channels of private and of national wealth; of composing the public treasury of such contributions as the fortune of each individual owes to it; of creating new sources and new channels of productiveness to private capital by a skilful use of what it has poured into the coffers of the state; of protecting and leaving without restrictions all kinds of industry, without favouring any in particular; of viewing large possessions not as unfruitful lakes, which absorb and hold all the tributary streams that pour from the mountains, but as reservoirs necessary for the purposes of multiplying and improving the germs of universal fecundity, and of distributing them by degrees over localities which would have otherwise remained in unproductiveness and sterility—admirable doctrines, which introduced liberty into arts and commerce before it had penetrated into governments, but peculiarly fitted by their essence to the spirit of republics, they being alone capable of giving a solid foundation to equality, not in a general frugality always violated, and which fetters the desires infinitely less than industry, but in an universal competence, in those labours, the ingenious variety and continual revival of which can alone occupy, auspiciously for liberty, that turbulent activity of democracies which, after having long tormented, finally caused the downfall of the ancient republics, amidst the storms and tempests in which their atmosphere was always enveloped.

On the right side were five or six men whose genius was competent to originate these great theories of the social and economical orders, and a considerable number of men capable of understanding and diffusing them. It was there, likewise, that certain spirits were ranged, formerly distinguished for impetuosity and violence, but who, after describing and exhausting the entire circle of demagogical passions, now aspired simply to discredit and combat the follies they themselves had propagated. There, finally, were seated, like devotees kneeling at the foot of the altar, those men, whom subdued passions, a moderate for-

The assembly had passed to the order of the day upon the respective accusations of the two parties, but had maintained the decree of the previous day. Thus three points remained fixed: 1st, To require from the minister of the interior a faithful and exact account of the state of Paris; 2d, To frame a project of law against instigators to murder and pillage; and, 3d, To devise the means of assembling a departmental guard around the National Convention. The energy and spirit with which the report upon the state of Paris would be characterised was well known, since it was intrusted to Roland; and the committee charged with the two projects against written instigations, and for the establishment of a guard, inspired equal confidence, inasmuch as it was entirely composed of Girondists. Buzot, Lasource, and Kersaint, were members of it.

It was against the two latter objects that the Mountaineers were especially inveterate. They asked whether it were intended to repeat the proclamation of martial law and the massacre of the Champ-de-Mars, and whether the convention designed to give itself satellites and body-guards like the last king. They thus revived, as the Girondists upbraided them, all the reasons alleged by the court against the camp below Paris.

Many members of the left side, even the most ardent, were, in their capacity of deputies of the convention, decisively inimical to the usurpations of the commune; and, with the exception of the deputies of Paris, no one defended it when attacked, which occurred almost daily. Thus decrees were passed in rapid succession. As the commune delayed to adopt steps for its own renewal, in execution of the decree prescribing the re-election of all the administrative bodies, the executive council was ordered to superintend its reconstruction, and render an account of the same to the assembly within three days. A commission of six members was named to receive declarations from all those who had deposited effects at the town-hall, and to ascertain the existence of those effects, or the purposes to which the municipality had applied them. The directory of the department, which the insurrectional commune had reduced to the title and the functions of a simple administrative commission, was restored to all its prerogatives, and resumed its title of directory. The communal elections for appointing a mayor, and the members of the municipality and the council-general, which the Jacobins had recently determined to make viva voce, as a means of intimidating the faint-hearted, were rendered secret by a fresh confirmation of the existing law. The elections already made according to that illegal mode were annulled, and the sections submitted to re-commence them in the prescribed form. It was finally decreed that all the prisoners confined without a warrant of arrest should be forthwith discharged. This was a heavy blow levelled at the committee of surveillance, whose rage was principally directed against persons.

All these decrees were passed during the first days of October, and the commune, thus vigorously assailed, found itself compelled to bend beneath the ascendancy of the convention. However, the committee of sur-tune, and an education which had not been neglected, prepared to illustrate, by all the private virtues, a republic which permitted them to enjoy their tranquillity, their easy and kindly life, and their possessions.

Turning my eyes from this right side to the left, fixing them upon the Mountain, what a contrast struck me! There I beheld a man working with the utmost turbulence, to whom a visage tinged with a copper dye gave the appearance of one sprung from the bloody caverns of the anthropophagi or the burning threshold of hell; in whom, by his convulsive, abrupt, and broken step, you recognised one of those assassins who have escaped the executioner but not the Furies, and who seem willing to annihilate the human race for the sake of escaping the terror with which the sight of every man inspires them. Under the despotism, which he had not covered with blood as he had done liberty, this man had been possessed with the ambition of making a revolution in the sciences; and he had attacked, in audacious and contemptible systems, the greatest discoveries of modern times and of human intelligence. His eyes, wandering over the history of the world, had paused upon the lives of four or five grand exterminators, who converted cities into deserts, in order afterwards to repeople the deserts with a race formed after their own likeness, or after that of tigers—such was all he had retained of the annals of nations, all that he knew or wished to imitate of them. By an instinct similar to that of wild beasts, rather than from a perception of human perversity, he had discerned to how many follies and crimes it was possible to hurry an immense nation whose religious and political chains had just been snapped asunder; it was that idea which dictated all his writings, all his words, all his actions. And his fall was reserved to the poniard of a woman! and more than fifty thousand statues of him were erected in the republic!

By his side were drawn men who would not of themselves have conceived such atrocities, but who, cast with him, by an act of extreme temerity, into events the critical import of which unnerved them, and whose dangers made them tremble, even whilst disavowing the maxims of the monster, had probably already followed them, and were not indisposed to allow the fear to prevail that they might follow them again. They held Marat in horror, but they felt no repugnance in making use of him. They placed him in the midst of them, they put him in the foreground, they carried him, as it were, upon their breasts, like a head of Medusa. As the terror such a man inspired was every where, so he himself was thought every where visible; he was in some sort believed to be the whole Mountain, or the whole Mountain to be like him. Amongst the leaders, in fact, there were several who reproved the crimes of Marat only as they were somewhat too glaring and avowed.

But amongst those very leaders (and here truth compels me to dissent from the opinions of many honest men), amongst the leaders themselves were many men who, connected with the others greatly more by events than by sentiment, cast many a look and a regret towards justice and humanity; who would have displayed numerous virtues, and rendered numerous services, if at any instant they had been deemed capable of such manifestations or actions. To the Mountain repaired, as to military posts, those who abundantly possessed the passion, but scantily the theory, of liberty; those who believed equality menaced, or even broken, by dignity of sentiment and elegance of language; those who, reared in hovels or workshops, refused to recognise a republican except in the costume they themselves wore; those who, entering for the first time into the career of the revolution, found it incumbent on them to signalise that impetuosity and violence which had originated the glory of almost all the great revolutionists; those who, still young, and formed rather to serve the republic in the armies than in the sanctuary of the laws, having seen the republic take birth amidst the roar of thunder, believed that it was always amidst the roar of thunder it behoved them to preserve it and promulgate its decrees. To this left side also resorted, seeking an asylum rather than a position, several of those deputies who, having been reared in the proscribed castes of nobility and priesthood, although always unsullied, were perpetually exposed to suspicions, and fled to the top of the Mountain to avert the accusation of not having attained the requisite elevation of principles. Thither proceeded, too, to feed upon their suspicions and live in the midst of chimeras, those solemn and melancholy characters who, having observed falsehood too often united with politeness, believed in virtue only when gloomy, and in liberty only when savage. There sat, also, certain spirits who had contracted in the exact sciences surliness as well as preciseness, and who, proud of possessing knowledge immediately applicable to the mechanical arts, were well pleased to be separated by position, as by disdain, from those men of letters and philosophers whose accomplishments are not so promptly serviceable to weavers and forgers, and reach individuals only after having enlightened the entire society. There, finally, were inevitably moved to vote, whatsoever might be in other respects their avocations and talents, all those who, by the overstrained workings of their character, were disposed to go beyond, rather than remain within, the limit which might have been assigned to the revolutionary energy and mania.

Such was the idea I formed to myself of the elements composing the two sides of the convention.

Judging each side by the majority of its elements, both, in different kinds and degrees, infallibly appeared to me capable of rendering great services to the republic: the right side in organising the interior with wisdom and dignity; the left side in imparting from their own souls into those of all the French, those republican and popular passions so necessary to a nation assailed on all sides by the herd of kings and the soldiery of Europe."

veillance had resolved not to be discomfited without show of resistance. Its members had accordingl presented themselves at the bar of the assembly, saying that they came to confound their adversaries. Possessing the papers found at the house of Laporte intendant of the civil list, and condemned, as the reade will recollect, by the tribunal of the 17th August, the had discovered, they alleged, a letter in which was mentioned how much certain decrees had cost, passed in the preceding assemblies. They were prepared tc unmask the deputies sold to the court, and demonstrate the hollowness of their patriotism. "Nam them!" the assembly exclaimed, indignantly. "W cannot yet do so," replied the members of the committee. A commission of twenty-four deputies was immediately nominated, all unconnected with the Constituent and Legislative Assemblies, charged, as a means of rebutting the calumny, to investigate those papers and give in a report of their contents. Marat, the inventor of this expedient, published in his journal that he had "paid the Rolandists," the accusers of the commune, "in their own coin;" and he announced the pretended discovery of a Girondist treason. In the mean time the papers were examined, none of the present deputies were found compromised, and the committee of surveillance was accordingly declared guilty of calumny. The papers being too voluminous for the twenty-four deputies to continue their examination at the town-hall, they were removed to one of the committee-rooms of the assembly. Marat, seeing himself thus deprived of rich materials for his daily accusations, was violently exasperated, and pretended in his journal that it was a scheme to destroy the record of numberless treasons.

After having thus repressed the encroachments of the commune, the assembly turned its attention to the executive power, and decided that the ministry could not be held by any of its members. Danton, obliged to choose between the functions of minister of justice and of member of the convention, preferred, like Mirabeau, those which opened to him the tribune; and he quitted the ministry without rendering an account of his secret disbursements, which he asserted he had already laid before the council. This allegation was not quite accurate; but too close a scrutiny was not judged expedient, and the matter was passed over. On the refusal of François de Neufchâteau, Garat, a distinguished author, and highly intellectual ideologist, who had become famous by his admirable conduct of the Journal de Paris, occupied the post of minister of justice. Servan, wearied by a laborious office, above, not his capacity, but his strength, preferred the command of the army of observation stationed at the foot of the Pyrenees. The minister Lebrun was provisionally intrusted with the portfolio of war, in addition to that of foreign affairs. Roland likewise tendered his resignation, disgusted with an anarchy so repulsive to his integrity and inflexible love of order. The Girondists moved the assembly to invite him to retain the portfolio. The Mountaineers, and particularly Danton, whom he had greatly thwarted, opposed this proposition as derogatory to the assembly. Danton complained that he was feeble, and under the control of his wife; which reproach was answered by an appeal to his letter of the 3d September, and might have been more signally repelled by adducing the opposition that he, Danton himself, had experienced from him in the council. However, the order of the day was carried, and the motion passed aside. But, urged by the Girondists and all the men of character, Roland continued in the ministry. "I remain," he nobly wrote to the assembly, "because I am assailed by calumny, because dangers press upon me, and because the convention has appeared desirous that I should still exercise the ministry.—It is too glorious," he added, in finishing his letter, "that my union with courage and virtue is the solitary reproach made against me."

The assembly subsequently divided itself into different committees. It instituted a committee of surveillance composed of thirty members; a second, of war, of twenty-four; a third, of accounts, of fifteen; a fourth, of civil and criminal legislation, of forty-eight; a fifth, of assignats, currency, and finance, of forty-two. A sixth committee, more important than all the others, was intrusted with the principal object for which the convention itself was convoked, that is to say, the preparation of a constitution. It was composed of nine members, enjoying celebrity on various grounds, and almost all chosen in the interest of the right side. Philosophy had its representatives in the persons of Sièyes, Condorcet, and the American, Thomas Paine, recently elected a French citizen and a member of the National Convention; the Gironde was peculiarly represented by Gensonné, Vergniaud, Pétion, and Brissot; the centre by Barrère, and the Mountain by Danton. It was certainly matter of astonishment that this latter tribune, so fitted for action but so essentially unspeculative, should be placed in this purely philosophical committee, especially when the character of Robespierre, if not his talents, distinctly pointed him out for such a part. It is certain that Robespierre was much more desirous of the distinction, and that he was deeply incensed at not obtaining it. It was conferred in preference on Danton, whom his natural capacity rendered suitable for all tasks, and whom no bitter animosity yet separated from his colleagues. This composition of the committee, however, was the occasion of the constitution being so long delayed.

After having thus provided for the re-establishment of order in the capital, for the organisation of the executive power, for the distribution of business amongst committees, and for the preparation of the constitution, there remained a final subject to regulate, one of the gravest that could occupy the assembly—the fate of Louis XVI. and of his family. A profound silence had been observed upon this topic in the assembly; and whilst it was every where discussed—at the Jacobin Club, at the commune, and in all public or private meetings, in the convention alone it was never mentioned. Some emigrants having been seized with arms in their hands, they had been conducted towards Paris to receive the application of the criminal laws. On this point, a voice (it was the first) asked whether, instead of heeding these subordinate culprits, it was not expedient to adopt measures regarding those lofty criminals confined in the Temple. At these words, the assembly was hushed into the deepest silence. Barbaroux was the first to break it, and he moved that, before resolving whether the convention should try Louis XVI., it should be settled whether the convention were a judicial body, for it had other criminals to judge besides those in the Temple. In starting this question, Barbaroux had reference to the project for constituting the convention an extraordinary tribunal for trying the agitators, the triumvirs, &c. After some discussion, the motion was remitted to the committee of legislation, with instructions to examine the questions involved in it.

CHAPTER XV.

MILITARY OPERATIONS AT THE END OF OCTOBER 1792.—SECOND CONTEST BETWEEN THE GIRONDISTS AND THE MOUNTAIN.—PRELIMINARY PROPOSITIONS FOR THE TRIAL OF LOUIS XVI.

AT this period the military situation of France was greatly changed. It was nearly the middle of October, and the enemy was already driven from Champagne and Flanders, and alien territory invaded on three points, the Palatinate, Savoy, and the county of Nice.

We have seen the Prussians retreating from the camp of La Lune, retracing the route of the Argonne, strewing its defiles with dead and sick, and only escaping total destruction by the negligence of the French generals, who each pursued a different object. The Duke of Saxe-Teschen had not been more successful in the Low Countries. Whilst the Prussians were marching on the Argonne, that prince, unwilling to remain inactive, had thought himself called upon to undertake a brilliant enterprise. However, although the frontier to the north was undefended, his means were not much more considerable than those of his opponents, and he had some difficulty in collecting fifteen thousand men, with an indifferent train of artillery. Directing a series of false attacks along the whole line of fortresses, he succeeded in breaking up one of the small camps, and suddenly advanced upon Lille, to attempt a siege in which the greatest generals had been foiled, with powerful armies and a formidable artillery. Destructive enterprises are only justified in war by the possibility of success. The duke could only approach one point of the place, and he there established batteries of howitzers, with which he bombarded it during six consecutive days, and burnt upwards of two hundred houses. It is said that the Archduchess Christina resolved to be present at this horrible spectacle. If it were so, she would merely witness the heroism of the besieged and the inutility of Austrian barbarity. The people of Lille, resisting with noble fortitude, determined never to surrender; and on the 8th October, whilst the Prussians were making the best of their way through the Argonne, the Duke Albert found it necessary to abandon Lille. General Labourdonnaye, arriving from Soissons, and Beurnonville, returning from Champagne, forced him to retire precipitately from the French frontiers; and the resistance of the Lillois, published throughout all France, tended to augment the general enthusiasm.

Almost simultaneously with these events, Custine attempted some bold operations in the Palatinate, but with a result more brilliant than solid. Attached to the army of Biron, who was encamped along the banks of the Rhine, he was stationed with 17,000 men, at some distance from Spires. The grand invading army had but weakly protected its rear when advancing into the interior of France. Feeble detachments, therefore, covered Spires, Worms, and Mayence. Custine perceived the neglect, marched on Spires, and entered it without resistance on the 30th September. Emboldened by this first success, he penetrated on the 5th October into Worms, without encountering greater difficulties, and obliged a garrison of 2700 men to lay down their arms. He afterwards took Frankenthal, and immediately formed a design on the important fortress of Mayence, which was the main point of retreat to the Prussians, and in which they had been imprudent enough to leave but a moderate garrison. Custine, with only 17,000 men, and without artillery, could not institute a siege, but he determined upon a sudden assault. The opinions which had roused France agitated all Germany, and especially the university towns. Mayence was one of these, and Custine opened a correspondence within its walls. He then drew near it, withdrew upon false intelligence of the arrival of an Austrian corps, again returned, and, making certain considerable demonstrations, deceived the enemy as to the strength of his army. An anxious deliberation meanwhile was proceeding in the fortress. A capitulation was strenuously recommended by the partisans of the French, and on the 21st October the gates were opened to Custine. The garrison laid down their arms, excepting 800 Austrians, who rejoined the grand army. The news of these successes spread with rapidity, and caused an extraordinary sensation. They had, doubtless, cost little in the acquisition; they were infinitely less meritorious than the resolution of the Lillois, and the magnanimous determination displayed at Sainte-Menehould; but there was a mighty charm in passing from mere resistance to conquest. So far Custine had conducted himself with ability; and if he had properly appreciated his position, he would have concluded the campaign by a movement at once feasible and decisive.

At this instant, the three armies of Dumouriez, Kellermann, and Custine were, by the happiest conjunction, so situated as to be able to destroy the Prussians, and conquer by a single march the whole line of the Rhine as far as the ocean. If Dumouriez, less prepossessed by another idea, had retained Kellermann under his orders, and pursued the Prussians with his 80,000 men; if, at the same time, Custine, descending the Rhine from Mayence to Coblentz, had thrown himself on their rear, they must infallibly have been overwhelmed. Then following the course of the Rhine to Holland, the French would have taken Duke Albert in the rear, obliged him to lay down his arms, or cut his way through their army, and all the Low Countries must have submitted. Treves and Luxumbourg, comprised within the line described, would have necessarily fallen; France had been extended to the banks of the Rhine, and the campaign terminated in a month. Genius was abundant in Dumouriez, but his ideas had taken another course. Impatient to return into Belgium, he was intent only upon marching there in a direct line, in order to succour Lille and drive Duke Albert before him. He consequently left Kellermann to carry on the pursuit of the Prussians alone. The latter might still have advanced on Coblentz, passing between Luxumbourg and Treves, whilst Custine descended from Mayence. But Kellermann, backward in enterprise, presumed too little on his troops, which appeared harassed, and he cantoned around Metz. Custine, on his part, desiring to act independently, and to make brilliant incursions, had no wish to join Kellermann, and confine himself to the limits of the Rhine. He never once thought, therefore, of proceeding to Coblentz. Thus was this admirable plan neglected, so ably seized and developed by the greatest of the French military historians.*

Custine, possessing considerable talents, was nevertheless presumptuous, hasty, and inconsiderate. He was mainly bent on rendering himself independent of Biron and every other general, and filled with the idea of conquering all around him. An attack on Manheim would be a violation of the neutrality of the elector-palatine, which was expressly prohibited by the executive council, and he therefore resolved to quit the Rhine and advance into Germany. Frankfort, situated on the Maine, seemed to him a prey worthy of acquisition, and he determined to proceed thither. That free and commercial town, however, always neutral in the various wars, and well inclined towards France, was far from meriting so disastrous a preference. Being unfortified, it was easy to capture, but difficult to defend, and consequently useless to occupy. Such an enterprise could have but one object, that of levying contributions; and it was the height of injustice to impose them upon a population invariably neutral, reposing, furthermore, upon its friendly dispositions, and by those very dispositions deserving the favour of France, of which it approved the principles and wished the success. Custine committed the fault of entering it, nevertheless. His occupation was effected on the 27th October. He exacted contributions, and irritated the inhabitants, whom he rendered hostile to France. He likewise exposed himself, by thus advancing on the Maine, to be cut off from the Rhine, either by the Prussians, should they ascend as far as Bingen, or by the elector-palatine, should he break his neutrality, and march from Manheim.

The intelligence of these incursions on the enemy's territory continued to excite great joy in France, which was sufficiently amazed at hearing of conquests a few days after trembling at the idea of being itself subdued. The Prussians, in alarm, threw a flying bridge over the Rhine, in order to ascend the right bank, and drive back the French. Luckily for Custine, they took twelve days to pass the river. Desertions, disease, and the separation of the Austrians, had reduced their army to fifty thousand men. Clairfayt, with his eighteen thousand Austrians, had followed the general movement of the French troops towards Flanders, and was marching to the relief of Duke Albert. The corps of emigrants had been disbanded, and that glittering soldiery had been incorporated in the troops under Condé, or had passed into foreign service.

* Jomini.

Whilst these events were passing on the frontiers of the north and the Rhine, the French gained advantages also on the Alpine frontier. Montesquiou, commanding the army of the south, overran Savoy, and occupied the county of Nice by one of his lieutenants. This general, who had evinced in the Constituent Assembly all the talents of an enlightened statesman, and only wanted time to display the qualities of an able soldier, with which we are assured he was plentifully endowed, had been ordered to the bar of the legislative body to give an account of his conduct, denounced as too dilatory. He had succeeded in convincing his accusers that his tardiness was owing to the deficiency of means, and not to a lack of zeal, and he had returned to the Alps. He belonged, however, to the first revolutionary generation, and consequently harmonised but indifferently with the second. Summoned once more to Paris, he was on the point of being superseded, when tidings of his entrance into Savoy were received. His dismissal was then suspended, and he was allowed to continue his conquest.

According to the plan conceived by Dumouriez, when, as minister of foreign affairs, he regulated at once diplomacy and war, France was to push her armies to her natural frontiers, the Rhine and the high chain of the Alps. With this view, it became necessary to conquer Belgium, Savoy, and Nice. Whilst thus returning to the invariable principles of her policy, France had the advantage of despoiling none but the two enemies who made war upon her, namely, the house of Austria and the court of Turin. Of this plan, foiled in April as to Belgium, and hitherto deferred as to Savoy, Montesquiou was now proceeding to execute the part assigned to him. He gave a division to General Anselme, with orders to pass the Var, and march on Nice at a given signal; he himself advanced, with the greater part of his army, from Grenoble towards Chambery, threatened the Sardinian troops by a detachment in the direction of Saint-Geniès, and proceeding in person from Fort Barraux upon Montmelian, he succeeded in dividing them and driving them into the valleys. Whilst his lieutenants pursued them, he marched to Chambery, and on the 28th September made his triumphal entry into that town, to the great delight of the inhabitants, who loved liberty as true sons of the mountains, and France, as men speaking the same language, having the same manners, and belonging to the same territorial enclosure. He immediately convened an assembly of Savoyards, for the purpose of deliberating on a question attended with little difficulty in solution, to wit, union with France.

In the same period, Anselme, reinforced by six thousand Marseillese, whom he had demanded as auxiliaries, had reached the Var, an unequal torrent, like all lofty mountain streams, alternately flooded and dry, and incapable of having a fixed bridge thrown over it. Anselme boldly passed the Var, and occupied Nice, which the Count Saint-André had just abandoned, and which the magistrates urged him to enter, for the purpose of checking the disorders of the populace, who were pursuing a frightful course of pillage. The Sardinian troops fell back towards the high valleys; Anselme followed after them; but he stopped before a strong fort, that of Saorgio, from which he could never dislodge the Piedmontese garrison. In the mean time, the squadron of Admiral Truguet, regulating its motions by those of General Anselme, had obtained the surrender of Villafranca, and subsequently anchored before the petty principality of Oneglia. This port was a usual asylum for corsairs, and on that account its reduction was advisable. But, whilst a French boat was pulling to shore for the purpose of holding a parley, several of its crew were, in violation of the rights of nations, killed by a general discharge. Thereupon the admiral, mooring his vessels in front of the town, opened on it a destructive fire, and disembarked some troops, who sacked the place, and made a great carnage of monks, who were found there in considerable number, and had been, it was alleged, the instigators of so gross a breach of faith. Such is the inexorable rigour of military law; and upon the wretched town of Oneglia it was wreaked without mercy. After this expedition, the French squadron returned before Nice, where Anselme, separated by the floods of the Var from the rest of his army, was in a position of extreme hazard. However, by taking due precautions against the post of Saorgio, and conciliating the inhabitants more than he had thought fit to do at first, he was enabled to make good his station and preserve his conquest.

During these occurrences, Montesquiou had advanced from Chambery in the direction of Geneva, and now nearly approached the frontier of Switzerland, a country variously inclined towards the French, and pretending to view the invasion of Savoy as dangerous to its neutrality.

The feelings of the cantons were greatly divided touching the French nation. All the aristocratic republics condemned the French revolution. Berne especially, and its avoyer Stinger, heartily detested it, and the more so, perhaps, because the Pays de Vaud, so cruelly oppressed, regarded it with rapture. The Helvetian aristocracy, stimulated by the avoyer Stinger and the English ambassador, called for war against the French; and assigned as its motives the massacre of the Swiss guards on the 10th August; the disarming of a regiment at Aix; and, lastly, the occupation of the gorges of Porentruy, which depended on the bishopric of Basle, and which Biron had seized, in order to close the passage of the Jura. The moderate party, however, gained the ascendancy, and an armed neutrality was resolved upon. The canton of Berne, more exasperated and distrustful than the rest, marched a detachment to Nyón, and, under pretext of a request by the magistrates of Geneva, placed a garrison in that town. According to ancient treaties, Geneva, in the event of a war between France and Savoy, was bound to receive a garrison from neither power. The French envoy immediately departed, and the executive council, urged by Clavière, who had been formerly exiled from Geneva, and was anxious to introduce the revolution amongst its inhabitants, ordered Montesquiou to insist upon the execution of the treaties. Furthermore, he was enjoined to place a garrison in the town himself; that is to say, to imitate the infraction exclaimed against on the part of the Bernese. Montesquiou was sensible, in the first place, that he wanted means to take Geneva, and in the next, that by breaking the neutrality, and commencing war with Switzerland, France would be laid open on the east, and the right flank of her defensive uncovered. He resolved, therefore, to intimidate Geneva on the one hand, whilst on the other he attempted to impress these prudential views on the executive council. He accordingly imperatively demanded the dismissal of the Bernese garrison, and endeavoured to persuade the French ministry that it was inexpedient to exact more.

His purpose was, in case of extremity, to bombard Geneva, and advance by a bold march into the canton of Vaud, with the view of revolutionising it. Geneva consented to dismiss the Bernese troops on condition that Montesquiou withdrew to a distance of ten leagues, to which he instantly acceded. This concession, however, was blamed at Paris; and Montesquiou, in position at Carouge, where the Genevese exiles, eager to return into their native country, pressed around him, was placed between the fear of embroiling France with Switzerland, and that of disobeying the executive council, which disdained the most sagacious military and political considerations. This negotiation, delayed by the distance between the places, was not finished by the end of October.

Therefore, in October 1792, the state of the French forces, from Dunkirk to Basle, and from Basle to Nice, may be thus described. The frontier of Champagne was delivered from the grand invasion; the troops were proceeding from that province towards Flanders, to relieve Lille and invade Belgium. Kellermann had his quarters in Lorraine. Custine, emancipated from the command of Biron, master of Mayence, and pushing imprudently into the Palatinate and even to the Maine, gladdened France by his conquests, alarmed Germany, and exposed himself inconsiderately to the risk of being cut off by the Prussians, who were ascending the right bank of the Rhine, with sickly and vanquished troops, but still numerous, and quite capable of overwhelming the small French army. Biron was still encamped along the Rhine. Montesquiou, master of Savoy by the retreat of the Piedmontese beyond the Alps, and guarded from fresh attacks by the snow, had to decide the question of Swiss neutrality either by arms or by negotiations. Lastly, Anselme, master of Nice, and supported by a squadron, was enabled to retain his position, in spite of the floods of the Var, and of the Piedmontese clustered above him in the post of Saorgio.

Whilst the war was being transferred from Champagne to Belgium, Dumouriez had asked permission to visit Paris for two or three days, in order to concert with the ministers the invasion of the Low Countries, and a general plan for all the military operations. His enemies reported that his real object was to reap applause, and that he disregarded the duties of his command for the gratification of a silly vanity. This reproach was unduly exaggerated, for Dumouriez's command was not injured by his absence, and the mere marches of troops could be executed without his superintendence. His presence at Paris, on the other hand, must necessarily be advantageous to the council in determining upon a general plan of operations; and furthermore, he might be pardoned for a certain impatience to enjoy his triumph, so general amongst mankind, and so excusable when it may be gratified without detriment to duty.

He arrived on the 11th October at Paris. His position was somewhat embarrassing, for he was in complete harmony with neither of the two parties. The violence of the Jacobins was repugnant to him, and he had quarrelled with the Girondists, by expelling them a few months before from the ministry. However, well received throughout Champagne, he was still more so in Paris, especially by the ministers and by Roland himself, who extinguished his personal resentment when the public good was interested. He presented himself on the 12th to the convention. Scarcely was his name announced than acclamations, mingled with the clapping of hands, burst from all quarters. He pronounced a simple energetic discourse, in which he briefly retraced the whole campaign of the Argonne, and eulogised, in emphatic terms, his troops, and Kellermann himself. His staff then presented a flag captured from the emigrants, which they offered to the assembly as a memento of the futility of their projects. Immediately afterwards the deputies crowded around him, and the sitting was suspended, that free scope might be afforded to congratulations. The numerous deputies of the Plain, the impartials, as they were called, having to upbraid him neither with abandonment nor with revolutionary lukewarmness, were those who testified towards him the most lively and heartfelt joy. The Girondists, indeed, were not backward in their manifestations; but, either through the fault of Dumouriez, or through their own, the reconciliation was not perfect, and a remnant of estrangement might still be perceived between them. The Mountaineers, who had once reproached him with attachment for Louis XVI., and now found him, in manners, merit, and elevation, too similar to the Girondists, looked with an evil eye on the testimonies of regard he obtained from them, and imagined such testimonies to be more significant than they in truth were.

After leaving the convention, the Jacobin Club remained to be visited; and so overweening was the influence possessed by that association, that the victorious general could not dispense with paying it his homage. It was there that the clamour of the moment grew into projects and imposed laws. Whether it had reference to an important decree, a high political question, or a great revolutionary measure, the Jacobins, always the promptest, immediately opened the discussion and gave their opinion. Then they spread themselves into the commune and the sections, and wrote to all the affiliated clubs; and the opinion they had pronounced, the intentions they had formed, returned in the shape of addresses from all the corners of France, and in that of armed petitions from all the quarters of Paris. When, in the municipal councils, the sections, and all assemblies invested with any authority whatsoever, the members still hesitated upon a question from a lingering respect for legality, the Jacobins, who deemed themselves as unfettered as thought, boldly solved it; and every insurrection was debated amongst them long before it broke out. They had deliberated on that of the 10th August during an entire month. Besides this initiatory course on each question, they usurped an inexorable inquisition over all the details of government. Were a minister, the head of a department, or a contractor, accused, commissioners proceeded from the Jacobin Club, ordered the desks to be opened, and exacted rigorous accounts, which were rendered to them without any marks of disdain or impatience. Every citizen who considered he had reason to complain of any act whatever, had only to appear before the society, and he there found officious defenders ready to procure him justice. One day were soldiers complaining of their officers, artisans of their employers; another, an actress exclaiming against her manager; and once a Jacobin appeared to demand reparation for adultery committed with his wife by one of his comrades.

Every one hastened to have his name inscribed on the registers of the society, as a proof of patriotic zeal. Almost all the deputies newly arrived at Paris had taken care to present themselves; one hundred and thirteen were reckoned in one week; and even those who had no intention of frequenting their meetings did not the less solicit admission. The affiliated societies wrote from the obscurest corners of the provinces to know if the deputies of their departments had sought to be enrolled and were assiduous in their attendance. The wealthy of the capital strove to have their opulence pardoned by going to the Jacobins' and covering their heads with the red cap; and their equipages blocked the doors of that chosen abode of equality. Whilst the hall was filled with the multitude of its members, whilst the galleries were overflowing with people, an immense crowd, mingling with the equipages, waited at the door, and demanded admission with loud cries. Sometimes this crowd grew irritated, especially when rain, so frequent in the climate of Paris, increased the annoyance of waiting; and then some member moved the admission of the good people suffering at the doors of the hall. Marat was frequently accustomed to make such propositions; and when admission was granted, sometimes before, a prodigious concourse of men and women inundated the hall and mixed promiscuously with the members. It was towards the close of day that the club met. The angry feelings, aroused and kept down in the convention, were brought there to find free vent. The late hour, the multitude of persons present, all contributed to excite the mind; often the sitting, being prolonged, degenerated into a frightful tumult; and at such times the agitators derived for the morrow the courage necessary for the most audacious enterprises. Yet this society, so far advanced in the demagogical career, was not what it afterwards became. The equipages of those who came to abjure the inequality of conditions were still allowed at the door. Some members had made fruitless efforts to speak with their hats on but they had been obliged to uncover. Brissot, it is true, had been recently excluded by a solemn decision, but Pétion continued to preside there amidst acclamations. Chabot, Collot-d'Herbois, Fabre-d'Eglantine, were the favourite orators. Marat was still viewed as something strange; and Chabot said, in the language of the place, that Marat was a porcupine that could not be grasped at any point.

Dumouriez was received by Danton, who presided at the sitting: vehement applause greeted him, and his presence amongst them procured his pardon for the supposed friendship of the Girondists. He uttered a few words suitable to the occasion, and promised, "before the end of the month, to march at the head of sixty thousand men, for the purpose of attacking kings and rescuing nations from tyranny."

Danton, answering in analogous style, said to him that, rallying the French in the camp of Sainte-Menehould, he had deserved well of the country; but that a new career was opening for him; that he was destined to make crowns fall before the red cap with which the society had honoured him, and that his name would in that case shine amongst the most renowned in the history of France. Collot-d'Herbois afterwards addressed him, and treated him to a discourse which exhibits at once the prevalent language of the era, and the sentiments entertained towards the general at that particular moment.*

"It is not a king who has nominated thee, oh Dumouriez, but thy fellow-citizens. Remember that a general of the republic ought never to serve any but it alone. Thou hast heard of Themistocles: he had just saved Greece at Salamis; but, calumniated by his enemies, he was driven to seek an asylum with tyrants. They made him offers to serve against his country; for answer, he plunged his sword into his heart. Dumouriez, thou hast enemies—thou wilt be calumniated: remember Themistocles!

Enslaved nations await thee to aid them: thou wilt speedily deliver them. How glorious a mission! I must warn thee, however, against any excess of generosity towards thy enemies. Thou hast escorted back the King of Prussia a little too much after the French fashion. But we will hope that Austria will have a double measure dealt out to her.

Thou wilt go to Brussels, Dumouriez——I have nothing to say to thee. But, if thou shouldst find there an execrable woman, who, under the walls of Lille, came to feast her ferocity with the spectacle of red-hot balls!——But that woman will not stay for thee.

At Brussels, liberty is about to revive under thy steps. Citizens, maidens, matrons, children, will press

* I deem it incumbent on me to subjoin such notes as appear to me valuable, both as elucidating facts little known and wrongly appreciated, and as records of a style and language at present utterly forgotten, but nevertheless extremely characteristic. They are, for the most part, taken from sources wholly overlooked, and chiefly from the debates of the Jacobin Club, a political monument equally rare and curious.

SPEECH OF COLLOT-D'HERBOIS TO DUMOURIEZ, AFTER THE CAMPAIGN OF THE ARGONNE.

(Extracted from the Journal of the Jacobins.)

(SITTING OF SUNDAY 14TH OCTOBER, YEAR FIRST OF THE REPUBLIC.)

"I wished to speak of our armies, and I congratulate myself on speaking of them in presence of the soldier you have just heard. I might blame the answer of the president: I have already repeatedly affirmed that the president ought never to answer members of the society; but he has replied to all the soldiers of the army. That reply conveys to all an emphatic testimony of your satisfaction; Dumouriez will share it with all his brethren in arms, for he knows that without them his glory would be as a thing that was not. We must accustom ourselves to this language. Dumouriez has done his duty: in that is his best recompense. It is not because he is a general that I praise him, but because he is a French soldier.

Is it not true, general, that it is glorious to command a republican army?—that thou hast found a material difference between such an army and those of despotism? They have not only bravery, our French—they are not contented with spurning death merely—for, who is there that fears death? But those inhabitants of Lille and Thionville, who await heated balls with calm indifference, who remain unmoved amidst the bursting of shells and the conflagration of their homes—is there not in this the development of all the virtues? Ah, yes! those virtues are superior to all triumphs! A new mode of waging war is now invented, and our enemies will not discover it: tyrants will be powerless for evil so long as there are free men determined upon defence.

A great number of brothers are dead combating for liberty; they are dead, but their memory is dear to us; they have left examples which live in our hearts: but do those live who attacked ? No: they have bit the dust, and their cohorts are but heaps of lifeless bodies, putrefying where they battled; they are but a putrid stench the air of liberty will scarcely purify. That host of strolling skeletons resembles the skeleton of tyranny; and, like it, they will speedily succumb. Where are those veteran generals of high renown? Their shadows vanish before the all-puissant genius of liberty: they fly, and find only dungeons as a retreat; for dungeons will soon be the only palaces of despots: they fly, because nations are arisen.

It is not a king who has named thee, Dumouriez, but thy fellow-citizens. Remember, that a general of the republic must never treat with tyrants; remember, that generals like thee must never serve aught but liberty. Thou hast heard of Themistocles: he had just saved the Greeks by the battle of Salamis; he was calumniated (thou hast enemies, Dumouriez; thou wilt be calumniated; it is therefore I speak to thee): Themistocles was calumniated; he was unjustly condemned by his countrymen; he found an asylum in the abode of tyrants; but he was still Themistocles. He was asked to bear arms against his native land. 'My sword shall never serve tyrants,' he replied, and plunged it in his heart. I remind thee, also, of Scipio. Antiochus strove to seduce that great man by offering to restore him a precious hostage, his own son. Scipio answered, 'Thou hast not wealth enough to buy my conscience, and nature has nothing superior to the love of country.'

Nations are groaning in slavery: thou wilt speedily set them free. How glorious a mission! Success is not doubtful: the citizens who await thee are eager to hail thee; and those who are here urge thee onward. Thou art open to reproach, however, for certain excesses of generosity towards thy foes; thou hast escorted back the King of Prussia a little too much after the French fashion—I mean the old French fashion (applause). But, we will hope, Austria will pay a double penalty: she is opulent; do not spare her; thou canst not make her pay too highly for the outrages her race has inflicted on the human species.

Thou goest to Brussels, Dumouriez (applause); thou wilt pass Courtray. There the French name has been profaned; a general abused the confidence of a nation; the traitor Jarry burned houses. Hitherto I have spoken only to thy courage, now I speak to thy heart. Bear in mind those unfortunate inhabitants of Courtray; belie not their hopes this time; promise them the justice of the nation; the nation will not disavow thee.

When thou art at Brussels—I have nothing to say to thee upon the conduct thou hast to pursue; if thou shouldst find there an execrable woman, who, under the walls of Lille, came to gloat her ferocity with the spectacle of heated balls——but that woman will not wait for thee. If thou shouldst find her, she will be thy prisoner; we have others, also, who are of her stock; thou wilt send her here; let her be so shaved, at least, that a peruke will not again fit her.

At Brussels, liberty is about to revive under thy auspices. An entire people will give way to rapture; thou wilt restore children to their parents, wives to their husbands; the spectacle of their bliss will repay all thy labours. Children, citizens, maidens, matrons, all will press around thee—all will embrace thee as their father! What felicity is in store for thee, Dumouriez! My wife—she is from Brussels; she also will embrace thee."

This discourse was repeatedly interrupted by loud cheers.

Dumourier

Engraved by G. B. Shaw

A Fullarton & C° London & Edinburgh

around thee. What felicity there is in store for thee, Dumouriez! My wife—she is [illegible] she also will embrace thee!"

Danton then left with Dumouriez, whom he had appropriated as it were, and to whom he rendered the honours of the republic. Danton having manifested at Paris a firmness analogous to that of Dumouriez at Sainte-Menehould, they were looked upon as the two saviours of the revolution, and were jointly applauded at all the public places they visited. A certain instinct drew these men together, notwithstanding the discrepancy of their pursuits. They were libertines of the two systems of things, associating from an identical bent and taste for pleasure, but distinct in the order of their corruption. Danton's was that of the people, Dumouriez's that of courts; but more happy than his colleague, the latter had always served in a noble sphere and with arms in his hands, whilst Danton had the misfortune to have sullied a great character by the atrocities of September.

Those brilliant saloons, where celebrated men formerly enjoyed their glory—where, during the last century, Voltaire, Diderot, D'Alembert, Rousseau, were listened to and applauded—such saloons were no longer in existence. There remained the simple and select society of Madame Roland, where all the Girondists assembled—the handsome Barbaroux, the witty Louvet, the grave Buzot, the brilliant Guadet, the captivating Vergniaud; and where still reigned polite language, instructive conversation, and elegant and polished manners. The ministers met there twice in the week, and partook of a repast composed of a single course. Such was the new republican society, which united with the graces of the olden France the seriousness of the modern, and which, alas! was speedily in its turn to disappear before demagogical grossness. Dumouriez was present at one of these simple banquets: at first he felt some constraint at sight of those old friends whom he had chased from the ministry, and of that woman who, in his eyes, was too severe, whilst to her he appeared too licentious; but he sustained the ordeal with his accustomed spirit, and was greatly moved at the unaffected cordiality of Roland. After the society of the Girondists, that of the artists was the only one which had survived the dispersion of the ancient aristocracy. Almost all the artists had warmly embraced a revolution which avenged them for high-born disdain, and which promised distinction to merit and genius alone. They in turn entertained Dumouriez, and gave a feast in his honour, at which were assembled all the talents the metropolis could boast. But in the midst of that same festival, a strange occurrence happened to interrupt its harmony, and excite equal astonishment and disgust.

Marat, always ready to take the initiative in revolutionary doubts, was not satisfied with the general. The furious denouncer of all men enjoying public favour, he had invariably provoked, by his outrageous invectives, the odium incurred by the popular leaders. Mirabeau, Bailly, Lafayette, Pétion, the Girondists, had all been exposed to his abuse even when standing highest in popularity. Since the 10th August more especially, he had given full scope to the monstrous conceptions of his brain; and, although a loathsome object in the eyes of rational and worthy men, and strange at the least in those of heated revolutionists themselves, he had been encouraged by certain evidences of success. Consequently, he soon began to look upon himself as a public man, essential to the new order of things. He passed a great portion of his time in collecting rumours, in diffusing them in his newspaper, and in securing the effects on his self-imposed mission of redressing the wrongs of administrators towards the people. Making the public the confidant of his mode of life, he said one day, in one of his sheets,* that his occupations were overwhelming; that out of the twenty-four hours he [illegible] two to sleep [illegible] concerns; [illegible] duties as a deputy, [illegible] ing and embracing the complaints of [illegible] wretched and oppressed, [illegible] ing hours to perusing and answering [illegible] writing his observations upon events, [illegible] ciations, satisfying himself of the veracity [illegible] ments; finally, in composing his journal [illegible] intending the publication of a great work. For [illegible] years, he said, he had not taken a quarter of [illegible] recreation; and we tremble as we think of what so disturbed an intellect, acting with so inordinate an activity, might produce in a revolution.

Marat pretended to see in Dumouriez only an aristocrat of depraved manners, against whom it was prudent to be on guard. To increase his venom, he learnt that Dumouriez had recently proceeded with the utmost rigour against two battalions of volunteers who had massacred some emigrant deserters. He instantly repaired to the Jacobins', denounced the general from their tribune, and moved that two commissioners be sent to interrogate him on his conduct. To himself were added two persons, named Montaut and Bentabolle; and upon the instant he proceeded on his mission, accompanied by them. Dumouriez was not at his own residence. Marat hastened to various places of amusement, and ultimately learnt that Dumouriez was present at an entertainment given to him by the artists, at the house of Madame Candeille, a celebrated woman of those days. Marat scrupled not to proceed thither, in spite of his filthy dress. The equipages, the detachments of the national guard which he met at the door of the house where the feast was celebrated, the presence of the commander Santerre, and of a great many deputies, and all the manifestations of a festive meeting, aggravated his wrath. He boldly advanced, and requested to see Dumouriez. A sort of rumour arose at his approach. His name being announced, caused a multitude of visages suddenly to disappear, flying, as he said, his accusing glance. Walking directly up to Dumouriez, he loudly called him by name, and demanded an account of the punishment inflicted on the two battalions. The general surveyed him, and said to him with a contemptuous sneer, "Ah! you are he whom they call Marat!" He again examined him from head to foot, and turned his back upon him, without saying another word. However, the Jacobins who accompanied Marat appearing more modest and discreet, Dumouriez vouchsafed certain explanations to them, and dismissed them satisfied. Marat, who was not so, uttered loud cries in the antechambers; upbraided Santerre, who performed, he said, the functions of a lackey to the general; declaimed furiously against the national guards, who contributed to the pomp of the feast; and finally withdrew, threatening with his wrath all the aristocrats present at the entertainment. He ran with all speed to describe in his journal this ridiculous scene, which so admirably depicts the position of Dumouriez, the frenzy of Marat, and the manners of that epoch.*

* Journal of the French Republic, No. [illegible] Wednesday, 9th January 1793.

* ACCOUNT OF THE VISIT WHICH MARAT PAID TO DUMOURIEZ AT THE HOUSE OF MADAME CANDEILLE.

(Extracted from the Journal of the French Republic, and written by Marat himself in his number of Wednesday, 17th October 1792.)

"DECLARATION OF THE FRIEND OF THE PEOPLE.

Less astonished than indignant at seeing old valets of the court—placed, by the result of circumstances, at the head of our armies, and maintained in office since the 10th August by the combined effect of influence, intrigue, and stupidity—[illegible] city to the height of degrading and treating as culprits two patriotic battalions, under the ridiculous, and most probably [illegible], pretext that certain individuals had massacred four Prussian deserters, I presented myself at the tribune of the Jacobins to unmask this odious plot, and to request that two commissioners, distinguished for their civism, might be named to accompany me to Dumouriez's, and be witnesses of his answers

Dumouriez had passed four days at Paris, and during that period had failed to come to an understanding with the Girondists, though he had an intimate friend amongst them in the person of Gensonné. He had simply recommended the latter to reconcile himself with Danton, as the most redoubtable man of the times, and as one who, despite his vices, was fitted to become the most useful to men of probity. Dumouriez had not been more successful with the Jacobins, to whom he had conceived an unalterable repugnance, and by whom he was himself suspected, on account of his supposed friendship with the Girondists. His visit to Paris, therefore, had been of little service to him with regard to the two parties, but of considerable utility in a military point of view.

According to his wonted custom, he had formed a general plan, which was adopted by the executive council. In accordance with this plan, Montesquiou was to maintain himself along the Alps, and make sure of the great chain as a barrier, by completing the conquest of Nice and striving to preserve the Swiss neutrality. Biron was to be reinforced, so that he might guard the Rhine from Basle to Landau. A corps of 12,000 men, under the orders of General Meusnier, was to take up a position in the rear of Custine, in order to cover his communications. Kellermann was to my interrogatories. I repaired to his house with the citizens Bentabole and Montaut, two of my colleagues in the convention, where we were informed he was at the theatre, and intended to sup from home.

We learnt he had left the Variétés; we went to seek him at the club of Cypher D, where we were told he was wont to resort; lost labour. At last we learnt that he was to sup in the Rue Chantereine, in the small house of Talma. A string of carriages and brilliant illuminations pointed out to us the temple where the son of Thalia was regaling the child of Mars. We were surprised to find Parisian national guards within and without. After traversing an antechamber full of domestics, mingled with heiducs, we reached a saloon thronged with a numerous company.

At the door was Santerre, general of the Parisian army, performing the functions of a lackey or usher. He announced me in a loud tone as soon as he perceived me—an indiscretion which greatly displeased me, inasmuch as it might cause certain masks to vanish interesting to recognise. However, I saw enough to thread the labyrinth of intrigue. I will not speak of a dozen fairies destined to grace the festival. Probably, politics were not the objects of their congregating. Nor will I say any thing of the national officers who were paying court to the great general, nor of the old valets of the court who formed his retinue, under the appearance of aides-de-camp. Lastly, I will say nothing of the master of the house, who was in the midst of them habited as a player. But I cannot dispense with declaring, as an elucidation of the operations of the Convention, and as rightly pourtraying the fabricators of decrees, that in the august company were Kersaint, the great operator Lebrun, and Roland, Lasource, Chenier, all organs of the faction of a federal republic; Dulaure and Gorsas, their libellous scouts. As there was a crowd, I only distinguished these conspirators; perhaps they were in greater force; and, as it was still early, it is probable they were not all assembled; for the Vergniauds, the Buzots, the Camusee, the Rabauts, the Lacroixes, the Guadets, the Barbarouxes, and other schemers, were doubtless invited, since they are of the conclave.

Before giving an account of our interview with Dumouriez, I pause for an instant to make, with the judicious reader, some observations which are not out of place. How are we to understand that this generalissimo of the republic, who allowed the King of Prussia to escape at Verdun, and capitulated with the enemy whom he was able to force in his camp and compel to lay down his arms, instead of favouring his retreat, should choose so critical a moment to abandon the armies under his command, to visit theatres, get himself applauded at them, and indulge in orgies at an actor's house with nymphs of the opera?

Dumouriez has concealed the secret motives which called him to Paris, under the pretext of concerting with the ministers a plan for the operations of the campaign. What! with a Roland, a mere scullion and petty intriguer, who is competent only for the crawling subterfuges of falsehood and trickery! with a Lepage, the worthy attendant of Roland, his protector! with a Clavière, who knows nothing but the rubrics of stock-jobbing! with a Garat, who is only versant in choice phrases and the tricks of an academic sneak! I will say nothing of Monge; he is believed a patriot; but he is as ignorant of military operations as his colleagues, who understand nothing of them. Dumouriez is come to consult with the schemers of the clique which cabals for the establishment of a federal republic. Such is the object of his notable prank!

On entering the saloon where the feast was held, I very clearly perceived that my presence disturbed its gaiety; which will not be wondered at when it is considered that I am the terror of the enemies of the country. Dumouriez, in particular, appeared disconcerted; I begged him to retire into another room with us, for the purpose of conversing a few moments in private. I acted as spokesman; and I subjoin our conversation, word for word. 'We are members of the National Convention, and are come, sir, to beg you to give us an explanation as to the nature of the affair of the two battalions, Mauconseil and Republican, accused by you of having assassinated in cold blood four Prussian deserters. We have searched the records of the military committee, and those of the department of war; in them we have not found the slightest proof of the crime; and no person can better inform us concerning all these circumstances than you.' 'Gentlemen, I have sent all the documents to the minister.' 'We assure you, sir, that we have in our hands a memorial drawn up in his office and in his name, purporting that he was entirely without facts to enable him to decide upon this pretended crime, and that we must apply to you to obtain them.' 'But, gentlemen, I have informed the convention, and I refer to it.' 'Permit us, sir, to observe, that the informations given are not sufficient, since the committees of the convention, to which this affair has been remitted, have declared in their report that they were incapable of pronouncing an opinion, from the want of information and proof of the alleged crime. We beg you to tell us whether you are acquainted with the groundwork of the affair.' 'Certainly, of myself.' 'And was it not, then, from a confidential denunciation made to you on the word of M. Duchasseau?' 'But, gentlemen, when I affirm any thing, I think I ought to be believed.' Sir, if we thought on that point like you, we should not prosecute the matter that brings us here. We have good reasons for doubting; several members of the military committee inform us that those pretended Prussians were four French emigrants.'

Well, gentlemen, were it so' —— 'Sir, that would effectually change the features of the case; and, without approving prematurely the conduct of the battalions, they are perhaps completely innocent. The circumstances which provoked the massacre are what it is essential to know: now, letters arrived from the army assert that those emigrants were recognised as spies sent by the enemy, and that they had mutinied against the national guards.' 'How, sir! do you approve then of the insubordination of soldiers?' 'No, sir, I do not approve of the insubordination of soldiers, but I detest the tyranny of officers: I have too good grounds for believing that this was a machination of Duchasseau against the patriot battalions; and the manner in which you have treated them is revolting.' 'Monsieur Marat, you are too vehement; I cannot enter into an explanation with you.' Here Dumouriez, finding himself too closely pressed, got rid of his embarrassment by leaving us; my two colleagues followed him, and in the conversation they had with him, he contented himself with saying that he had sent the documents to the minister. During their interview, I saw myself encompassed by all the aides-du-camp of Dumouriez and the officers of the Parisian guard. Santerre endeavoured to appease me; he spoke to me of the necessity of subordination amongst troops. 'I know that as well as you,' I answered; 'but I feel abhorrence at the manner in which the soldiers of the country are treated. I still bear in my heart the massacres of Nanci and of the Champ de Mars.' Here some aides-du-camp of Dumouriez began to declaim against agitators. 'Cease those ridiculous tirades,' I exclaimed: 'there are no agitators in our armies but the infamous officers, their spies and perfidious parasites, whom we have had the folly to leave at the head of our troops.' I addressed myself to Moreton Chabrillant and Bourdoin, the one an old valet of the court, and the other a spy of Lafayette.

I was indignant at all I had heard, at the conviction on my mind of the atrocities in the odious conduct of our generals. Unable any longer to contain myself, I quitted the party, and I beheld with astonishment in the adjoining room, the doors of which were open, several of Dumouriez's heiduks with naked swords at their shoulders. I know not what might be the object of this ridiculous parade: if it were intended to intimidate me, it must be allowed the valets of Dumouriez have sublime ideas of liberty. Have patience, gentlemen, we will teach you to understand it. In the meantime, be sure that your master has wholesome dread of the tip of my pen than I have fear for the sabres of his ruffians."

ordered to quit his quarters, pass rapidly between Luxumbourg and Treves to Coblentz, and thus execute what had been already urged upon him, and what he and Custine ought to have performed before. Lastly, assuming the offensive himself 80,000 men, Dumouriez was to round the French territory by the long-projected acquisition of Belgium. Thus, observing the defensive on all the frontiers protected by the nature of the ground, attack was to be risked only on the open frontier, that of the Low Countries, where, as Dumouriez said, France could only defend herself by gaining battles.

Through the credit of Santerre he succeeded in obtaining an abandonment of the absurd scheme of a camp below Paris; furthermore, that all the collections made in men, artillery, munitions, and camp equipments, should be transported into Flanders for the advantage of his army, which was in the greatest want; and that there should be added shoes, cloaks, and six millions in specie, to furnish the soldiers with money until their arrival in the Low Countries, after which he hoped to provide for himself. He departed on the 16th October, somewhat undeceived as to what is called public gratitude, rather less in harmony than before with the two parties, and simply indemnified for his journey by certain military arrangements concluded with the executive council.

During this interval, the convention had continued to act against the commune, by insisting upon its re-election, and by keeping a strict watch over all its proceedings. Pétion had been chosen mayor by a majority of 13,899 votes; whilst Robespierre had only obtained 23, Billaud-Varennes 14, Panis 80, and Danton 11. We must not, however, estimate the comparative popularity of Robespierre and Petion by this difference in the number of votes; because the people were accustomed to see in the one a mayor, in the other a deputy, and had no idea of altering their respective positions: at the same time, this immense majority demonstrates the popularity still enjoyed by the principal leader of the Girondist party. We ought not to omit the fact that Bailly obtained two votes, a singular memento accorded to that virtuous magistrate of 1789. Pétion refused the mayoralty, wearied with the commotions in the commune, and preferring the functions of a deputy in the National Convention.

The three principal measures projected in the famous sitting of the 24th September were—a law against provocations to murder; a decree upon the formation of a departmental guard; and, lastly, an exact account of the state of Paris. The two first, intrusted for preparation to the committee of nine, excited a continual outcry at the Jacobins', at the commune, and in the sections. The committee of nine, however, proceeded in their labours, regardless of these clamours; and from various departments, especially from Marseilles and Calvados, battalions arrived spontaneously, thus anticipating the decree on the departmental guard, as had occurred on another occasion previous to the 10th August. Roland, charged with the third measure, that is to say, the report upon the state of the capital, executed his task without shrinking, and with rigorous accuracy. He described and excused the inevitable confusion of the first insurrection; but he pourtrayed, with energy and held up to execration the crimes added by the 2d September to the revolution of the 10th August; he exhibited all the excesses of the commune, its abuses of power, its arbitrary imprisonments, and its vast spoliations. He concluded with these words:—

"A department sagacious but almost powerless; a commune active and despotic; a people excellent, but of whom the sound part is intimid[illegible] strained, whilst the other is stimulated [illegible] and exasperated by calumnious charges; a [illegible] of powers; an abuse and contempt of authority; a public force weak or null from an inefficient command—such is Paris!"*

His report was applauded by the usual majority, [illegible] numerous benches from the quarter of [illegible] However, a letter written by a private individual to a magistrate, communicated by that magistrate to the executive council, and unfolding the project of a new 2d of September against a part of the convention, excited an extraordinary agitation. An expression in this letter, relative to the conspirators, was thus couched: "They will hear only of Robespierre." At this phrase, all eyes were turned upon that deputy; some glowed with indignation, others encouraged him to speak. He addressed the convention, in fact, on the question of printing Roland's report, which he stigmatised as a defamatory romance; and he maintained that it ought not to be made public until those who were therein accused, and himself particularly, had been heard in refutation. Then diverging to what was personal to himself, he began a justification, which was almost wholly inaudible, on account of the noise prevailing in the hall. "Go on," said Danton to him—"speak; there are good citizens here listening to thee." Robespierre, succeeding at length in obtaining silence, recommenced his exculpation, and defied his adversaries to accuse him openly, or to produce a single positive proof against him. At this defiance, Louvet sprang forward: "I," said he to him—"I accuse thee!" And as he uttered these words he was already at the foot of the tribune, and Barbaroux and Rebecqui were with him to support the accusation. When he saw them, Robespierre was moved, and his countenance underwent a visible alteration; he requested that his accuser might be heard, and then himself in reply. But Danton, taking his place in the tribune, protested against the system of calumny organised against the commune and the Parisian deputation; and reiterated concerning Marat, who was the chief cause of all accusations, what he had already declared, to the effect that he had no esteem for him; that he had made sufficient trial of his volcanic and unsociable temperament; and that all idea of a triumviral coalition was absurd. He concluded by moving that a day be fixed for the discussion of the report. The assembly, meanwhile, decreed its publication, but deferred its transmission to the departments until Louvet and Robespierre had been heard.

Louvet was impetuous and full of courage; his patriotism was sincere; but into his hatred against Robespierre entered the resentful feelings engendered by a long course of personal hostility, commencing at the Jacobins', continued in the Sentinel, prolonged in the electoral assembly, and increased in virulence, since he found himself face to face with his jealous rival in the National Convention. To an extreme petulance of character, Louvet joined a romantic and credulous fancy, which perpetually misled him, and induced him to believe in designs and plots when the causes were but the involuntary effects of passion. He gave unlimited faith to his own suppositions, and was urgent with his friends to accord them the same implicit credit. But he encountered, in the dispassionate and excellent sense of Pétion and Roland, in the indolent impartiality of Vergniaud, an opposition which afflicted him to despair. Buzot, Barbaroux, Guadet, without equal credulity, without equal belief in such complicated schemes, deemed the wickedness of their adversaries undoubted, and seconded the attacks of Louvet from the impulses of indignation and courage. Salles, deputy of La Meurthe, a [illegible] mined foe to anarchists in the Constituent [illegible] and in the convention, a man possessed of a [illegible] and violent cast of mind, was alone open to [illegible] of Louvet, and put faith, like him, in vast [illegible] ating in the commune, and extending to other countries. For, impassioned lovers of liberty, Louvet and Salles could not consent to charge such [illegible] litifarious evils on its sacred name, but fondly believed that the Mountaineers, Marat above all, were bribed by the emigrants and England to drive the revolution to crime, dishonour, and general confusion. Not so certain of Robespierre's venalty, they saw in him, at all events, a tyrant engrossed by pride and ambition, and proceeding with rapid strides to supreme power.

* Sitting of the 29th October.

Louvet, having previously formed the resolution to make a vigorous assault on Robespierre, and to afford him no interval of rest, held his speech ready written, and was armed with it the very day on which Roland was to make his report; consequently, he was all prepared to support his accusation when leave was given him to speak. He immediately availed himself of the permission, when Roland had concluded.

The Girondists had been long ago sufficiently prone to misconceive the nature of circumstances, and to presume criminal projects in the outbreaks of wayward passion; but to the sanguine Louvet the conspiracy was palpable, its parts most closely knitted. In the increasing exaggeration of the Jacobins, in the success with which the morose reserve of Robespierre had been crowned during the course of 1792, he perceived a plot distinctly developed, emanating from that ambitious tribune. He exhibited him as surrounded by satellites, to whose violence he abandoned his antagonists; as rendering himself the object of an idolatrous regard—spreading, through his emissaries, before the 10th August, the persuasion that he alone was competent to save liberty and France; and when the 10th August came, hiding himself from the light; re-appearing two days after the danger was past; proceeding straightway to the commune, notwithstanding his pledge never to accept office, and, of his plenary authority, seating himself at the table of the council-general; there, usurping sway over an inconsiderate assemblage of petty tradesmen, impelling them at his will to excesses of the most hateful character; appearing in their name before the Legislative Assembly, with insolent effrontery, and exacting decrees from that national body under threats of the tocsin; ordaining, without being seen, the massacres and thefts of September, with the view of supporting the municipal authority by terror; and, finally, sending emissaries throughout all France to instigate the like crimes, and induce the provinces to acknowledge the superior authority of Paris. Robespierre, added Louvet, was solicitous to destroy the national representation for the purpose of putting in its place the commune, which hung upon his nod, and imposing upon France the government of Rome, where, under the appellation of municipia, the provinces were subject to the sovereignty of the metropolis. Thus master of Paris, and it the mistress of France, he would have stepped upon the vacant throne. Seeing, however, the moment drawing nigh for the meeting of a new assembly, he had passed from the council-general to the electoral assembly, and controlled its nominations by the force of terror, in order to become master of the convention through the deputation of Paris.

It was he, Robespierre, who had pointed out to the electors that man of blood whose incendiary placards filled France with amazement and consternation. That libellist, with whose name Louvet said he would not sully his lips, was but the scapegoat of assassination, possessing, for the avocations of preaching crime and traducing the purest characters, a courage which was wanting to the wily Robespierre. As to Danton, Louvet separated him from the accusation, and even expressed his astonishment that he should have hastened to the tribune to repel an attack not directed against him. He did not, however, exculpate him from September, because, during those mournful days, when all the authorities—the assembly, the ministers, the mayor—spoke in vain to stop the slaughter, the minister of justice alone spoke not; because, in short, he only was excepted from the calumnies spread against the most virtuous citizens in the famous placards. "And may thou be able, oh Danton!" exclaimed Louvet, "to clear thyself from that disgraceful exception in the judgment of posterity!" Much applause greeted these words, equally spirited and imprudent.

Louvet's charge, constantly applauded at particular passages, had not been heard, however, without many counter murmurs; but an expression frequently repeated during the sitting had checked them. "Secure me silence," said Louvet to the president, "for I am about to probe the wound, and may draw shrieks!" "Proceed," said Danton; "probe the wound." And every time murmurs arose, "Silence!" was shouted—"silence to the wounded!"

Louvet at length resumed his charge. "Robespierre!" he exclaimed, "I accuse thee of having traduced the purest citizens, and of having done so at the moment when calumnies were proscriptions; I accuse thee of having paraded thyself as an object of idolatry, and disseminated the impression that thou wert the only man capable of saving France; I accuse thee of having degraded, insulted, and persecuted the national representation, of having tyrannised over the electoral assembly of Paris, and of having advanced to supreme power by the ways of calumny, violence, and terror; and I demand a committee to examine thy conduct." Louvet then proposed a law condemning to exile whomsoever should have made his name a subject of discord amongst the citizens. He urged that, to the measures in preparation by the commission of nine, an additional reference should be made, namely, to devise a plan for placing the armed force at the disposition of the minister of the interior. "In conclusion," said he, "I crave upon the instant a decree of impeachment against Marat! Ye gods! ye gods! I have named him!"

Robespierre, dismayed at the acclamations lavished on his adversary, essayed to speak. Amidst the uproar and murmurs excited by his appearance, he faltered, his features and his voice became agitated; however, he obtained a hearing, and asked for time to prepare his defence. The delay was granted him, and the question adjourned to the 5th November. This resolution was favourable to the accused, for, excited by the eloquence of Louvet, the assembly felt at that moment an indignation it would have been difficult to allay.

In the evening, great was the commotion at the Jacobin Club, where the sittings of the convention were freely criticised. A crowd of members rushed incontinently to descant upon the horrible conduct of Louvet, and to demand his expulsion. He had calumniated the society, and inculpated Danton, Santerre, Robespierre, and Marat; he had demanded an impeachment against the two last; proposed sanguinary laws—shackles on the liberty of the press; and, in short, the ostracism of Athens. Legendre said it was a studied plot, since Louvet had his discourse all ready, and Roland's report had very obviously been framed with no other object than to furnish an occasion for that diatribe.

Fabre-d'Eglantine complained that the system of scandal was daily augmenting, and that every effort was made to calumniate Paris and the patriots. "Petty conjectures," said he, "are linked to trivial suppositions; thence is conjured up a vast conspiracy, and we are told neither where it is, who are its agents, nor what its means. If there were a man who had seen all, appreciated all in both the one and the other party, you cannot doubt that such a man, the friend of truth, would be the fittest to make it known. Such a man, then, is Pétion. Force his virtue to reveal all that he [illegible]een, and to pronounce upon the crimes imputed to the patriots. Whatever consideration he may have for his friends, I venture to say that the intriguers have not corrupted him. Pétion is always disinterested and sincere; he would have spoken to-day; force him, then, to declare himself."*

* Pétion must be classed a [illegible] the coolest and most dispassionate characters of the [illegible] None judged with a

Merlin opposed the suggestion that Pétion should be constituted judge between Robespierre and Louvet, on the ground that it was a violation of equality thus to render a citizen the supreme arbiter of others. He alleged, furthermore, that although Pétion was undoubtedly worthy of respect, he might possibly de-more sagacious eye the two parties who divided the convention. His equity was so well known, that both sides consented to appeal to his decision. The accusations which were made from the opening of the assembly provoked warm discussions at the Jacobins'. Fabre-d'Eglantine proposed to refer all disputes to Pétion, and abide his judgment. The following is the manner in which he expressed himself:—

SITTING OF THE 29TH OCTOBER 1792.

"There is another mode which I deem advisable, and which will produce a great effect. Almost invariably, when a vast intrigue is in agitation, it stands in need of influence, and is driven to the greatest exertions to procure a personal credit. If there existed a man who had seen all, appreciated all in both parties, you cannot doubt that such a man, the friend of truth, would be the fittest to make it known. Now, I propose that you invite this man, a member of your society, to pronounce respecting the crimes imputed to the patriots—force his virtue to reveal all that he has seen: this man is Pétion. Whatever consideration he may have for his friends, I venture to say that the intriguers have not corrupted Pétion; he is still pure, always sincere. I here state that I often speak to him, in the convention, during moments of excitement; and if he does not always tell one that he groans, I see that he groans inwardly; this morning even he would have mounted the tribune. He cannot decline your request to write what he thinks, and we shall see whether, although it is I who urge recourse to him, the intriguers can sway him. Observe, citizens, this single step will prove that you only desire truth; it is a tribute that you render to the virtue of a good patriot, and with the greater cause, since the liars have wrapped themselves in his virtue to attain eminence. I demand that the motion be put to the vote." (Applause.)

Legendre.—"The stroke was meditated, that is clear. The distribution of Brissot's speech, the report of the minister of the interior, the oration of Louvet in his pocket—all prove that the attack was studied. The speech of Brissot upon the expulsion contains all that Louvet said; the report of Roland was to furnish Louvet with an opportunity of speaking. I approve of Fabre's motion, but the convention will shortly decide: Robespierre has the tribune for Monday. I move that the society suspend its decision: it is impossible that in a free country virtue should succumb to vice."

After these quotations, I deem it proper to transcribe the document written by Pétion relative to the dispute at issue between Louvet and Robespierre. After the extracts taken from Garat, it contains the most invaluable information upon the conduct and character of the men of that day, and such as history ought to preserve as the fittest to convey just ideas upon the epoch under review:—

"Citizens—I promised myself to observe the strictest silence upon the events which have occurred since the 10th August: motives of delicacy and of public good determined me to use that reserve.

But it impossible to be longer silent. On both sides my testimony is invoked; each presses me to deliver my opinion: I will therefore speak with frankness what I know concerning men, what I think concerning things.

I have beheld the scenes of the revolution near at hand; I have witnessed the cabals, the intrigues, the stormy contentions between tyranny and liberty, between vice and virtue.

When the play of human passions is laid bare; when a man perceives the secret springs which have regulated the most important operations; when he traces events to their causes; when he knows all the perils that liberty has incurred; when he has penetrated into the depths of that corruption which threatened every moment to engulf us, he asks himself with amazement by what series of prodigies we have reached the point at which we now find ourselves.

Revolutions should be seen from a distance; that illusion is necessary to them: ages efface the blemishes that darken them; posterity considers only the results. Our grandsons will deem us great; let us render them better than ourselves.

I pass over the facts anterior to that day for ever memorable, which elevated liberty upon the ruins of tyranny, and changed a monarchy into a republic.

The men who have assumed to themselves the glory of that day are the men to whom it least belongs: it is due to those who concerted it; it is due to the inevitable nature of things; it is due to the brave federalists and their secret directory, who long before arranged the plan of the insurrection; it is due to the people; it is due, in fine, to the tutelary genius which has constantly presided over the destinies of France since the first assembly of its representatives!

It must be granted, success was for a moment doubtful; and those who are truly informed of the details of that day, know who were the intrepid defenders of the country that prevented the Swiss and the other satellites of despotism from remaining masters of the field of battle—who those were that rallied our citizen phalanxes when for an instant broken.

That day likewise occurred without the aid of the commissioners of several sections assembled at the common hall: the members of the old municipality, who had not moved during the night, were still sitting at half-past nine in the morning.

Those commissioners nevertheless conceived a grand idea, and adopted a bold measure, when they seized upon all the municipal powers, and took the place of a council-general whose weakness and corruption they feared; they courageously exposed their lives in case success had not sanctified the enterprise.

If those commissioners had had the wisdom to lay down their authority at the proper time, and return to the grade of simple citizens after the admirable action they had performed, they would have covered themselves with glory; but they could not resist the attractions of power, and the thirst of dominion seized upon them.

During the first moments of rapture after the conquest of liberty, and after a commotion so violent, it was impossible that all things should resolve again at once into the accustomed calmness and order; it would have been unjust to insist upon it. At that time the reproaches addressed to the new council of the commune were not well founded: in them neither its position nor the circumstances of the time were appreciated; but those commissioners began to merit them when they themselves prolonged the revolutionary movement beyond its term.

The national assembly had shown itself equal to the crisis: it had taken a decisive part; had passed decrees which saved the empire, had suspended the king, had blotted out the line of demarcation which severed the citizens into two classes, and had convoked the convention. The royalist party was annihilated. Thenceforth the assembly ought to have been supported, strengthened in public opinion, regarded with generous confidence: this duty and sound policy alike counselled.

The commune deemed it more becoming to enter into rivalry with the assembly. It provoked a contest which was only calculated to throw discredit upon all that had passed, and to inculcate the belief that the assembly was under the irresistible pressure of circumstances: it obeyed or resisted the decrees, precisely as they promoted or thwarted its own views; it employed in its representations to the legislative body imperious and irritating expressions; it affected supremacy, and knew not either how to enjoy its triumphs or how to make others pardon them.

The majority had succeeded in persuading some of its members that so long as the revolutionary state of things continued, power had reverted to its source; that the national assembly was in abeyance, that its existence was precarious, and that the assemblies of the commune were the sole legitimate and efficient authorities.

It had poisoned others with the belief that the leaders of opinion in the national assembly had perfidious projects, and were plotting to overthrow liberty and deliver the republic to foreigners.

Insomuch that many members of the council conceived they were acting upon a legitimate right when they usurped authority; that they were resisting oppression when they opposed the law; that they were performing an act of civism when they failed in their duties as citizens. Nevertheless, in the midst of this anarchy, the commune adopted from time to time salutary resolutions.

I had been retained in my office; but it had become an empty title: I essayed its functions in vain; they were scattered amongst all, and every one exercised them.

I repaired to the council during the first few days: I was amazed at the disorder which prevailed in that assembly, and especially at the spirit predominant in it. It was no longer an administrative body, deliberating upon municipal affairs; it was a political assembly, deeming itself invested with plenary powers, discussing the great interests of the state, examining existing laws, and promulgating new ones: its members descanted upon plots against public liberty; they denounced citizens, summoned them to the bar, interrogated them publicly, passed judgment upon them, discharging them as absolved or ordering them into custody. The ordinary rules had disappeared; the ferment of viate; that he was a man, the friend of Brissot and Roland, and received at his house Lasource, Vergniaud, Barbaroux, and all the intriguers who compromised liberty.

The motion of Fabre-d'Eglantine was not pressed; and Robespierre the younger, assuming a lamentable tone, as the relatives of those on trial were wont to do at Rome, gave vent to his grief, and sorely complained minds was such that it was impossible to stem the torrent: all the deliberations were carried on with the impetuosity of enthusiasm, and succeeded each other with startling rapidity: day and night, without intermission, the council held its sittings.

I was unwilling that my name should be attached to a multitude of measures so irregular—so contrary to all principles.

I was likewise sensible that prudence and duty equally counselled me not to sanction or strengthen by my presence what was passing. Those of the council who feared to see me there, those whom my presence troubled, strongly desired that the people, whose confidence I preserved, should believe that I presided over its operations, and that nothing was done but in concert with me: my reserve in that respect increased their enmity, but they dared not manifest it too openly, from a dread of displeasing the people, whose favour they courted.

I rarely appeared; and the conduct I observed in this highly delicate position, between the old municipality, which exclaimed against its deprivation, and the new, which proclaimed itself legally constituted, was not without utility to the public tranquillity; for, if I had then decidedly pronounced for or against, I should have occasioned an exasperation that might have been attended with disastrous consequences. In all things there is a point of maturity which it devolves on men to seize with judgment.

The administration was neglected; the mayor was no longer a centre of union; all the threads were snapped in my hands; power was scattered; the function of superintendence was extinct, and so also was that of repression.

Robespierre then took the ascendant in the council; and it could scarcely be otherwise under the circumstances then existing, and from the character of his mind. I heard him pronounce a discourse which afflicted my heart; it was on the subject of the decree opening the barriers, and on this topic he gave way to declamations extremely animated—to the delusions of a gloomy imagination; he perceived precipices beneath his feet, plots against liberty; he pourtrayed the pretended conspirators; he addressed himself to the people, inflamed their minds, and caused, amongst all who heard him, the greatest excitement.

I replied to that discourse with the view of restoring calmness, dissipating those sombre illusions, and bringing back the discussion to the only point competent for the assembly to entertain.

Robespierre and his partisans thus drew the commune into inconsiderate measures—into extreme positions.

I did not suspect on that account the intentions of Robespierre; I accused his head more than his heart; but the consequences of those gloomy visions did not cause me the less alarm.

Every day the tribunes of the council rung with violent diatribes; the members were unable to understand they were magistrates charged to watch over the execution of the laws and the maintenance of order; they always viewed themselves as forming a revolutionary association.

The assembled sections imbibed that doctrine, and communicated it in turn; so that all Paris was simultaneously in fermentation.

The surveillance committee of the commune stocked the prisons: it cannot be denied that, if several of those arrests were just and necessary, others infringed legality But the leaders were less to blame than the agents: the police was badly organised: one man amongst others, whose very name is become a reproach, the bare mention of which strikes terror to the hearts of all peaceable citizens, seemed to have seized upon its direction and its movements: constant at all conferences, he intermeddled in all affairs; he spoke, he commanded in the tone of a master: I loudly complained of him to the commune, and I summed up my opinion in these words, 'Marat is either the most insensate or the most wicked of mortals.' I have never spoken of him since.

Justice was deliberate in pronouncing upon the fate of the prisoners, and they accumulated more and more in the jails. A section came as a deputation to the council of the commune on the 23d of August, and formally declared that the citizens, weary and indignant at the delays in rendering judgment, would force the gates of those asylums, and sacrifice to their vengeance the culprits they contained. This petition, couched in the most furious terms, met with no censure—it even received applause!

On the 25th, from 1000 to 1200 armed citizens departed from Paris to carry off the state-prisoners detained at Orleans, and [illegible] tidings arrived to add still more to the agitation: the treason of Longwy was announced, and a few days afterwards the siege of Verdun.

On the 27th, the National Assembly invited the department of Paris and those in the vicinity to furnish 30,000 armed men to fly to the frontiers: this decree imparted an additional impulse, which combined with those already existing.

On the 31st, the acquittal of Montmorin exasperated the people; a rumour spread that he had been saved by the perfidy of an emissary of the king, who had led the jury astray.

At the same moment, publicity was given to the statement of a condemned captive, revealing a plot for the escape of all the prisoners, who were afterwards to spread themselves through the city, commit every variety of excess, and carry off the king.

The ferment was at its height. The commune, in order to stimulate the enthusiasm of the citizens, and urge them to the civic enrolments, had decreed they should assemble with ceremony on the Champ de Mars to the firing of cannon.

The 2d of September arrives; the alarm gun is fired; the tocsin is rung. Oh! day of sorrow!—At that mournful and alarming sound, they assemble, rush to the prisons—murder, massacre! Manuel, and several deputies of the national assembly, repair to those scenes of carnage; but their efforts are in vain—the victims are slain even in their arms! Alas! I was in a false security; I knew not of these cruelties, since for some time previously nothing was ever mentioned to me. I am apprised of them at length, and how?—in a vague, indirect, distorted manner; and at the same time it is told to me that all was finished. The most heart-rending details subsequently reach me, and I had the most positive conviction that the sun which had lighted these dismal scenes would never rise again. In the mean time they continue: I write to the commander-in-chief—I require him to march forces to the prisons: he at first gives me no answer; I write again. He tells me he has given orders; nothing shows that those orders are in course of execution. They still continue: I go to the council of the commune; thence I proceed to the prison of La Force, with several of my colleagues. Citizens comparatively peaceable crowd the street leading to that prison; a very small guard was at the gate. I enter. Never will the spectacle that met my eyes be effaced from my mind! I perceive two municipal officers wearing their scarfs; I see three men tranquilly sitting before a table, the prison registers lying open before them, calling over the roll of captives; other men interrogating them, and others again performing the functions of judges and jurymen; a dozen of executioners, with naked arms, covered with blood, some with clubs, others with swords and cutlasses, all dripping with gore, executing the judgments on the instant; citizens outside awaiting those judgments with anxious impatience, observing a mournful silence at the decrees of death, uttering cries of joy at those of pardon.

And the men who were sitting in judgment, and those executing their fiats, had the same feeling of security as if the law had called upon them to perform such functions. They boasted to me of their justice, of their care in discriminating between the innocent and the guilty, and of the services they had rendered. They asked—can it be believed?—they asked to be remunerated for the time they had thus passed! I was absolutely confounded when I heard them!

I spoke to them in the austere language of the law—I spoke to them with the feeling of deep indignation which stirred within me: I made them go out before me. I had scarcely left ere they returned: I was again upon the spot to drive them forth; but in the night they accomplished their horrible butchery!

Were these assassinations commanded—were they directed by certain persons? I have had lists before me, I have received reports, I have collected several facts; but if I had to pronounce as a judge, I could not say, Behold the guilty!

I am of opinion that those crimes would not have run so free a course if endeavours had been made to check them—if all those exercising authority and force had viewed them with horror; but I am bound to state what is true: several of those public men, of those defenders of the country, deemed those disastrous and disgraceful days necessary; holding that they purged the empire of dangerous men, struck terror into the souls of conspirators, and, in short, were crimes, odious in morality, but useful in policy.

Yes, such were the ideas that slackened the zeal of those to whom the law had confided the maintenance of order, and to whom it had intrusted the defence of persons and property.

that he was not calumniated like his brother. "This moment," said he, "is one pregnant with danger; all the people are not for us. The citizens of Paris alone are sufficiently enlightened; the others are so but imperfectly. It is possible, therefore, that innocence may succumb on Monday!—for the convention has heard at full length the amplified lies of Louvet. Citizens, I have had a terrible vision: it seemed to me that assassins were on the point of stabbing my brother. have heard men say that he should perish by their hands only; another told me he hoped to be his executioner." At these words, several members rose and declared that they also had been menaced, particularly by Barbaroux, Rebecqui, and several citizens in the galleries; that those who threatened them said, "Robespierre and Marat must be got rid of." They then crowded round the younger Robespierre, promised him to watch over the safety of his brother, and unanimously agreed that those who had friends or relatives in the departments should write to them, in order to give opinion its fitting bias. The younger Robespierre, before quitting the tribune, took the opportunity of uttering a calumny. Anarcharsis Clootz, he said, had assured him he daily broke lances against federalism at the house of Roland.

The fiery Chabot came in his turn. What chiefly irritated him in Louvet's speech was, that he attributed the 10th August to himself and his friends, and the 2d September to two hundred assassins. "I remember," said Chabot, "that I addressed the gentlemen of the right side on the evening of the 9th August, proposing to them the insurrection, and that they replied to me by a smile from the corner of their mouths. I do not see, therefore, with what right they take to themselves the 10th August. As to the 2d September, its authors were the same people who accomplished the 10th August in spite of them, and who, after the victory, determined on avenging themselves. Louvet said there were not two hundred assassins; and I assert that I passed with the commissioners of the legislative body under an arch of ten thousand sabres. I recognised upwards of one hundred and fifty federalists. There are no crimes in revolutions. Marat, so incessantly accused, is attacked for revolutionary deeds alone. To-day Marat, Danton, Robespierre, are accused; to-morrow it will be Santerre, Chabot, Merlin," &c.

Excited by these audacious words, a federalist present at the sitting did what no man had yet dared publicly do—he declared that he acted with a great number of his comrades at the prisons, and under the persuasion that he was only slaying conspirators, fabricators of false assignats, and rescuing Paris from fire and slaughter. He added, that he was grateful to the society for the kindness it had manifested to all the federalists; that they departed the next day for the army, and carried with them but one regret, namely, that of leaving the patriots in such imminent perils.

This abominable declaration closed the sitting. Robespierre had not appeared, nor did he appear during the whole week, being engaged in preparing his defence, and leaving to his partisans the task of disposing the public mind. In the mean time, the commune of Paris persisted in its conduct and system. It was stated that it had seized ten millions in the chest of Septeuil, the treasurer of the civil list; and at this very period it was urging a petition upon the [illegible]eight sections or municipalities against the [illegible] giving a guard to the convention. Barbaroux [illegible]

How these days of the 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th of September may be connected with the immortal 10th of August—how they may be held a continuation of the revolutionary movement imparted upon that day, the first in the annals of the republic—is sufficiently palpable. For my part, however, I cannot consent to confound glory with infamy, and to defile the 10th August with the excesses of the 2d September.

The committee of surveillance issued a warrant of arrest against the minister Roland: it was the 4th, and the massacre still went on. Danton heard of the warrant; he came to the town-hall; he saw Robespierre, remonstrated with warmth against so arbitrary and insane an act, which would have injured, not Roland, but those who had decreed it. Danton procured its revocation, and it was buried in oblivion.

I had an explanation with Robespierre; it was very serious: I have always made reproaches to his face, which friendship has tempered in his absence. I said to him, 'Robespierre, you do much mischief! Your denunciations, your alarms, your hatreds, your suspicions, keep the people for ever in agitation. But at length explain yourself: have you any facts, have you any proofs? I am fighting along with you; I desire truth alone; I want only liberty.'

'You allow yourself to be ensnared—to be prepossessed,' he answered me: 'they prejudice you against me; you see my enemies every day—you see Brissot and his party.'

'You are deceived, Robespierre; no person is more on his guard against prepossessions, or judges men and things more dispassionately. It is true I see Brissot; rarely, however: but you do not know him, and I have known him from boyhood; I have seen him in those moments when the mind fully displays itself—when it abandons itself without reserve to friendship and confidence: I know his disinterestedness; I know his principles—I protest to you they are pure. Those who represent him as the leader of a party have not the slightest knowledge of his character. He has talents and accomplishments; but he has neither the reserve, nor the dissimulation, nor those winning manners, nor that spirit of pertinacity, which are essential to the leader of a party; and what will more surprise you is, that so far from leading others he is very easily misled himself.'

Robespierre persisted, but intrenching himself in generalities. 'For pity's sake,' said I to him, 'explain yourself; tell me frankly what you have on your mind—what you know.'

'Well, then,' he answered me, 'I believe that Brissot is sold to Brunswick.'

'How great is your mistake!' I exclaimed; 'it is absolute folly; how your imagination blinds you! Would not Brunswick be the first to cut off his head? Brissot is not such a fool as to doubt it. Which of us can seriously think of capitulating?—which of us risk his life? Let us banish unjust suspicions!'

I return to the events of which I have given you a feeble outline. Those events, and some that preceded the celebrated day of the 10th August, the connexion of facts and of numberless portents, induced the belief that certain intriguers had designed to possess the people, in order, with the people, to possess themselves of authority. Robespierre was distinctly alluded to; his connexions were reviewed, his conduct was analysed; the words which it is said escaped one of his friends were adduced; and from the whole it was concluded that Robespierre had the insane ambition to become the dictator of his country.

The character of Robespierre explains what he has done. Robespierre is extremely reserved and distrustful; he every where descries plots, treasons, precipices; his jaundiced temperament, his morbid imagination, present all objects to him under the gloomiest colours: overbearing in his opinion, listening only to himself, impatient of contradiction, incapable of pardoning him who wounds his self-love, or of ever acknowledging his errors; denouncing with recklessness, wrathful upon the slightest suspicion, always imagining that others are occupied with him, and for the purpose of persecuting him; boasting of his services, and speaking of himself with little delicacy; disregarding the rules of decorum, and thereby injuring the very causes he advocates; striving above all things to gain the favour of the people; paying court to them unceasingly, and seeking their applause with affected preference—this last weakness it is, more especially, which, ingrafted on all the acts of his public life, has strengthened the supposition that Robespierre aspires to high destinies, and aims at usurping the dictatorial power.

For myself, I cannot persuade myself that this chimera has seriously occupied his thoughts, or has been the object of his desires—the goal of his ambition.

There is a man, however, who has grown delirious with this phantasy—who has incessantly invoked a dictatorship over France as a mercy—as the only dispensation which can save us from the anarchy he preaches, and conduct us to liberty and happiness! He solicits this tyrannical power—and for whom? You will never divine; you know not sufficiently all the frenzy of his vanity: he solicits it for himself! yes, for himself—Marat! If his madness were not ferocious, there would be nothing so ridiculous as this being, upon whom nature seems to have wittingly set the mark of her reprobation."

diately proposed four energetic and ably devised decrees.

By the first, the capital was to lose the right of having the national representation held within its walls, when it should be unable to protect it from insults or violence.

By the second, the federalists and the national gendarmes were, concurrently with the armed sections of Paris, to guard the national representation and the public establishments.

By the third, the convention was to resolve itself into a court of justice to try conspirators.

By the fourth, the convention dissolved the municipality of Paris.

These four decrees were perfectly adapted to the circumstances, and appropriately fitted to meet the actual dangers of the moment; but all the power was needed to pass them which would have resulted from the decrees themselves. To create the means of energy, energy itself is requisite; and every moderate party attempting to keep a violent party in check, is in a baneful entanglement from which it never can get free. Doubtless, the majority, leaning towards the Girondists, might have passed the decrees; but it was its moderation which induced its bias in their favour, and that moderation counselled it to wait, to temporise, to rest upon the future, and to shun every measure too prematurely decisive. The assembly even rejected a decree infinitely less offensive, namely, the first of those which had been remitted for preparation to the committee of nine. It referred to instigators of murder and pillage; and Buzot introduced it. By the enactment as proposed, all direct instigation was punished with death, and indirect provocation with ten years in irons. The assembly found the punishment too severe on direct instigation, and indirect too vaguely defined and too difficult to reach. Buzot vainly argued that revolutionary, and consequently arbitrary, measures were indispensable against the adversaries the republic had to combat; he was not heeded, and could scarcely be so when addressing a majority which condemned in the violent party those very revolutionary measures, and which was consequently, to a certain extent, debarred from employing them against it. The decree was accordingly deferred; and the committee of nine, appointed to advise on the means of maintaining wholesome order, became to all efficient purposes null and void.

The assembly, however, exhibited a somewhat greater degree of energy in reference to the question of repressing the encroachments of the commune. It then seemed to defend its authority with a species of jealousy and vigour. The council-general of the commune, ordered to the bar on account of the petition against the project of a departmental guard, appeared to justify itself. It was no longer, it said, the commune of the 10th August. Certain prevaricators had crept in amongst its members, whom good reasons had existed for denouncing; but such men were no longer to be found at its board. "Do not confound the innocent with the guilty," it added. "Vouchsafe us the confidence which we so much need. We are anxious to restore the tranquillity necessary to the convention for the enactment of good laws. With regard to the presentation of this petition, it was the sections which insisted upon it, and we are merely their mandatories; but we will urge them to forego it."

This submission disarmed the Girondists themselves; and, on the motion of Gensonné, the honours of the sitting were granted to the council-general. The dignity of the convention might be vindicated by such docility on the part of the municipal administrators, but it gave no assurance as to the real dispositions of the capital. The excitement increased into tumult as the 5th November drew nigh, the day fixed for hearing Robespierre. The day before there were commotions in different interests. Bands traversed the streets of Paris, some shouting, "To the guillotine with Robespierre, Danton, Marat!" others crying, "Death to Roland, Lasource, Guadet!" Complaints of these cries were made at the Jacobins', but only of those directed against Robespierre, Danton, and Marat. The soldiers and federalists, who were as yet devoted to the convention, were charged with these vociferations. The younger Robespierre again presented himself in the tribune, breaking forth into lamentations on the perils of innocence, and repudiating a suggestion of conciliation hazarded by a member of the society, saying that the opposite party was decidedly counter-revolutionary, and that neither peace nor truce ought to be observed with it. He allowed that innocence was sure to perish in the contest, but that the sacrifice was fitting; that Maximilian Robespierre should be permitted to succumb, because the loss of a single man would not involve that of liberty. All the Jacobins applauded these fine sentiments, but at the same time consoled the younger Robespierre with the assurance that such things could not be, and that his brother would not perish.

Very different were the grievances alleged in the assembly, where the shouts against Roland, Lasource, Guadet, &c., were denounced. Roland complained of the inutility of his requisitions to the department and the commune for an armed force. Long and desultory discussions, bitter and acrimonious recriminations, ensued; and the day elapsed without any measure being adopted. On the morrow, the 5th November, Robespierre at length appeared, and took his station in the tribune.

Intense anxiety was manifested as to the issue of this solemn discussion, and the assembly's hall was early filled. The speech of Robespierre was voluminous and carefully digested. His rejoinders to the accusations of Louvet were such as have never failed to be made on similar occasions. "You accuse me," said he, "of aspiring to the tyranny; but, to gain that height, means are essential, and where are my treasures and my armies? You allege that I have reared the edifice of my power in the Jacobin Club. But what does that circumstance prove? Merely that I have been there more heeded, have addressed myself possibly better than you to the reason of that society, and that you seek to avenge here the pangs of wounded self-love. You pretend that this celebrated society has degenerated; but demand a decree of impeachment against it, and I will assume the task of justifying it, and we shall see whether you will be more fortunate or more persuasive than Leopold and Lafayette. You assert that I did not appear at the commune until two days after the 10th August, and that I then installed myself of my own authority on its bench. But I was not summoned thither earlier; and when I presented myself at the table, it was not to install myself, but to have my powers verified. You add that I insulted the Legislative Assembly, that I menaced it with the tocsin; the charge is false. Some one sitting near me accused me of sounding the tocsin: I replied to the intermeddler, that the ringers of the tocsin were those who embittered the public mind by injustice; and thereupon one of my colleagues, less reserved, observed that it would be sounded. Such is the solitary fact upon which my accuser has erected this fable. In the electoral assembly I certainly spoke, but it was agreed that citizens might be heard; I offered a few observations, and several exercised the same privilege. I neither accused nor recommended any individual. The man whom you charge me with using as my instrument, Marat, was never either my friend or my candidate. If I judged him by those who assail him, he would stand acquitted; but I give no opinion. I will merely state that he was always unknown to me; that he once came to my house, when I addressed to him some remarks on his writings—on their exaggerated tone, and on the pain with which patriots saw him compromise our cause by the violence of his opinions; but he deemed me a politician of confined views, and published that estimate the following day. It is therefore a calumny to allege me the instigator and the ally of that man."

Passing from these personal charges to the general accusations levelled against the commune, Robespierre repeated, with all its advocates, that the 2d September was the continuation of the 10th August; that the precise limit to which the waves of a popular insurrection may surge can never be assigned; that the executions were doubtless illegal, but that without illegal measures despotism could not have been shaken off; that the same reproach might be made against the whole revolution, for all its acts were illegal—the prostration of the throne, the capture of the Bastille. He subsequently depicted the dangers of Paris, the indignation of its citizens, their flocking round the prisons, and their inordinate fury at the reflection that they were leaving conspirators behind them to exterminate their families. "We are assured that one innocent person perished," exclaimed the speaker with emphasis—"one only; it was doubtless a great deal too many. Citizens! deplore that cruel error! We have long deplored the man; he was a good citizen—one of our friends! Weep even for the victims who ought to have been reserved for the vengeance of the laws, but who fell under the sword of popular justice! But let your grief have a term, like all human concerns. Let us spare a few tears for calamities more affecting—weep for a hundred thousand patriots immolated by tyranny—weep for our citizens expiring under their burning roofs, and the infants of citizens massacred in the cradle or in the arms of their mothers—weep, in short, for humanity crushed beneath the yoke of tyrants! But be consoled, when, silencing all the brutal passions, you aspire to assert the happiness of your country, and to prepare the way for that of the world.

The sensibility which grieves almost exclusively for the enemies of liberty, is to me suspicious. Cease to flutter before my eyes the bloody robe of the tyrant, or I shall believe you intend to replunge Rome into slavery!"

It was by this mixture of cunning logic and revolutionary declamation, that Robespierre succeeded in captivating his audience, and obtaining universal plaudits. All that he had said respecting himself was correct; for there was great imprudence on the part of the Girondists in stigmatising as a project of usurpation a mere desire of influence, rendered odious, certainly, by an envious character; and there was the like imprudence in pretending to discover, in the acts of the commune, proofs of a vast conspiracy, when they were but the natural consequences of popular passions in high excitement. The Girondists thus afforded the assembly an occasion for charging them with wrong as against their adversaries. Flattered, so to speak, at seeing the alleged leader of the conspirators reduced to justify himself; delighted at finding all the crimes explained away by being charged on an insurrection which could not again recur; and charmed with the vision of a better future, the convention deemed it consistent with dignity and prudence to consign all these personal denunciations to oblivion; and accordingly the order of the day was forthwith moved. Louvet instantly sprang forward to oppose the motion, and to claim his right of reply. A number of members simultaneously rose, all eager to speak for, upon, or against, the order of the day. Barbaroux, despairing to make himself heard, rushed to the bar, that he might be listened to in the character of a petitioner at least. Lanjuinais proposed that the debate should proceed upon the important questions involved in Roland's report. At length Barrère succeeded in obtaining silence and leave to speak. "Citizens," said he, "if there existed in the republic a man endowed with the genius of Cæsar, or the audacity of Cromwell—a [illegible] with the talents of Sylla, possessed also [illegible] -if there were, indeed, here some legislator of [illegible] inordinate ambition, of profound sagacity; a [illegible] for example, his brow bound with laurels, and [illegible] ing amongst you to impose laws upon you or [illegible] on the rights of the people, I should be ready [illegible] a decree of impeachment against such a p[illegible] But that you should confer that honour on [illegible] of the hour, on petty schemers of riots, on persons whose civic crowns are strewed with cypress leaves, is what I am unable to conceive!"

This singular mediator proposed thus to preamble the order of the day: Considering that the National Convention ought to attend only to the interests of the republic. "I abjure your order of the day!" exclaimed Robespierre, "if it contain a recital injurious to me!" The assembly ultimately adopted the order of the day simply and unconditionally.

The hall of the Jacobins was thronged that night to celebrate this victory, and Robespierre was received as a triumphant hero. The instant he made his appearance, the building shook with acclamations. A member moved that the tribune be given up to him, that he might gladden the club by the recital of so glorious a day. Another affirmed, as upon authority, that his modesty restrained him, and that he declined to speak. Robespierre, enjoying this enthusiasm in silence, left to a partisan the task of pronouncing a sycophantic relation. He was called Aristides. His simple and manly eloquence was lauded with an affected rapture, which proved how well his thirst of literary homage was understood. The convention was reinstated in public opinion; it had regained the esteem of the society; and all proclaimed that the reign of truth was dawning, and that the clouds which had hovered over the safety of the republic were dispelled.

Barrère was called upon to explain the terms in which he had expressed himself with reference to petty schemers of riots; and he completely belied himself by affirming that he intended by those words to describe, not the true patriots accused with Robespierre, but their opponents.

Thus finished this celebrated accusation. It was an act of unquestionable imprudence. The entire conduct of the Girondists is summed up in this proceeding. They were actuated by a generous indignation, and expressed it with talent; but therewith was mingled enough of personal resentment, of false conjecture, of chimerical supposition, to supply those who loved to delude themselves with a pretext for not heeding them; those who recoiled from an act of energy, with a motive for deferring it; those, in fine, who affected impartiality, with a plausible reason for not adopting their conclusions; and these three classes composed the Plain. One amongst the Girondist deputies, however, the discerning Pétion, kept aloof from their exaggerations; he published a speech he had prepared on the occasion, in which the whole subject was most discreetly handled. Vergniaud, whom his fine intellect and scornful indifference removed from the sphere of passion, was likewise exempt from their indiscretions, and he observed a profound silence. At the moment, the accusation of the Girondists had no other consequence than definitively rendering all reconciliation impossible, exhausting in a useless contest the most potent of their means, oratory and indignant invective, and aggravating the hatred and fury of their enemies without obtaining for themselves a single additional resource.

Wo to the vanquished when the victors disagree! These afford a diversion to their own disputes, and strive to outstrip each other in zeal for crushing fallen foes. In the Temple were prisoners upon [illegible] was destined to fall the tempest of revolut[illegible] [illegible]ns. The monarchy, the aristocracy, the [illegible] past, in short, against which the revolution battled with ferocity, were personified, as it were, in the unfortunate Louis XVI.; and the manner in which they should treat the dethroned prince, became for each the standard whereby hatred of counter-revolutionary tendencies was to be estimated. The Legislative Assembly, too dependent on the constitution which declared the king inviolable, had not ventured to decide his fate; it had suspended his functions, and incarcerated him in the Temple; it had not even abolished royalty, but had bequeathed to a convention the task of dealing with the substance and the personality of the antiquated monarchy. Royalty abolished, a republic decreed, and the framing of a constitution intrusted to the meditations of the most distinguished minds in the assembly, the fate of Louis XVI. remained for discussion. Six weeks had elapsed, and multitudinous cares—the forwarding of supplies, the consideration of military affairs, the subject of provisions, which were deficient at that time as in all periods of commotion; the police, and all the details of government, which had been transferred, after the fall of royalty, to the executive council, with excessive chariness and, lastly, the violent quarrels—had still prevented the convention from attending to the prisoners in the Temple. Once the question had been started, and, as we have seen, the proposition was referred to the committee of legislation. In the mean time, the subject itself was the theme of all discourse. At the Jacobins' voices were daily raised, invoking judgment on the head of Louis XVI., and charging the Girondists with delaying it by quarrels, in which, however, each of that especial auditory took quite as great a share and interest. On the 1st of November, during the interval between the accusation of Robespierre and his defence, a section having appeared before the convention to complain of fresh placards stimulating to murder and insurrection, the trial of Marat was demanded, as on that topic invariably happened. The Girondists insisted that he and some of his colleagues were the causes of all the disorders, and availed themselves of every new fact corroborating that opinion to propose their prosecution. Their enemies, on the contrary, alleged that the cause of all the troubles was at the Temple; that the new republic would be consolidated, and tranquillity and security reign, only when the late king should be sacrificed, and by that decisive blow all hope taken away from the conspirators. Jean de Bry, the same deputy who had maintained in the Legislative Assembly that the law of public safety should be followed as the only rule of conduct, rose to speak upon this question, and recommended that Marat and Louis XVI. should be both put upon their trial. "Marat," said he, "has earned the title of man-eater, and would have made an excellent king. He is the true cause of all the troubles of which Louis XVI. is made the pretext: let us try them both, and ensure the public repose by this double example." In consequence, the convention ordained that the report upon the denunciations against Marat should be presented before the sitting broke up, and that, within eight days at latest, the committee of legislation should render its opinion upon the forms to be observed in the trial of Louis XVI.; declaring, furthermore, that if, after the eight days, the committee had not brought up its report, every member should be at liberty to occupy the tribune, and deliver his sentiments upon that important topic. New quarrels and new distractions delayed the report upon Marat, which indeed was not presented till long afterwards; but the committee of legislation got ready its project touching the august and unfortunate family immured in the Temple.

Europe had its eyes fixed at this moment on France. It contemplated with amazement those subjects, deemed at first so weak, now become victorious and triumphant, and sufficiently hardy to hurl defiance at all thrones. It awaited with anxiety their coming deeds, and hoped their audacity would soon have an end. However, military events were progressing, which conduced to exalt their delirium, and greatly to augment the surprise and terror of the world.

CHAPTER XVI.

MILITARY OPERATIONS.—VICTORY OF JEMAPPES.—CONQUEST OF BELGIUM.

Dumouriez had departed for Belgium at the end of October, and reached Valenciennes on the 25th. His general plan was framed upon the idea which engrossed his mind, and consisted in pushing the enemy in front, and taking advantage of the great numerical superiority possessed over him. Dumouriez had it in his power, by following the course of the Meuse with the greater part of his forces, to prevent the junction of Clairfayt, who was proceeding from Champagne, take Duke Albert in the rear, and thus execute what he had grossly erred in not doing at first, when he ought to have pushed forward to the Rhine, and followed that river to Cleves; but his plan was differently organised, and he preferred to a sagacious march a brilliant action, which would raise the courage of his soldiers, already greatly animated by the cannonade of Valmy, and correct the opinion entertained in Europe for the last fifty years, that the French, however excellent in impetuous attack, were incapable of achieving a pitched battle. His superiority of number sanctioned such an enterprise, and the idea had its profoundness, too, as well as the manœuvres he has been censured for not employing. However, he did not overlook the important points of turning the enemy, and separating him from Clairfayt. Valence, posted for that purpose along the Meuse, was appointed to march from Givet upon Namur and Liege, with the army of the Ardennes, 18,000 men strong. D'Harville, with 12,000, had orders to manœuvre between the grand army and Valence, in order to turn the enemy at a nearer point. Such were the dispositions of Dumouriez on his right. On his left, Labourdonnaye was intended, taking his departure from Lille, to scour the coast of Flanders, and occupy all the maritime strongholds. On his arrival at Antwerp, he had directions to skirt the Dutch frontier, and meet the Meuse at Ruremonde. Belgium being thus encompassed, Dumouriez occupied the centre of the circle with a mass of 40,000 men, and in a position to overwhelm the enemy on the first point he should attempt to cope with the French.

Impatient to enter the field and open the glorious career for which his ardent imagination panted, Dumouriez urged the arrival of the supplies promised him at Paris, and which ought to have reached Valenciennes on the 25th. Servan had quitted the war ministry, preferring the less troubled functions of a military command to the chaos in which all administration was involved. He re-established the vigour of his mind and his health in the camp of the Pyrenees. Roland had proposed and carried as his successor, Pache, an unassuming, talented, and laborious man, who, having formerly quitted France to reside in Switzerland, had returned at the epoch of the revolution, surrendered the warrant of a pension he drew from the Marshal de Castries, and distinguished himself in the office of the home department by a rare ability and application. Carrying in his pocket a piece of bread, and quitting his labours not even for the purposes of refreshment, he attended during entire days, and won the friendship of Roland alike by his manners and his zeal. Servan had solicited his translation during the arduous administration of August and September, and Roland had yielded to his wishes with regret, and only in consideration of the great importance of the labours of the war department at that period. Pache rendered in his new post services equally efficient as in t[illegible] and when the place of minister-at-war became vacant, he was [illegible]iately proposed to fill it, as one of those obscure but invaluable workmen, whom justice and the public [illegible] should, if consulted, have raised rapidly to dist[illegible]

Pache, affable and modest, was an universal favourite, and could not fail to be acceptable: the Girondists naturally relied upon the political moderation of man so calm, so prudent, and moreover so indebted to them for fortune. The Jacobins, who found him bland and deferential towards them, extolled his modesty, and contrasted it with what they called the pride and harshness of Roland. Dumouriez, on his part, was charmed with a minister who promised to be more manageable than the Girondists, and more disposed to aid his views. He had at this time fresh grievances against Roland. The latter had written a letter to him in the name of the council, in which he took him to task for assuming too imperative a tone in urging his plans upon the ministry, and exhibited towards him a distrust, enhanced by the conviction of his superior talents. Roland, full of loyalty to the public service, combated in public what he had advanced in the secrecy of correspondence. Dumouriez, disregarding the honesty of Roland's intentions, made his complaints to Pache, who received them, and indemnified him by his flatteries for the jealousies of his colleagues. Such, then, was the new minister of war: standing between the Jacobins, the Girondists, and Dumouriez, listening to their respective grievances, he gained them all by his assurances and deference, and led them all to esteem him an ally and a friend.

Dumouriez attributed the delay in forwarding supplies to his army to the change in the offices consequent upon a new ministry. Only the moiety of the promised stores had arrived; and he commenced his march without waiting for the remainder, writing to Pache, at the same time, that he must infallibly have sent to him 30,000 pairs of shoes, 25,000 greatcoats, camp-materials for 40,000 men, and, above all, two millions in specie, to furnish the soldiers with cash, because, entering a country where assignats were not current, they must necessarily pay in hard coin for all they should purchase. Every thing was promised; and Dumouriez, stirring the ardour of his troops, encouraging them with the prospect of a speedy and certain conquest, led them onward, although deficient in necessaries for a winter campaign in a severe climate.

Valence, retarded in his march by a diversion on Longwy, and by the total want of all military stores, which did not reach him till November, permitted Clairfayt to pass without obstacle from Luxumbourg into Belgium, and join Duke Albert with 12,000 men. Dumouriez, foregoing his intention of availing himself of Valence's aid, drew towards him the division of General d'Harville, and marching his troops between Quarouble and Quiévrain, hastened to come up with the hostile army. Duke Albert, true to the Austrian system, had formed a cordon from Tournay to Mons; and although he had 30,000 men, he assembled scarcely 20,000 before the town of Mons. Dumouriez, pressing on him closely, arrived on the 3d November before the eminence of Boussu, and ordered his advanced guard, commanded by the gallant Beurnonville, to dislodge the enemy posted on the heights. The attack was at first successful, but the Austrians rallying, the French were obliged to retire. Dumouriez, aware how important success was at the commencement, sent Beurnonville back to the attack, carried all the enemy's posts, and, on the evening of the 3d, found himself in presence of the Austrians, intrenched on the heights which skirt the town of Mons.

On these heights, stretching semicircularly in front of the place, were planted three villages, Jemappes, Cuesmes, and Berthaimont. The Austrians, in expectation of being attacked, had formed the imprudent resolution of maintaining that position, and had for some time devoted the greatest pains to render it impregnable. Clairfayt occupied Jemappes and Cuesmes; a little beyond, Beaulieu encamped above Berthaimont. Rapid declivities, woods, felled trees, fourteen redoubts, a formidable artillery ranging in tiers, and 20,4 [illegible] these positions, and rendered almost impracticable. Tyrolian [illegible] the woods which stretched below the heights. [illegible] cavalry, stationed in the intervals between the [illegible] and principally in the hollow separating Jemappes from Cuesmes, was in readiness to debouch and fall on the French columns, when thrown into confusion by the fire of the batteries.

It was in front of this camp, so strongly barricaded, that Dumouriez planted himself. He drew up his army in a semicircle, parallel to the positions of the enemy. General D'Harville, who had effected his junction with the main army on the evening of the 5th, was appointed to manœuvre on the extreme right of the French line. By dawn on the 6th he was to skirt the positions of Beaulieu, essay to turn them, and then occupy the heights behind Mons, the sole retreat of the Austrians. Beurnonville, forming the right itself of the French line, had orders to march on the village of Cuesmes. The Duke de Chartres,* who served in the army with the rank of general, and commanded in the centre that day, was to advance on Jemappes in front, and endeavour at the same time to penetrate by the hollow which divided Jemappes from Cuesmes. Lastly, General Ferrand, intrusted with the command of the left, was directed to go through a little village called Quaregnon, and bear upon the flank of Jemappes. All these attacks were intended to be executed in columns by battalions; the cavalry stood ready to support them from behind and on the flanks. The artillery was posted so as to play on each redoubt in flank, and silence its fire if possible. A reserve of infantry and cavalry awaited the event behind the rivulet of Wasme.

During the night between the 5th and 6th, General Beaulieu recommended a sortie from the intrenchments and a sudden attack upon the French, in order to disconcert them by an unexpected and nocturnal onslaught. This energetic counsel was not heeded; and on the 6th, at eight in the morning, the French were in order of battle, full of courage and ardour, although exposed to a murderous fire and in sight of almost invulnerable intrenchments. Sixty thousand men covered the field of battle, and one hundred pieces of ordnance thundered in front of the two armies.

The cannonade had commenced with the dawn. Dumouriez ordered Generals Ferrand and Beurnonville to begin the attack, the one on the left, the other on the right, whilst he himself awaited in the centre the moment for acting, and D'Harville, skirting the positions of Beaulieu, deployed to cut off the retreat. Ferrand attacked faintly, and Beurnonville failed to silence the Austrian fire. It was now eleven o'clock; and the enemy was not sufficiently distressed on the flanks to risk an assault in front. Dumouriez thereupon dispatched his faithful Thouvenot to the left wing to decide the success. Thouvenot, causing the useless cannonade to cease, traversed Quaregnon, turned Jemappes, and at a brisk pace, with bayonets fixed, scaled the height and arrived on the flank of the Austrians. Dumouriez, apprised of this movement, resolved to commence the attack in front, and moved the centre directly against Jemappes. He made his infantry advance in columns, and disposed his hussars and dragoons so as to cover the hollow between Jemappes and Cuesmes, whence the enemy's cavalry was preparing to charge. The French troops moved forward, and cleared with alacrity the intervening space. A brigade, however, perceiving the Austrian cavalry debouching by the hollow, wavered, recoiled, and exposed the flank of the columns. At this instant, the young Baptiste Rénard, a mere domestic of Dumouriez, yielding to the inspiration of courage and intelligence, flew to the general of that brigade, upbraided him with his weakness, demonstrated the critical nature of the danger, and led him back to the hollow. A certain hesitation was manifested in the whole centre, and the battalions began to grow uneasy under the galling fire from the batteries. The Duke de Chartres threw himself into the midst of the ranks, rallied them, formed around him a battalion which he called the battalion of Jemappes, and led it boldly against the enemy. The battle was thus restored; and Clairfayt, although taken in flank and menaced in front, resisted nevertheless with heroic firmness.

* [The present King of the French.]

Dumouriez, witnessing all these movements, but doubtful of success, hastened to the right, where the contest was still undecided, in spite of Beurnonville's most strenuous efforts. His intention was to bring the attack to a speedy termination, or, failing, to fall back with the right wing, and use it to protect the retreat of the centre, should a retrograde movement become necessary.

Beurnonville had been making fruitless attempts against the village of Cuesmes, and was about to give up in despair, when Dampierre, who commanded a point of the assault, took with him some companies and charged audaciously into the midst of a redoubt. Dumouriez came up at the very moment Dampierre was executing this gallant action; he found the rest of the battalions without a leader, exposed to a destructive fire, and wavering in presence of the imperial hussars, on the point of charging them. These were the same battalions which, in the camp of Maulde, had formed so strong an attachment towards Dumouriez. He restored their confidence, and prepared them to hold firm against the hostile cavalry. A discharge within range checked that cavalry, and the hussars of Berchini, falling opportunely on it, completed its discomfiture. Then Dumouriez, putting himself at the head of his battalions, and chanting with them the Marseillese hymn, led them onwards, hurried them to the intrenchments, overthrew all before him, and carried the village of Cuesmes.

This exploit was scarcely achieved before Dumouriez, still anxious for the centre, galloped back in that direction, followed by a few squadrons. But whilst on the way, the young Duke de Montpensier met him with tidings of the victory of the centre, owing principally to his brother the Duke de Chartres. Thus, Jemappes assailed in flank and front, and Cuesmes carried, Clairfayt could no longer offer resistance, and was necessitated to retire. He consequently yielded the ground after a brave defence, and abandoned a dearly bought victory to Dumouriez. His retreat took place at two o'clock; the French troops, drooping with fatigue, craved a moment's repose; Dumouriez granted their request, and halted on the heights of Jemappes and Cuesmes. He relied upon D'Harville for the pursuit of the enemy; that general being charged to turn Berthaimont, and cut off the retreat of the Austrians. But his orders not being sufficiently explicit, and being, furthermore, misunderstood, D'Harville had remained in front of Berthaimont, and uselessly cannonaded its heights. Clairfayt accordingly fell back under the wing of Beaulieu, who had not been engaged; and both took the road to Brussels, which D'Harville had left open for them.

The battle cost the Austrians 1500 prisoners, and 4500 dead or wounded. The loss of the French was nearly as great. Dumouriez disguised its extent, and confessed to only a few hundred men. He has been censured for not having turned the enemy by marching on his right, and thus taking him in the rear, instead of obstinately persisting in the attacks on the left and centre. The idea had occurred to him when he ordered D'Harville to skirt Berthaimont, but he had not acted upon it with sufficient vigour. His promptitude, frequently superseding reflection, and the ambition of brilliant enterprises, made him prefer at Jemappes, as throughout the campaign, an attack in front. At the same time, full of ardour and presence of mind in the midst of action, he had admirably sustained his troops, and communicated to them an heroic courage. A vast renown attended this signal victory. The battle of Jemappes filled France with indescribable joy, and Europe with fresh amazement. Every where, so formidable an artillery braved with such exemplary coolness, redoubts breasted with such distinguished gallantry, formed the theme of wonder; the peril and the victory were even exaggerated; and through all Europe the faculty of gaining pitched battles was again conceded to the French.

At Paris, all the sincere republicans experienced unalloyed gratification at the auspicious tidings, and celebrated them by rejoicings. Dumouriez's servant, the youthful Baptiste Rénard, was presented to the convention, and rewarded by it with a civic crown and an officer's epaulette. The Girondists, from patriotism, from a sense of justice, applauded the talents of the general. The Jacobins, although distrusting him, likewise applauded him, from the pure necessity of exulting at the triumphs of the revolution. Marat alone, reproaching the French for their infatuation, exclaimed that Dumouriez must have falsified the number of his dead; that a mountain could not be assailed at so little cost; that he had taken neither baggage nor artillery; that the Austrians had moved tranquilly away; that it was a retreat rather than a defeat; and that Dumouriez might have attacked the enemy more discreetly: and mingling with this actual sagacity a demoniac frenzy for calumny, he added that this attack in front was designed for no other purpose than that of sacrificing the brave battalions of Paris; that his colleagues in the convention and Jacobin Club, all the French, in short, so prompt to admire, were but dolts; and that for himself, he would allow Dumouriez to be a good general when all Belgium was subdued, without a single Austrian escaping, and a good patriot when Belgium was thoroughly revolutionised and rendered illimitably free. "You French," said he, "with this disposition to admire without reflection, are exposed to equally swift revulsion. One day you proscribe Montesquiou; you are told that he has conquered Savoy, and you applaud him; you again proscribe him, and become a general laughing-stock by these silly vacillations. For myself, I distrust, I accuse always; and so far as the inconveniences of this disposition are concerned, they are incomparably less than those resulting from a contrary tendency, inasmuch as they never compromise the public safety. They may doubtless expose me to mistakes as to certain individuals; but, seeing the corruption of the age, and the multitude of enemies to liberty from education, principle, and interest, it is a thousand to one that I am right, when I take them at once as intriguers and public knaves, all ready for plots. I am, therefore, a thousand times less likely to be deceived regarding public functionaries; and whilst the fatal confidence reposed in them enables them to scheme against the country with equal effrontery and security, the eternal distrust with which the public should regard them, according to my principles, would not allow them to move a step without trembling at the dread of being unmasked and punished." *

The battle of Jemappes opened Belgium to the French: but now strange difficulties beset Dumouriez, and two striking spectacles presented themselves —on the conquered territory, the French revolution acting upon adjacent revolutions, both by way of precipitation and assimilation; and with regard to the French army, the demagogical spirit infusing itself into the administrations, and disorganising them under pretence of purification.

There were several parties in Belgium: the first, that attached to Austrian domination, existed only in the imperial armies put to flight by Dumouriez; the second, composing the whole nation, nobles, priests, magistrates, people, unanimously repudiated the foreign yoke, and desired the independence of the Belgian nation. But this latter was subdivided into two others: the priests and the privileged orders were in favour of preserving the ancient states, the ancient institutions, the distinctions of classes and provinces—every thing, in short, except only the Austrian sway, and they had on their side a portion of the population, still very [illegible]itious, and greatly attached to the clergy; on the [illegible] and, the Belgian demagogues or Jacobins were anxious for a complete revolution and the sovereignty of the people, demanding the French level and equality. Thus, each adopted of the revolution what suited its own views; the party of the privileged orders sought only the ancient system; the party of plebeians sought democracy and the reign of the multitude. Amongst the different parties, it will be easily divined that Dumouriez's predilections would lead him to steer a middle course. Repelling Austria with his troops, condemning the exclusive pretensions of the privileged orders, he had no desire at the same time to transport the Jacobins of Paris to Brussels, and there give being to new Chabots and Marats. His design in truth was, whilst respecting the ancient organisation of the country, to reform what it held too purely feudal. The enlightened part of the population was also actuated by such views; but it was difficult to form it into an aggregate, on account of the lack of union amongst the towns and provinces; and, furthermore, by convoking it in an assembly, it would be exposed to the domination of the violent party. In case he could realise his wishes, Dumouriez thought, either by means of an alliance or of a union, to connect Belgium with the French empire, and thus complete its territory. He was, above all things, desirous of preventing spoliations, of ensuring the immense resources of the country for war, and of indisposing no class of the population, so that his army might not perish by an insurrection. He looked forward, likewise, to conciliating the clergy, who exercised a prodigious influence over the minds of the people. He desired, in fine, such things as the experience of revolutions shows to be impossible, and which all administrative and political genius, however vast, may at once renounce with perfect resignation. We shall see his plans and projects take development in their proper place.

* "Journal of the French Republic, by Marat, the Friend of the People," No. 43. Monday, 12th November 1792.

On entering Belgium, he promised, in a proclamation, to respect property, persons, and the national independence. He ordered that all things should be maintained as they were; that the authorities should continue their functions, the imposts be collected, and primary assemblies be immediately convoked to form a national convention to decide on the fate of Belgium.

Difficulties of a different and graver cast were, however, in store for him. Motives of policy, of public good, of humanity, might make him desire a prudent and moderate revolution in Belgium; but his army meanwhile must live, and therein lay his entanglement. He was the general, and, above all things besides, was obliged to be victorious. For that end, discipline and resources were essential to him. Upon his first entry into Mons on the morning of the 7th November, amidst the acclamations of the Brabanters, who decreed him a crown, as well as the brave Dampierre, he found himself in the greatest embarrassment. His commissariat was at Valenciennes, and no part of what had been promised him was forthcoming. He wanted clothing for his soldiers, more than half-naked, provisions, horses for his artillery, and light carriages to assist the progress of the invasion, especially in a country where transport was extremely difficult; lastly, specie to pay the troops, because the Belgians were not willing to accept assignats. The emigrants had [illegible] a large quantity of forged assignats, and [illegible] thrown discredit on them; besides, no nation is over prone to share the burdens of another, by receiving paper which represents its debts.

[illegible] of D[illegible] ing almost to imprudence, would scarcely permit us to believe that he remained from the 7th to the 11th at Mons, and left the Duke of Saxe-Teschen to [illegible] his retreat in tranquillity, if administrative [illegible] had not imperiously detained him, and absorbed [illegible] attention which should have been exclusively fixed on military affairs. The plan he formed was wisely conceived; it consisted in forming contracts for [illegible]sions, forage, and stores, with the Belgians [illegible] Hence numerous advantages would result; [illegible] place, the articles of consumption were on the [illegible] and no delay was to be feared; the contracts [illegible] give the Belgians an interest in the presence of the French army; and by paying the venders in assignats, they would be compelled to promote their circulation of themselves, thus avoiding a forced currency, an object of great importance, since every one upon whom a forced currency is imposed considers himself defrauded by the authority coercing, and nothing tends more universally to exasperate a population. Dumouriez had furthermore reflected upon the feasibility of making loans from the clergy under the guarantee of France. Such loans would supply him with specie, and replenish his exhausted chest; whilst the clergy, although smote for the instant, would feel more at ease as to their stability and possessions, when thus directly connected with him. And on the other hand, France having a right to claim indemnities from the Belgians for the expenses of a liberating war, those indemnities would be set apart for the payment of the loans; and thus, by means of a slight additional contribution, the whole war would be defrayed, and Dumouriez would fulfil his boast of living at the cost of Belgium without harassing or disorganising it. But these were plans inspired by genius simply; and in the stormy eras of revolution, it behoves genius to adopt one of two decided courses—either, foreseeing the disorders and the outrages about to follow, to retire betimes; or, still foreseeing them, to yield thereto, and submit to pursue a career of violence for the purpose of continuing useful, whether at the head of an army or the state. No man has been sufficiently superior to worldly influences to essay the first; one has been great, and shown that he could preserve his purity of character whilst following the second. I refer to him who, holding a seat in the committee of public safety, took no part in its political acts, but devoted himself to the department of war, and organised victory, a thing fair, permitted, and always patriotic under [illegible] ments.*

In effecting his contracts and financial operations, Dumouriez employed Malus, his war commissary, whom he highly esteemed on account of his talents and activity, without inquiring too narrowly whether or not he were moderate in his gains. He likewise made use of one D'Espagnac, an ex-abbé of libertine morals, and one of those intellectual and sprightly roués of the lapsed era, who pursued all trades with infinite skill and grace, and left an equivocal reputation in all. Him Dumouriez dispatched to the ministry in order to unfold his plans, and procure a ratification of all the engagements he had contracted. He had already incurred sufficient odium by the species of administrative dictatorship he had arrogated to himself, and by the revolutionary moderation he evinced with respect to the Belgians, without further compromising himself by an association with men, either the present objects of suspicion, or, if not now so, soon to become such. In fact, at this very period, a general murmur arose against the old administrations, which were alleged to be full of knaves and

After bestowing so much care on the comfort of his soldiers, Dumouriez turned his attention to the march of Labourdonnaye, which he was desirous of accelerat-

* [Carnot is alluded to in this description.]

ing. That general, who had displayed remarkable obstinacy in lingering behind, reached Tournay very tardily; and, when arrived there, illustrated his coming by scenes worthy of the Jacobins, and levied heavy contributions. Dumouriez directed him to march rapidly on Ghent and the Scheldt, in order to occupy Antwerp, and then accomplish the circuit of the country as far as the Meuse. Valence, who had at length arrived in line, after unavoidable delays, was ordered to be at Nivelles on the 13th or 14th. Dumouriez, concluding that the Duke of Saxe-Teschen would retire behind the canal of Vilvorden, intended that Valence, turning the forest of Soignies, should proceed beyond that canal, and there be ready to receive the duke at the passage of the Dyle.

He left Mons on the 11th, and came slowly up with the enemy, who was retreating in good order, but with singular sluggishness. Impeded by crazy conveyances, he was unable to proceed with sufficient promptitude to make amends for the delays he had been compelled to undergo. On the 13th, preceding his army with a mere advanced guard, he fell into the midst of the enemy at Anderlecht, and narrowly escaped being surrounded; but, with his usual address and firmness, he manœuvred his little band, brought forward with much show some pieces of artillery he had with him, and induced the Austrians to conclude that he was on the field of battle with his entire army. He thus succeeded in keeping them in check until he was succoured by his own soldiers, who, learning his critical position, flew with all speed to disengage him.

He entered Brussels on the 14th, and was again stopped there by administrative embarrassments, having neither money nor resources necessary for the support of his troops. He was likewise apprised that the ministry refused to sanction his last contracts, with one exception; and that all the old military administrations were cashiered, and replaced by a committee called the Committee of Purchases. This committee alone was for the future to be authorised to purchase for the use of the armies; and no general was allowed to intermeddle with that department in any respect. This was the beginning of a revolution in the offices of administration, which was not long in throwing them all into complete disorganisation for a time.

The administrative departments, which require for their service a long practice or special study, are generally those into which a revolution is the last to penetrate, inasmuch as they less excite ambition, and the necessity of retaining capable officers saves them from the rage for innovation. Consequently, scarcely any change had been made in the staffs, in the scientific corps of the army, in the offices of the various ministries, in the old commissariat departments, and above all, in the marine, which, of all the divisions of military art, most especially demands peculiar knowledge. Outcries were therefore speedily raised against the aristocrats wherewith these departments were filled, and reproaches levelled at the executive council for not remodelling them. The branch of administration which provoked the greatest exasperation was the commissariat. Just indignation was expressed against the contractors, who, from something inherent in government transactions, and, moreover, under favour of the prevalent disorders of the moment, asked exorbitant prices in all their bargains, supplied the worst articles to the troops, and robbed the state with glaring effrontery. Their exactions formed the subject of complaint from all quarters; and an inexorable adversary arose against them in the person of Cambon of Montpellier, a deputy of the convention. Devoting himself with untiring zeal to matters of finance and public economy, this deputy had gained a great ascendancy in discussions upon those points, and enjoyed the full confidence of the assembly. Although a decided democrat, he had never ceased to exclaim ag[illegible] the spoliations of the commune, and in so doing surprised those who were unable to comprehend that he condemned as a financier disorders he would have possibly excused as a Jacobin. He inveighed with still greater vehemence against the contractors, and attacked them with all the violence of his character. Every day he denounced new frauds, and insisted upon their punishment; which exhortations were heard with universal satisfaction. Honest men desired the chastisement of knaves, the Jacobins the persecution of aristocrats, and intriguers the multiplication of vacant situations.

Thus an idea gradually arose in favour of forming a committee composed of certain individuals empowered to make all purchases for behoof of the republic. It was thought that this committee, sole and responsible, would rescue the state from those frauds perpetrated by a multitude of isolated contractors; and that, becoming the only purchaser for all the administrations, it would avoid enhancing prices by competition, as always happened when each ministry and each army treated separately for their respective wants. This body was established with the sanction all the ministers; and Cambon was its most strenuous advocate, since so new and simple a form suited his dogmatic spirit. Dumouriez was thereupon advertised that he should conclude no more contracts, and ordered, furthermore, to annul those he had already signed. The regimental chests were at the same time abolished; and the rigour of the new principle was pushed to such extremity in execution, that serious difficulties were started against retiring at the national treasury a draft of Dumouriez, granted for an advance made to the army by a Belgian merchant.

This revolution in the commissariat department, laudable as it was in motive, resulted, concurrently with other circumstances, in producing disastrous consequences. During the administration of Servan, that minister had been called upon to satisfy the first wants of troops hastily assembled in Champagne, and it required great exertions to meet those early embarrassments. But after the campaign of the Argonne was over, the stores collected with such difficulty were utterly exhausted; the volunteers, having left their homes with a single suit, were almost naked; insomuch, that to each of the armies a complete equipment was indispensable, to be provided too in the depth of winter, and amidst the rapid invasion of Belgium. Pache, Servan's successor, had consequently a prodigious task to perform, and unfortunately he joined to great talents and application a weak and supple character, which, leading him to study pleasing every body, especially the Jacobins, incapacitated him for command, and disabled him from imparting the necessary energy to an administration so vast as that intrusted to him. When, therefore, we reflect that, in addition to the pressing urgency and enormity of the wants to be supplied, the difficulties of the season, and the necessity of decisive promptitude, we have to place the weakness of a new minister, the general disorder of the state, and, above all, a complete revolution in the administrative system, we may readily conceive the confusion inevitably to arise during the first moments—the destitution of the armies, their angry complaints, and the violent remonstrances passed between the generals and the ministers.

Upon learning these administrative changes, Dumouriez was much incensed. Until the organisation of the new system was effected, he perceived that his army must be exposed to the greatest misery, unless his contracts were maintained and executed. He, therefore, took it upon himself to uphold them, and ordered his agents, Malus, D'Espagnac, and a third named Petit-Jean, to continue their operations upon his personal responsibility. At the same time, he wrote to the minister in an imperious style, calculated to render him additionally suspected by distrustful, sour, and gloomy demagogues, already discontented at his revolutionary lukewarmness and administrative dictatorship. He told him that, in order to ensure a continuation of his services, he must be left at liberty to provide for the wants of his army; that the committee of purchases was an absurdity, since it would have to transport stores laboriously and from afar, when they were easily obtainable upon the spot; that the mere conveyance would lead to vast expense and delays, during which the armies might perish from hunger, cold, and wretchedness; that the Belgians would lose all interest in the presence of the French, and cease to aid the circulation of the assignats; that the extortions of contractors would proceed as usual, since the facility of plundering the state in supplies had always made, and would always continue to make, robbers; and that the members of the committee of [illegible]es would themselves become contractors and [illegible] notwithstanding the provision of the law for- [illegible] them; and that the whole was but an idle effort at economy, which, even were it not chimerical, was sure to produce a fatal paralysis in the service for at least a time. The committee of purchases irritated Dumouriez the more, because its members were known to him as the creatures of the minister Clavière; and he deemed the innovation itself to spring from the jealousy with which he was regarded by the Girondists. But, on the contrary, its institution originated in the sincerest motives, and met the warm approval of all parties, without any factious view or purpose.

Pache, if he had been a firm and patriotic minister, would have endeavoured to satisfy the general, in order to secure his aid to the republic. With this view, it was his duty to have examined his demands, considered how many of them were just, conceded all such, repudiated the rest, and conducted the business in an authoritative and vigorous spirit—after a manner, in short, to obviate reproaches, disputes, and confusion. Instead, however, of so doing, Pache, already accused by the Girondists of weakness, and doubtless ill-disposed towards them, left to their mutual upbraidings the general, the Girondists, and the convention. He laid before the council some hasty letters of Dumouriez, in which he pointedly complained of the bad feeling entertained towards him by the Girondist ministers; and he made known to the convention the demands Dumouriez imperiously insisted upon having yielded to him, under threat of tendering his resignation. Avoiding either to censure or to explain, and affecting in his reports a scrupulous fidelity, he allowed every sinister circumstance to work out its worst consequences. The Girondists, the convention, the Jacobins, were all, upon distinct grounds, irritated at the haughty bearing of Dumouriez. Cambon inveighed against Malus, D'Espagnac, and Petit-Jean, quoting the terms of their contracts, which were exorbitant, and depicting the unbridled luxury of D'Espagnac and the former malversations of Petit-Jean; and ultimately induced the assembly to impeach all three. He alleged that Dumouriez was encompassed by intriguers, from whom it was necessary to free him, and strenuously maintained the excellence of the committee of purchases, arguing that buying articles of consumption on the theatre of war [illegible] the industry of native artisans, and [illegible] them to seditions from idleness; that, as to [illegible], there was no occasion for any address to induce their circulation, as the general was wrong in not enforcing their acceptance, and introducing into Belgium the whole revolution, with its spirit, its systems, and its currency, since the Belgians, reaping the inestimable gift of liberty, must take its inconveniences as well as blessings. In the tribune of the convention, Dumouriez was considered merely as the dupe of his agents; but at the Jacobin Club, and in the journal of Marat, he was invariably denounced as in concert with them and partaking their spoils, although no proof existed for the allegation, save the too frequent example of commanders yielding to similar Dumouriez was thus compelled to abandon the three commissaries; nor did he escape the affront of seeing them arrested, in despite of the guarantee he had himself given them. Pache wrote to him, with his accustomed blandness, that his demands were under examination; that his wants would be speedily supplied; and that for such purpose the committee of purchases had made considerable contracts. In the mean time, he announced to him certain large arrivals, which never appeared. Dumouriez, out of patience at this disappointment, renewed his complaints; and from the correspondence between them, if the letters of the minister were heeded, all seemed in profusion and abundance—if those of the general were believed, all was in positive destitution. Dumouriez had recourse to temporary expedients, and to loans from the cathedral chapters; one contract of Malus, which, from the emergency of the case, he had been allowed to maintain, kept him in food; and he was in this state detained at Brussels from the 14th to the 19th.

In this interval, Stengel, having been detached with the advanced guard, had taken Malines, an important capture, on account of the stores of powder and arms of all kinds accumulated in a fortress which was deemed the arsenal of Belgium. Labourdonnaye had entered Antwerp on the 18th, in which city he organised clubs, and greatly disgusted the Belgians by the special favour he extended to popular agitators, instead of pushing with the requisite vigour the siege of the citadel. Dumouriez, finding it impossible to agree with a lieutenant so much interested in clubs and so little with war, displaced him for Miranda, a Peruvian of distinguished gallantry, who had settled in France at the period of the revolution, and attained an eminent position through the friendship of Pétion. Labourdonnaye, deprived of his army, and sent back to the department of the north, used every endeavour to kindle the zeal of the Jacobins against Cæsar-Dumouriez, the name by which the general was already stigmatised amongst that fraternity.

The enemy had at first intended to take position behind the canal of Vilvorden, and to maintain a communication with Antwerp. He thus committed the same fault as Dumouriez, attempting to keep near the Scheldt instead of hastening upon the Meuse, as they both ought to have done, the one to secure, the other to cut off, a retreat. At length Clairfayt, who had assumed the command, perceived the necessity of repassing the Meuse with all dispatch, and abandoning Antwerp to its fate. Dumouriez then called Valence from Nivelles to undertake the siege of Namur, committing the grievous fault of not throwing him along the Meuse so as to block the Austrian retreat. The defeat of the defensive army would have unquestionably ensured the surrender of the fastness. But the example of grand strategic manœuvres had not then been given; and, furthermore, Dumouriez lacked on this occasion, as on many others, the necessary reflection. He left Brussels on the 19th; passed Louvain on the 20th, and came up with the enemy at Tirlemont on the 22d, killing two or three hundred of his men. Again detained by absolute destitution, he did not start from that place till the 26th. On the 27th he arrived before Liege, and had to sustain a sharp engagement at Varoux against the Austrian rearguard. General Starai, who commanded it, made a glorious defence, and received his death-wound. Finally, on the morning of the 28th, Dumouriez entered Liege amidst the acclamations of the people, whose minds were peculiarly ripe for revolutionary excitement. Miranda took the citadel of Antwerp on the 29th, and was in a position to complete the circuit of Belgium by marching to Ruremond. On the 2d of December Valence occupied Namur. Clairfayt proceeded towards the Roër, and Beaulieu towards Luxembourg.

At this moment all Belgium was occupied as far as the Meuse; but the country intervening to the Rhine remained for conquest, and serious difficulties stood in the way of Dumouriez. Either from the obstacles impeding transport, or the negligence of functionaries, nothing reached his army; and although ample magazines were formed at Valenciennes, total want prevailed on the Meuse. Pache, to curry favour with the Jacobins, had thrown his offices open to them, and the greatest disorder ensued as a necessary consequence. Duties were interrupted or neglected; and from inattention the most contradictory orders were issued. Thus every branch of the service was thrown into inextricable confusion; and whilst the minister concluded the convoys safely arrived, they had not even started. The institution of the committee of purchases tended materially to augment the disorder. Ronsin, the new commissary, who had succeeded Malus and D'Espagnac after denouncing them, was in the greatest embarrassment. His reception by the army had been far from cordial; and growing alarmed at his critical position, he obeyed the orders of Dumouriez, and pursued the plan of purchases on the spot, regardless of the recent decisions. By these means the army got supplies of bread and flesh; but clothes, carriages, specie, and forage, were entirely wanting, and all the horses were starved to death. Another calamity afflicted this unfortunate army, namely, desertion. The volunteers, who, during the first enthusiasm, had poured into Champagne, were greatly cooled after the moment of danger was past; and, furthermore, contracting disgust at the numerous privations to which they were subjected, they deserted in crowds. The single corps of Dumouriez had lost at least ten thousand, and was daily losing more. The Belgian levies were not completed, since it was almost impossible to organise a country in which the different classes of the population, and the different provinces of the state, were so indisposed to concert. Liege was rife with the revolutionary spirit; but Brabant and Flanders saw with ill-disguised repugnance the Jacobin faction raise its head in clubs, attempted to be established in Ghent, Antwerp, Brussels, &c. Nor were the Belgian people on too good an understanding with the French soldiers, who desired to pay in assignats; every where that paper currency was rejected, and Dumouriez refused to give it a forced circulation. Thus, although victorious and master of the country, the French army found itself in a deplorable condition from the combined effects of destitution, desertion, and the uncertain, if not hostile, dispositions of the inhabitants. The convention, harassed by the contradictory reports of the general, who uttered his complaints with indignant warmth, and of the minister, who certified with modesty, but with assurance, that the most abundant supplies had been forwarded, dispatched four commissioners selected from its own members, to satisfy themselves of the true state of the case. These four commissioners were Danton, Camus, Lacroix, and Cossuin.

Whilst the month of November had been consumed by Dumouriez in the occupation of Belgium to the Meuse, Custine, still hovering in the neighbourhood of Frankfort and the river Maine, was menaced by the Prussians, who advanced up the Lahn. This general would have willingly seen the whole current of the war directed to his quarter, in order that his rear might be covered, and his silly incursions into Germany supported. He was therefore incessantly exclaiming against Dumouriez for not appearing at Cologne, and against Kellermann for not bearing on Coblentz. We have seen the difficulties Dumouriez had to encounter effectually impeding his more speedy advance; and such a movement on the part of Kellermann could only have been rendered possible by Custine abandoning incursions which merely served to fill the hall of the Jacobins and the newspapers with exulting acclamations, restricting himself to the limit of the Rhine, and, first fortifying Mayence, himself descending to Coblentz. But he was desirous that all should operate in his rear, so that he might have the honour of continuing the offensive in Germany. Overborne by his solicitations and complaints, the executive council recalled Kellermann, and nominated Beurnonville in his place, giving him the tardy commission to take Treves, in so advanced a season, and amidst a country poor and difficult to occupy. Only one advisable mode of executing this enterprise had ever existed, and that was to have marched at the commencement between Luxumbourg and Treves, and thus reached Coblentz, whilst Custine came to the same point down the Rhine. The French would then have overpowered the Prussians, still disheartened by their repulse in Champagne, and been enabled to extend a helping hand to Dumouriez in his progress to Cologne, in case he had not already reached it. In this manner, Luxumbourg and Treves, which it was impossible to take by main force, would have fallen by famine and from want of succour; but Custine having persisted in his Weteravian expedition, and the army of the Moselle having remained quiescent in its cantonments, the time had lapsed at the end of November for marching on those fortresses, to effect a diversion in favour of Custine against the Prussians, now invigorated with fresh courage, and ascending the Rhine. Beurnonville alleged such reasons, but they were overruled, for a strong inclination to conquer and to chastise the Elector of Treves for his conduct towards France pervaded the public mind; and he was ordered to make the attack, which he conducted with as much spirit as if it had met his warmest approbation. After certain brilliant and hotly contested actions, he was obliged to renounce the expedition and fall back towards Lorraine. In this position of affairs, Custine was of course seriously compromised on the banks of the Maine; but he was loth, by retreating, to confess his temerity and the evanescent nature of his conquest, and he persisted in clinging to it without any reasonable prospect of success. He had placed in Frankfort a garrison of 2400 men; and although such a force was absurdly inadequate to defend an open town, with a population exasperated by iniquitous contributions, he enjoined the commander to hold steadfast, whilst he himself, taking post at Oberyssel and Hombourg, a little below Frankfort, affected a determination and defiance bordering on the burlesque. Such was the situation of the army on that particular point, at the end of November and beginning of December, whereby it is manifest that along the course of the Rhine the campaign had been barren of results.

On the Alpine frontier, Montesquiou, whom we left negotiating with the Swiss, and endeavouring to impress the dictates of reason on both Geneva and the French ministry, had been compelled to emigrate. An impeachment had been launched against him for having, as alleged, compromised the dignity of France by allowing the insertion of an article in the convention, by which its troops were bound to withdraw a certain distance; and especially for having the good faith to execute the stipulation in question. A decree was fulminated against him, and he took refuge within the walls of Geneva. But his moderation had ensured the success of his labours; and even whilst he was put under the ban of accusation, the ministry negotiated with the Genevese on the very bases he had fixed. The troops of Berne retired, the French troops cantoned within the prescribed limits, the invaluable neutrality of Switzerland was secured to France, and one at least of its frontiers guaranteed from invasion for several years. This important advantage had been despised, owing to the counsels of Clavière, and to a too finical susceptibility, fostered doubtless by the recent unanticipated triumphs.

In the county of Nice, the French had gloriously retaken the post of Sospello, which the Piedmontese had wrested from them for a moment, only to lose again after a considerable repulse. This success was owing to the ability of General Brunet. [illegible] also, which rode predominant in the waters of Mediterranean, appeared before Genoa and before Naples, where branches of the Bourbons reigned, in order to obtain from them, as indeed from all the Italian principalities, a formal recognition of French republic. After Naples had been cannonade, the reluctant and the French squadron in this signal avowal of its might.

In the Pyrenees, a dead inertness marked the season. Servan, from deficiency of means, experienced almost insurmountable difficulty in recomposing the army of observation. Notwithstanding the expenditure of from one hundred and eighty to two hundred millions [seven and a half to eight millions sterling] per month, all the armies, in the Pyrenees, in the Alps, and on the Moselle, were in ; forlorn condition, from the disorg out all the details of the service, and from the able confusion paramount in the ministry of war. Yet in the midst even of such untoward circumstances, the intoxication and pride of victory were diffused throughout France. At this instant, in truth, the most exalted ideas, stimulated by the victory of Jemappes, the taking of Frankfort, the occupation of Savoy and Nice, and the favourable reaction of opinion in Europe, filled all minds, and led to the confident anticipation that the doom of monarchies was at hand, that the nations were on the eve of annihilating thrones and resolving themselves into republics. "Ah! if it were true," exclaimed a member of the Jacobin Club, when discussing the junction of Savoy with France—"if it were true that the awakening of nations has come, that the overthrow of all thrones must ensue as a speedy consequence of the success of our armies, and of the revolutionary volcano; if it were true that republican virtue was at last about to avenge the world for crowned villany—that each country, restored to liberty, should form a government conformable to the extent, more or less considerable, assigned to it by nature—and that from all these national conventions a certain number of extraordinary deputies should compose an universal convention in the centre of the universe, vigilantly guarding over the integrity of the rights of man, the general freedom of commerce, and the peace of the human race!"*

The convention, at this same period, learning the severities inflicted by the Duke of Deux-Ponts upon certain subjects in his dependence, voted, in a burst of enthusiasm, the following decree:—

"The National Convention declares that it will grant succour and fraternity to all populations disposed to recover liberty; and it charges the executive power to give orders to the generals of the French armies, enjoining them to aid all citizens who have been or may be oppressed in the cause of freedom.

The National Convention commands the generals of the French armies to print and affix the present decree in all places to which they shall carry the arms of the Paris, the 19th of November 1792."

CHAPTER XVII.

PROCEEDINGS RELATIVE TO THE TRIAL OF LOUIS XVI. —HIS FIRST EXAMINATION ... CONVENTION.

The trial of XVI. was at length to be commenced, and the es awaited it to measure their to form of dists especially were with curious scrutiny, to surprise in them the bias towards commiseration, and to accuse of royalism, should fallen greatness move their sympathies.

* Speech of Milhaud, deputy of the Cantal, delivered at the Jacobin Club in November 1792.

The Jacobin party, wh ... of monarchy in the p of the ... XVI., had undoubtedly waxed in ... it still encountered a vigorous opposition ... and still more in the rest of France. It dominated in the capital by means of its club,* the commune, and the sections; but the middle class was resuming courage, and a resistance far from ... Pétion hav ty, the physician Chambon had obtained a large ... ity of votes, and accepted with reluctance functions ... were little suited to his moderate and unambitious character. This election proves the power still possessed by the burgher class even in Paris itself; and it was unquestionably much greater in the rest of France. The landowners, the traders, all the middle community in short, retained their places in the municipal councils, the departmental councils, and the popular societies, and sent addresses to the majority of the convention in favour of the laws and moderation. Several of the societies affiliated to the Jacobins disavowed the parent society, and strenuously demanded the expulsion of Marat—some even that of Robespierre. Finally, from the departments of the Mouths of the Rhone, Calvados, Finisterre, and the Gironde, new bands of federalists issued, who, anticipating the decrees for their enrolment as upon the occurrence of the 10th August, came to protect the convention and ensure its independence.

The Jacobins had not yet gained the armies; the staffs and the military organisation opposed continual obstacles. They had, however, completely carried one ministry—that of war. Pache had opened it to them from want of firmness, and displaced all its old functionaries for members of the club. In its offices the clerks spoke in the second person singular, wore shabby and squalid garments, and expatiated on motions; many

* The Jacobin Club has, perhaps, though often pourtrayed, never been more graphically depicted than by the pen of the author already quoted, in the History of the National Convention and its Principal Members.

"The club of the Jacobins," says he, "was veritably a co-ordinate part of the sovereign power, and the most energetic part too; it could not be sufficiently dreaded, so extreme was its jealous susceptibility, and so terrible its vengeance. It was for ever restless, apprehensive, suspicious, implacable, and ferocious; its conception of liberty was formed with the indispensable adjuncts of dungeons, irons, and streams of blood. All the evils, all the crimes, all the execrable resolutions, which rendered France a theatre of desolation during three years, originated in this infernal cavern. The Jacobins ruled with a crushing, gigantic, hideous tyranny, which sat upon us all like an enduring nightmare. An inquisition, terrible, furious, and yet wily, it upheld itself by a concerted system of terror, violence, and denunciation, and by the universal consternation it diffused. The most influential amongst the revolutionists derived from it all their strength, and at the same time ceased not to adulate and cajole the club, with al baseness and perseverance; for the mass of the club, in fact, held the power, and so much as individuals gained must revert to it, as to its sole legitimate origin.

No man of honour, no virtue arrayed in its inestimable attributes, could ever be endured in this society; it was in antithesis to all that was not in some respects impure and tainted. A robber, an assassin, found in it more affinity than the despoiled or the victim. The celebrated phrase, 'What hast thou done to be hanged, if the old system be restored?' was equally applicable in a moral as in a political sense. Whoever presented himself with a reputation free from reproach was of necessity suspected; but the branded inspired interest, and felt himself in harmony, in fraternal association with the habitual inmates of the sewer. The club met in the old convent of the Jacobins, in the Rue St Honoré; the hall had formerly been the library, and was of vast dimensions, in the Gothic style of architecture. It was ornamented with tricoloured banners, anarchical devices, and portraits and busts of the most famous revolutionists. I myself saw, some time before the murder of Louis XVI., two portraits, those of Jacques Clement and Ravaillac, hung with garlands of oak, in the form of civic crowns; underneath were their names, with slew a king."—Vol. i. p.

of them were married

Pache's son-in-law, and himself a married priest. One of the heads of this ministry was Hassenfratz, formerly an inhabitant of Metz, driven from home on account of bankruptcy, and, like many others, elevated to high functions from manifesting great demagogical zeal. Thus the military administration was in the course of modification, and the armies were, as much as possible, filled with a new class, and impressed with new opinions. Thus also, whilst Roland was exposed to the implacable hatred of the Jacobins, Pache was cherished and extolled by them. His mildness, his modesty, his great capacity, were all highly praised, and bitterly contrasted with the severity of Roland, which was stigmatised as pride. Roland had scrupulously avoided allowing the Jacobins admission to his ministry of the interior. Examining the reports of the constituted authorities, curbing those who transgressed the prescribed limits, maintaining the public tranquillity, keeping a watchful eye on the popular societies, providing plentiful supplies of provisions, protecting trade and property; in a word, vigilantly attending to all the internal administration of the state, formed his multitudinous duties, and he performed them with distinguished energy and diligence. Scarcely a day passed but he denounced the commune, and exclaimed against its abuses of power, its peculations, and its missions of envoys; he intercepted its correspondence, as likewise that of the Jacobins, and substituted for their violent communications others replete with moderation, which every where produced a most auspicious effect. All the estates of emigrants which had lapsed to the state, likewise fell under his superintending care; the supplies of food, and the suppression of disorders springing from that source, engrossed a considerable portion of his attention; and he had in some sort to multiply himself, in order effectually to oppose the revolutionary passions, and to vindicate the authority of the law, whensoever efficient means were at his disposal. Hence the different aspects under which Pache and Roland appeared to the eyes of Jacobins, may be readily conceived. The families of the two ministers also contributed to render the discrepancy more striking. The wife and daughters of Pache attended the clubs and sections, even visited the barracks of the federalists, whom zealous efforts were made to gain over to the cause; and, by a grovelling Jacobinism, stood in strong relief from the polished and haughty consort of Roland, encompassed by brilliant but odious orators, the choicest ornaments of the national representation.

Pache and Roland, therefore, were the two men around whom their colleagues rallied in the council. Clavière, minister of finance, although often embroiled with the rest, from the extreme irascibility of his temper, always sided with Roland when he was appeased. Le Brun, weak in character, but attached to the Girondists from the sympathy of an accomplished mind, transacted much of his official business in concert with Brissot; and the Jacobins, decrying the latter as an intriguer, asserted that he was master of the whole government, because he assisted Le Brun in the toils of diplomacy. Garat, contemplating the parties from a metaphysical elevation, contented himself with judging them, feeling himself relieved from any necessity to combat the one or the other. He seemed to consider that he was justified in withholding active support from the Girondists, because he discerned them not free from faults, and deemed his inertness the wisdom of a superior mind. The Jacobins, meanwhile, were well contented with the neutrality of so distinguished a man, viewing it as an inestimable gain, and rewarded Garat with lavish eulogies. Lastly, Monge, of mathematical precision and zealous patriotism, was but little disposed to adopt the somewhat vague theories of the Girondists; and, following the example of Pache, he allowed his offices to be overrun by the Jacobins. Thus, without altogether repudiating the Girondists, to whom he owed his advancement, he received the praises of their adversaries, and partook the popularity of the minister-at-war.

The Jacobin party, consequently, with two complaisant instruments in Pache and Monge, and an ideologist in Garat keeping himself aloof, but an inexorable opponent in Roland, who drew to his standard Le Brun and Clavière, and often carried even the others with him, was yet far from wielding the government of the state, and perpetually exclaimed that the only novelty in the new order of things was a king the less, but with that exception, there still existed the same despotism, the same intrigues, the same treasons. It contended, in the like strain, that the revolution would never be complete and irrevocable until destruction had fallen on the secret author of all machinations and all resistances, immured in the Temple.

Thus we have endeavoured to pourtray the respective strength of the parties, and the state of the revolution, at the moment the trial of Louis XVI was entered upon. That prince with his family occupied the great tower of the Temple. The commune, having the disposition of the armed force, and the charge of the police in the capital, was intrusted with the guard of the Temple, and to its distrustful, gloomy, and ungenerous superintendence, the royal family was wholly subject. Guarded by a class of men greatly inferior to that of which the convention was principally composed, that unfortunate family found it need not expect either the moderation or the attentions which a liberal education and polite manners always command for misfortune. It had been placed at first in the little tower, but was subsequently transferred to the larger tower, because it was deemed of more easy and secure wardenship. The king occupied one floor, and the princesses with the children the other. During the day they were brought together, and suffered to pass the dismal hours of captivity in each other's society. A single domestic had obtained permission to follow them to prison: this was the faithful Cléry, who, having escaped the massacre of the 10th of August, had ventured into the midst of Paris in order to serve in their downfall those whom he had tended in the zenith of their power. He was accustomed to rise at dawn, and multiply himself, so to speak, to compensate the loss of those numerous servitors who were wont to attend his august patrons. At nine o'clock, breakfast was served in the king's chamber, and at ten the whole family repaired to the queen's apartment. Louis XVI. then devoted himself to the instruction of his son. He made him learn a few verses of Racine or Corneille, and afterwards imparted to him the elements of geography, a science he had himself cultivated with considerable ardour and success. The queen, on her part, took charge of her daughter's education, and subsequently joined her sister-in-law in weaving tapestry. At one o'clock, when the weather was fine, the whole family was conducted into the garden, to inhale the fresh air, and indulge in a short promenade. Several officers of the municipality and guard accompanied the royal captives, and, varying with the persons, they sometimes encountered humane and sympathetic countenances, at others, harsh and insulting. Uncultivated men are rarely generous, and in their eyes grandeur atoned for even when stricken to the dust.
imagine uncouth artisans, almost wholly uned masters of that family, for having so long endured whose power and ministered to whose luxury they continually upbraided themselves, we may form an idea of the brutal outrages sometimes perpetrated on it. The king and queen were often compelled to listen to ferocious epithets, and perceived on the walls of the courts and corridors [illegible] expressing a hatred which the old government had frequently merited, but which neither Louis XVI. nor his consort had done any thing to provoke. They occasionally experienced some consolation, however, in detecting stealthy expressions of interest; and they continued those cheerless promenades on account of their children, to whom air and exercise were so essential. Whilst they thus mournfully paced the court of the Temple, they recognised at the windows of the adjoining houses many old retainers still attached to their fortunes, who came to contemplate the narrow space in which the dethroned monarch was confined. At two o'clock the promenade terminated, and dinner was served. After that repast, the king took some repose; whilst he slumbered, his wife, sister, and daughter, wrought in silence, and Cléry exercised in another room the young dauphin in the games of boyhood. They afterwards heard a work read aloud, supped, and finally retired to their respective apartments after a painful farewell, for they never parted without sorrow. The king continued to read for several hours alone: Montesquieu, Buffon, the historian Hume, the Imitation of Jesus Christ, and certain Latin and Italian classics, formed his habitual study. He had finished about two hundred and fifty volumes when he left the Temple.

Such was the life of this monarch during his sad captivity. Reduced to private life, all his virtues shone to advantage, and he evinced himself worthy the esteem of every dispassionate and honourable mind. His bitterest enemies, beholding him so meek, tranquil, and pure, could scarcely have avoided an involuntary emotion of respect, and would have surely pardoned the errors of the prince in deference to the virtues of the man.

The commune, to the last degree suspicious, used the most vexatious precautions. Municipal officers had their eyes incessantly on the persons of the royal family, and only when in bed did they consent to be separated from them by a closed door. During those hours they placed a bed before the doorway of each apartment, so as to block all egress, and there passed the night. Santerre, accompanied by his staff, made a daily visit of inspection throughout the tower, of which he rendered a regular account. The municipal officers on duty formed a sort of permanent council, which, sitting in a room of the tower, was appointed to issue orders and adjudicate upon all the requests of the prisoners. At first they had allowed pens, ink, and paper, in the jail, but those articles were shortly withdrawn, as also all sharp instruments, table and pen knives, razors, and scissors, and the most minute and offensive searches were instituted to discover whether any of such objects might not have been concealed. This procedure involved a serious affliction to the princesses, since they were thenceforth deprived of the resources of the needle, and were disabled from repairing their garments, already in a sufficiently dilapidated condition, not having been changed since their incarceration in the Temple. Almost every thing appertaining to the personal use of the royal family had been destroyed in the sack of the palace. The consort of the British ambassador* sent linen to the queen, and the commune, upon the king's application, caused the whole family to be supplied. The king and queen never thought it worth while to ask for new clothes or habiliments, although there is no doubt they would have been amply furnished had they expressed the requisite wish. In the concerns of the purse, a sum of 2000 francs [£80] was given them in the month of September for their personal expenses; but it had been determined to grant them no more money, as fears were entertained of the purposes to which they might apply it. A sum was deposited in the hands of the governor of the Temple, and on the petition of the captives, the different articles they needed were purchased for their use.

There is no need to exaggerate [illegible] frailty, and thus conclude that the keepers of the royal family, uniting an execrable vileness with [illegible] fanaticism, subjected it at caprice to [illegible] tions, exulting at the idea of rendering [illegible] reminiscence more acute. Caution was the only [illegible] for certain denials. Consequently, whilst the dread of plots and communications prevented more than one servant being allowed in the interior of the prison, a numerous establishment was employed in preparing the food of the prisoners. Thirteen [illegible] to the palate were planted in a range of kitchens not far from the tower. In the accounts of expenditure in the Temple, in which an exemplary propriety is observed, the prisoners are mentioned in terms of respect, their frugality is lauded, and Louis XVI. absolved from the vulgar opprobrium of indulging too freely in wine; these unimpeachable accounts carry the charges of the table to 28,745 francs [£1197] in two months. Whilst thirteen domestics crowded the kitchen, one only was permitted to enter the prison and assist Cléry in waiting at table. Yet, such is the ingenuity of captivity, it was by this solitary attendant, whose sensibility Cléry had succeeded in arousing, that intelligence from without sometimes reached the recesses of the Temple. Its wretched inmates had been constantly left in ignorance of the course of events. The representatives of the commune had contented themselves with communicating the journals which recorded the victories of the republic, accounts which extinguished any hopes that might still linger in their breasts.

Cléry had imagined an adroit expedient to gain tidings of the current events, which succeeded tolerably well. By means of an intercourse he contrived to maintain outside, he procured a public crier to be selected, bribed, and instructed to stand beneath the windows of the Temple, and under pretext of vending newspapers, to recapitulate the principal details with all the strength of his lungs. Cléry, who was apprised of the hour, placed himself near the adjacent embrasure, stored up all he heard, and in the evening, leaning over the king's bed, when engaged in drawing the curtains, related to him what he had learned. Such is a sketch of the situation in which the royal family of France, fallen from the pinnacle of greatness into the gloom of a dungeon, was placed, and of the manner in which the inventive zeal of a faithful servant contended with the harsh suspicions of its keepers.

The committees had at length adjusted their conclusions respecting the trial of Louis XVI. Dufriche-Valazé had presented a preliminary report upon the delinquencies imputed to the monarch, and on the documents relied upon as proofs. This report, too voluminous for perusal in the convention, had been printed by its orders, and distributed to each of its members. On the 7th November, the deputy Maille brought up, in the name of the committee of legislation, the report upon the important questions which the intended process started:—

Can Louis XVI. be tried?

What tribunal is competent to pronounce judgment?

Such were the two essential questions opened to discussion—questions well calculated to deeply agitate the minds of all men. The printing of the report was ordered forthwith. Translated into all languages and profusely disseminated, it soon penetrated into every corner of France and Europe. The debate thereon was adjourned to the 13th, contrary to the wish of Billaud-Varennes, who maintained that the affirmative of the first question should be voted by acclamation.

Now was to be waged the final contest between the ideas of the Constituent Assembly and of the convention, and this struggle was necessarily the more violent, since the life or death of a king hung upon its issue. The Constituent Assembly had been democratic in its tendencies, but monarchical in its feelings. Thus, whilst it constituted the whole state upon a republican model, from a remnant of attachment and respect for Louis XVI. it retained royalty with the attributes deemed befitting it in a system of limited feudal monarchy. Hereditary succession, the executive power, participation in the enactment of laws, and above all, inviolability—such are the prerogatives recognised in the throne under modern monarchies, and such the first national assembly had left to the reigning house. The participation in legislative authority and the executive power are functions liable to variations in their extent, and do not constitute modern royalty so essentially as hereditary descent and inviolability. Of these two last attributes, the one secures the perpetual and natural transmission of royalty, the other fences it from all attack in the person of each heir; and both together render it something eternal, never in abeyance, and something invulnerable, amenable to no penalty. Obliged to act only by ministers, who are responsible for its deeds, royalty is accessible only through its agents, and thus a point is open by which it may be humbled without endangering its stability. Such I hold to be the feudal monarchy, as successively modified by time, and harmonised with the degree of liberty enjoyed by modern nations.

* The British ambassador at that period was the Earl of Gower, the late Duke of Sutherland, and the lady referred to was the Countess of Sutherland.

The Constituent Assembly, however, had been induced to place a restriction upon the royal inviolability. The flight to Varennes and the enterprises of the emigrants had convinced it that ministerial responsibility was not an adequate guarantee to the nation against all the possible faults of royalty. It had in consequence provided for an emergency, in which the monarch should put himself at the head of a hostile army to assail the constitution of the state, or should even not oppose, by a formal act, an enterprise of that nature undertaken in his name. Upon such a contingency it had declared the monarch, not indictable under the ordinary laws against felony, but dethroned; in fact, judged to have abdicated royalty. Such was the precise language of the law it had passed. The prayer to accept the constitution, addressed by it to the king, and the acceptance on his part, had rendered the contract irrevocable; and the assembly had accordingly incurred the solemn obligation to keep sacred the person of the monarch.

It was with this express engagement entangling them that the members of the convention found themselves, when called upon to decide the fate of Louis XVI. But these new representatives, assembled under the name of conventionalists, alleged themselves not more bound by the institutions of their predecessors than the latter had considered themselves shackled by the antiquated institutions of feudalism. So rapid an impulse had been given to opinion, that the laws of 1791 appeared as absurd to the generation of 1792, as those of the 13th century had seemed to that of 1789. The conventionalists, therefore, repudiated the sanction of a law they decried as absurd, in the same spirit as the states-general had declared against the existence of the three orders.

Consequently, upon the opening of the debate, on the 13th November, two opposite opinions were of course expressed; some maintained the inviolability, others absolutely rejected it. Ideas had undergone so remarkable a change, that no member of the convention ventured to vindicate the inviolability on its own merits; its advocates, on the contrary, defended it simply as a prior enactment, the benefit of which accrued to the monarch, and which could not be denied him without violating a national engagement. But even very few deputies supported it on the ground of an obligation incurred, and the Girondists condemned it in that light. They remained aloof from the debate, however, and sat as calm observers of the discussion between the scanty partisans of the inviolability and its numerous opponents.

"In the first place," contended the adversaries of the inviolability, "to render an engagement valid, it is necessary that he who incurs it should have the right so to do. Now, the [illegible] is inalienable, and cannot be fettered by anticipation. The nation may, certainly, when covenanting the inviolability, have rendered the executive power inaccessible to the assaults of the legislative power, for such was a political precaution expedient in the system of the Constituent Assembly; but if it rendered the king inviolable with regard to all the constituted bodies, it could not render him inviolable with regard to itself, for it can never renounce the faculty of doing and willing all things at all times; this faculty constitutes its omnipotence, which is inalienable; therefore the nation was not competent to bind itself to Louis XVI., and it cannot be estopped by an engagement it had no power to contract.

Secondly, even supposing the engagement possible, it must be taken to be reciprocal. Now, it never was so on the part of Louis XVI. That constitution, upon which he is so anxious at present to lay stress, he never desired, but always protested against it, and never ceased to attempt its destruction, not only by internal conspiracies but by the swords of enemies. What right, then, has he to plead its guarantee?

But admitting for the instant that the engagement was possible and reciprocal, it must furthermore be consistent with reason in order to be valid. Thus, there is nothing repugnant to comprehension in an inviolability bearing on all the ostensible acts for which a minister answers in lieu of the king. For all acts of this nature a guarantee subsists in the ministerial responsibility, and the inviolability, not being impunity, ceases to be inconsistent with reason, in other words, ceases to be absurd. But for all the secret acts, such as hidden plots, communications with the enemy, treasons in short, what minister can there be to countersign or incur the responsibility? And yet such acts are to remain unpunished, although the gravest and most criminal of all! That corollary is inadmissible; it must be acknowledged that the king, inviolable for the acts of his administration, ceases to be so for secret and criminal acts endangering the public safety. So a deputy, inviolable in his legislative character, an ambassador in his diplomatic character, are not so as regards all the actions of their private lives. Inviolability, therefore, has limits; and there are points upon which the king ceases to be shielded from attack. Will it be alleged that dethronement is the penalty prescribed against perfidies for which a minister is not answerable? That is to say, the mere privation of his power is to be the sole chastisement inflicted on a monarch for having so outrageously abused it! The people whom he has betrayed and delivered over to the sword of the foreigner and to every conceivable calamity, are to content themselves with saying, Withdraw! Such justice is purely illusory; and no nation can be so wanting to itself as to leave unpunished crimes committed against its existence and its liberty.

A known penalty, it is true, one assigned in a prior law, is requisite to enable its application to a delinquency. But are there not the ordinary penalties against treason? Are not those penalties the same in all codes? Was not the monarch cognisant, from the morality of all times and all regions, that treason is a crime, and that by the laws of all nations such a crime is punished with the last severity? But besides a penal law, a tribunal is needed. Behold, then, the sovereign nation, uniting in itself all powers—the right to judge as well as the right to [illegible] laws, to declare peace or war; it is before you with its omnipotence, its universality, and there is no function above its capacity to perform. This nation is the convention which represents it, with a mandate to do all for its behoof—to avenge, to constitute, to [illegible]ve. The convention, [illegible] is competent to try Louis XVI.; it has [illegible]ers; it is the most independent, the most elevated tribunal an accused could select; and unless he desiderates partisans or paid emissaries of the enemy to obtain justice, the monarch cannot desire other judges. Thus he will have the same men for accusers and judges. But if, in the ordinary tribunals, exposed in an inferior sphere to individual and particular provocatives to error, the functions are separated and care is taken that an accusation should not be adjudicated by those who have instituted it, in the general council of the nation, which is placed paramount to all interests, all individual motives, the same precautions are no longer necessary. The nation cannot err, and the deputies who represent it partake its infallibility as well as its powers.

"Thus, to sum up, the contracted in 1791 being impotent to bind being without reciprocity, and, furthermore, an absurd conclusion, that treason may be c with impunity, is altogether null, and Louis XVI. may be brought to trial. With regard to the punishment, it has been known from all time, has been prescribed in all laws. As to the tribunal, it rests in the convention, invested with all legislative, executive, and judicial powers."

These orators, therefore, demanded, in conformity with the report of the committee, "that Louis XVI. should be tried; that the trial should take place before the National Convention; that the articles of impeachment should be framed by a select committee; that he should appear in person to plead thereto; that counsel should be allowed him in his defence; and that immediately after being heard, the convention should pronounce its judgment, each member vivâ voce."

The advocates of the inviolability left none of these reasons unanswered, and refuted the whole system of their opponents.

"It is argued," said they, "that the nation cannot alienate its sovereignty, or abrogate its right to punish a delinquency perpetrated against itself; that the inviolability proclaimed in 1791 bound merely the legislative body, but not the nation in its collective capacity. In the first place, if it be correct that the national sovereignty cannot be alienated or restricted in the right to make new laws, it is equally correct that the past at least is beyond its control; for instance, it is incapable of obliterating what has been—it cannot take from the laws it had previously promulgated the operation they have already had, or annul indemnities they have pronounced. It is perfectly competent to declare that, for the future, monarchs shall cease to be inviolable; but it cannot prevent them being so retrospectively, inasmuch as it has so declared them; it is, in short, disabled from violating engagements contracted with third parties, in respect to whom it became a simple party when covenanting with them. Thus, therefore, a case is established in which the national sovereignty could bind itself for a period; it intended to do so in the amplest manner, not only for the legislative body, which it interdicted from all judicial action against the king, but for itself, because the political object of the inviolability would have been frustrated, had royalty not been placed paramount to all attack whatsoever, as well on the part of the nation as of the constituted authorities.

With regard to the want of reciprocity in the operation of the engagement, the difficulty has been forestalled. The possibility of a failure in fidelity to the engagement, was foreseen by the engagement itself. All the modes in which such failure could occur are comprehended in one, the most grave conceivable, war against the nation, and are with it punished by dethronement, that is to say, by the dissolution of the contract existing between the nation and the king. The want of reciprocity, therefore, is not a reason sufficient to relieve the nation from its pledge of inviolability.

The engagement, then, was substantial and absolute; equally obligatory on the nation as on the legislative body; the lack of reciprocity was foreknown, and cannot be adduced in allegation of a nudum pactum; and we finally proceed to show that, under the monarchical system, such a contract was not incompatible with reason, and cannot be assailed on the ground of absurdity. This inviolability, in fact, left no crime unpunished, whatever may be alleged to the contrary. The ministerial responsibility extended to every act, because a king can no more conspire than govern without agents; and thus public justice had always its resource. And those secret crimes, distinct from the ostensible delinquencies of administration, were foreseen and punished with forfeiture; for every fault on the part of the king was atoned for, according to that legislation, by the cessation of his functions. To this it is opposed, that forfeiture is not a penalty, as it amounts simply to the privation of a means abused by the monarch. But, under a system in which the royal person was intended to be unassailable, the severity of the punishment was not the important consideration; the essential point was its political result; and this result was effectually obtained by the deprivation of power. Besides, is the loss of the first throne in the universe really no punishment? Can a man, without deep affliction, forfeit a diadem which from infancy has encircled his brow, with which the years of his life have been passed, and a homage of twenty years commanded? To minds nurtured in supreme rank, is not such a punishment equivalent to death? But, even were the penalty too mild, it is based upon an express stipulation; and an insufficiency of punishment cannot be a cause of nullity in a law. It is a maxim in criminal legislation, that all mistakes in the law should redound to the advantage of the accused, upon the equitable principle that the errors of the strong should not be visited upon the weak and powerless. Thus, therefore, the engagement, already demonstrated to be valid and absolute, involves no absurdity; it stipulates no impunity, nor is treason left unpunished. Consequently, there is no need to recur either to natural right or to the nation, inasmuch as deposition is already prescribed by an existing law. This penalty the king has undergone, without any tribunal pronouncing it, and after the only possible procedure, that of a national insurrection. Dethroned at this moment, in an utter impossibility of acting, France may do nothing more against him than pursue precautionary measures for his safe keeping. Let her banish him from her territory for her own security; let her detain him, if she please, until the peace; or let her leave him to become a private citizen in the heart of the land: this is all she is justified in doing, all she can do. It is therefore quite unnecessary to constitute a tribunal, or to discuss the competency of the convention: on the 10th August all was finished for Louis XVI.; on the 10th August he ceased to be a king; on the 10th August he was put upon his trial, judged, deposed, and all was consummated between him and the nation."

Such was the answer of the partisans of the inviolability to their adversaries. The national sovereignty being taken as it was then interpreted, their rejoinders must be deemed victorious, and all the reasonings of the committees of legislation mere laboured sophisms, false and vapid.

Our immediate task has been to condense the arguments used on the two sides of the question in regular debate. But another system, a distinct opinion, sprung from the exaltation of minds and passions. At the Jacobin Club, and in the ranks of the Mountain, it had been already asked whether any discussion, any trial, any forms in short, were necessary to get rid of the man known as a tyrant, taken with arms in his hands, and shedding the blood of the nation. This opinion had a formidable organ in the young Saint-Just, an austere and passionless fanatic, who, at the age of twenty, meditated a perfectly ideal society, in which should reign absolute equality, simplicity, austerity, and indomitable energy. Long before the 10th August he dwelt, in the depths of this hypernatural society, and had arrived through fanaticism at that extreme point of human ideas which Robespierre had reached through intensity of hate alone. New amidst the revolution, into which he had scarcely entered, as yet a stranger to all the discords, wrongs, and crimes of parties, siding with the faction of the Mountain from the violence of his opinions, delighting the Jacobins by his boldness of spirit, surprising the convention by his talents, he had not yet, however, gained any popular fame. His ideas, though always favourably heard, but not always distinctly comprehended, did not produce all their effect until they had become, by the plagiarisms of Robespierre, more common, clear, and declamatory.

He spoke after Morisson, the most zealous amongst the defenders of the inviolability, and, indulging in no personalities against his opponents, for he was not old enough on the scene to have contracted personal enmities, the whole force of his indignation was at first directed against the petty ideas of the assembly, and the casuistry of the debate. "What!" said he, "you, the committee and its adversaries, laboriously seek for forms whereby to try the late king—tormenting yourselves to make of him a citizen, to raise him to that quality, so that you may find laws applicable to him! And I, on the contrary, say that the king is not a citizen; that he ought to be judged as an enemy; that we have not so much to try as to combat him; and that, standing for nothing in the contract which unites the French, the forms of the procedure are not to be sought in the civil law, but in the law of nations."

Thus, therefore, Saint-Just repudiated the process as involving a question of justice, but saw in it simply a question of martial law.

"To try a king as a citizen!" he proceeded. "Such a phrase will astonish posterity! To try, is to apply the law; law is an emanation of justice: what relation of justice, I ask, can exist between humanity and kings?

Simply to reign is an offence—an usurpation which nothing can justify, which a nation is culpable to endure, and against which every man has an individual right. It is impossible to reign innocently; the absurdity of the thing is too great. The usurpation ought to be treated as kings themselves treat that of their pretended authority. Is not the memory of Cromwell arraigned for having usurped the authority of Charles I.? And yet, the one was no more an usurper than the other; for, when a nation is base enough to let tyrants domineer over it, the domination is the right of him who can seize it, and is not one whit more sacred or legitimate in the hands of one than in those of another."

Passing to the topic of forms, Saint-Just perceived in the consideration only fresh errors and inconsistencies. Forms of process were, he alleged, but so much hypocrisy; it was not the manner of arraignment which had justified all the recorded acts of vengeance wreaked by nations on kings, it was the right of force against force.

"It will be one day a matter of astonishment," he exclaimed, "that in the eighteenth century ideas were more backward than in the time of Cæsar: then, the tyrant was immolated in full senate, without other formality than the points of twenty-three daggers, and without other law than the liberty of Rome. And now, you enter with respect on the indictment of a man, the assassin of a people, caught in flagrant crime!"

Viewing the question under another aspect, without reference to Louis XVI., Saint-Just animadverted upon the tendency to refinement and subtlety, so detrimental, as he contended, in affairs of great moment. The life of Louis XVI. was of no consequence; the spirit to be evinced by his judges was what disquieted him; the estimate they should present of themselves was what mainly concerned him. "The men who are about to judge Louis XVI. have a republic to found, and those who attach any importance to the just chastisement of a king, will never found a republic. Since the report, a certain doubt has manifested itself. Each considers the trial of the king under his own peculiar views: some seem to fear the future consequences of their courage; others have not renounced hopes of monarchy; these dread an example of virtue which would tighten the bonds of union.

We all judge each other with severity, I will even say with fury; we think only of modifying the energy of the people and of liberty, whilst the common enemy is scarcely noticed, and whilst all, either paralysed by weakness or immersed in crime, stand in mutual survey before striking the first blow!

Citizens, if the Roman people, after six hundred years of virtue and of hatred to kings, if Great Britain, after the death of Cromwell, saw kings restored in spite of their energy, what fears may not oppress good citizens amongst us, the true friends of liberty, when they behold the axe tremble in our hands, and a nation, even in the first moment of its freedom, respect the memory of its fetters? What republic will you establish amidst our individual contests and our common failings? I will always uphold the doctrine, that the spirit in which you judge the king will be the same as that in which you will establish the republic. The measure of your philosophy in that judgment will be likewise the measure of freedom in the constitution!"

There were men, however, who, less fanaticised than Saint-Just, endeavoured to place the question upon juster grounds, and lead the assembly to consider it under a more favourable and equitable point of view. "Reflect," said Rouzet,* "upon the veritable situation of the king in the constitution of 1791. He was placed before the national representation in a position of constrained rivalry. Was it not natural he should seek to recover as much as possible of the power he had lost? Was it not yourselves who had opened the lists, and called him to the combat with the legislative power? Well, in these lists he has been conquered; he is now a captive, disarmed, prostrate at the feet of twenty-five millions of men, and these twenty-five millions would have the useless baseness to immolate the vanquished! But, furthermore," added Rouzet, "that perpetual craving for dominion, a lust which actuates all hearts, Louis XVI. has stifled in his bosom more than any sovereign in the world. Did he not make in 1789 a voluntary sacrifice of part of his authority? Did he not renounce many of the prerogatives his predecessors scrupled not to exercise? Did he not abolish servitude in his domains? Did he not call to his council philosophic ministers, and even empirics whom the public voice pointed out? Did he not convoke the states-general, and restore to the third-estate a portion of its rights?"

Faure, a deputy from the Lower-Seine, evinced even greater boldness. Reverting to the conduct of Louis XVI., he ventured to vindicate the reminiscence. "The wrath of the people," said he, "might have been stimulated against Titus as well as against Nero, for crimes might have been found against him, were they those only committed before Jerusalem. But where are those you impute to Louis XVI.? I have listened with the greatest attention to the documents read against him; I have detected in them simply the weakness of a man who yields to all the hopes suggested to him of recovering his former authority; and I maintain that all the monarchs who have died peaceably in their beds were more culpable than he. The good Louis XII., even, by sacrificing 50,000 Frenchmen in Italy, in his private quarrel, was infinitely more criminal! A civil list, a veto, the choice of his ministers, women, kinsmen, courtiers, such the seductions of Capet!—and what seductions! I invoke Aristides and Epictetus; let them say whether their firmness could have withstood such assaults. It is upon the heart of frail mortals I rest my estimate of principles or errors. Arise, then, to the full grandeur of the national sovereignty; reflect with what magnanimity such a power should bear itself. Call Louis XVI. not as a criminal, but as a Frenchman, before you, and say to him, Those who once raised thee on their bucklers and saluted thee as king, now depose thee; thou promised to be their father, and thou wert not. Expiate, by thy virtues as a citizen, the conduct thou hast pursued as a king!"

* Sitting of the 15th November.

In the extraordinary excitement of the epoch, each was led to view the question under different phases. Fauchet, the constitutional priest who had gained celebrity in 1789 by using in the pulpit the language of the revolution, demanded whether society had a right to inflict the penalty of death. "Has society the right," said he, "to take from a man the life it has not given? Doubtless it ought to screen itself from danger, but is it true it can only do so by the death of the offender? And if it can by other means, is it not bound to employ them? In this case, more than in any other, the maxim is applicable. You allege it is for the public interest, for the consolidation of the new-born republic, that you are to immolate Louis XVI.! But will all his family perish by the same blow that annihilates him? According to the system of hereditary succession, does not one king immediately succeed another? Are you freed, by the death of Louis XVI., from the rights an entire family deems itself to hold from a possession of several centuries? The destruction of one alone is manifestly fruitless. On the contrary, let the actual head who closes all access to the others remain; suffer him to exist with the hatred wherewith he is regarded by all aristocrats for his vacillations and his concessions; suffer him to languish with his reputation for imbecility, with the ignominy of his defeat, and you will have less to apprehend from him than from any other. Allow this deposed monarch to wander within the vast circuit of your republic, shorn of that splendour wont to encompass him; show how small a thing is a king when reduced to himself; testify a profound disdain for the remembrance of what he was, and that remembrance will cease to have any vigour; you will thereby give a great example to mankind, and secure stability and integrity to the republic much more effectually than by shedding blood which does not belong to you. As to the son of Louis XVI., if he can wax into a man, we will make a citizen of him, like young Egalité. He will fight for the republic, and we need never fear that a single soldier of liberty will at any time aid him in becoming a traitor to the country. Let us thus demonstrate to all nations that we dread nothing; let us induce them to imitate us, so that all in concert may form an European congress, depose their sovereigns, send those emasculated beings to drag out their obscure lives amidst the flourishing republics; and even grant them small pensions, for such creatures are so devoid of faculties, that want itself would not teach them to earn their bread. Present, then, this bright example of the abolition of a barbarous punishment. Suppress the iniquitous usage of shedding blood; and above all, cure the people of that unwholesome longing they have to spill it. Strive to assuage in them that thirst which perverse men would whet, to use it hereafter in overthrowing the republic. Recollect that certain barbarians still ask from you one hundred and fifty thousand heads, and that after conceding the king's, you will be unable to refuse them any. Prevent crimes which will long agitate the heart of the republic, dishonour liberty, slacken its progress, and delay the era of the world's happiness."

This debate continued from the 13th till the 30th November, and excited an universal agitation. Those whom the new order of things had not swept into its vortex, and who preserved some recollection of 1789, of the goodness of the monarch, and of the love that was borne him, could not comprehend that this same king, suddenly transformed into a tyrant, should be consigned to a scaffold. Whilst they admitted his correspondence with foreigners, they imputed this fault to his weakness, to those around him, or to the invincible love of hereditary power; and the supposition of an ignominious punishment shocked their feelings. They dared not, however, openly undertake the defence of Louis XVI. The recent peril to which the country had been exposed by the Prussian invasion, and the opinion generally entertained that the court was the secret instigator of that inroad on the French territory, had aroused an exasperation which fell heavily on the unfortunate monarch, and the force of which the boldest shrunk from encountering. They contented themselves with resisting in a general manner those who clamoured for acts of vengeance; they represented them as the fomentors of disturbances, as Septembrisers, who wished to cover France with blood and devastation. Without defending Louis XVI. by name, they advocated moderation towards fallen enemies. They exhorted all to beware of a hypocritical energy, which, pretending to defend the republic by judicial murders, sought only to enslave it by terror, or compromise it with all Europe.

The Girondists had not yet taken part in the discussion. It was surmised, ere their opinion was known, and the Mountain, in order to have grounds for accusing them, confidently asserted, that they desired to save Louis XVI. They were not decided, however, on the subject. On the one hand, rejecting the inviolability, and regarding Louis XVI. as an accomplice of the foreign invasion, and on the other, moved at the contemplation of a dismal reverse, and inclined on all occasions to oppose the violence of their adversaries, they knew not what course to follow, and preserved a doubtful and threatening silence.

Another subject agitated the public mind at this moment, and occasioned as much ferment as the other. We refer to the supplies of food, which had been a plentiful source of discord at all periods of the revolution.

We have already seen how many anxious and arduous moments this cause had occasioned Bailly and Necker during the troubled era of 1789. The same difficulties presented themselves in a still more aggravated shape at the end of 1792, accompanied by movements of the most formidable character. The suspension of trade in all commodities not of the first necessity, may seriously affect industry and ultimately press upon the labouring classes; but when grain, the indispensable aliment, fails, commotions and disorders immediately ensue. Thus, the old police had ranked the care of supplies in the number of its duties, as one of the matters most affecting the public tranquillity.

The crops were not deficient in 1792, but the harvest had been retarded by ungenial weather, and the thrashing of the corn impeded by a lack of hands. But the chief cause of the scarcity existed elsewhere. In 1792, as in 1789, the want of security, the dread of pillage on the highways, and vexations in the markets, prevented the farmers from bringing forward their stocks. A clamour was forthwith raised against forestalling. Indignation was chiefly expressed against the rich farmers, who were styled aristocrats, and whose extensive farms, it was contended, ought to be divided. The greater the exasperation aroused against them, the less they were disposed to appear in the markets, and the more the scarcity increased. The assignats had likewise contributed to produce this result. Many farmers, who sold merely to accumulate, were careless about hoarding a variable paper currency, and preferred keeping their corn. Furthermore, as wheat became daily more scarce and assignats more plentiful, the disproportion between the symbol and the reality kept a corresponding pace, and the enhancement of price grew more and more sensible. By an accident usual in all famines, foresight being awakened by alarm, every one was eager to get into stock; private families, the municipalities, the government, made extensive purchases, and consequently rendered produce more scarce and dear. At Paris especially, the municipality committed a very grave and antiquated blunder; it bought corn in the neighbouring departments and sold it under value, with the twofold view of relieving the people and augmenting its popularity. It thence resulted that the merchants, overborne by this rivalry, withdrew from the market, and the rural population, attracted by the low price, came to Paris and absorbed a part of the supplies collected at heavy cost by the police. These imprudent measures, suggested by erroneous ideas of economy and an excessive lust of popularity, destroyed commerce, so essentially necessary to Paris, where a greater quantity of grain ought always to be amassed than at any other point. The causes of the scarcity were, therefore, multifarious; the alarm of the farmers keeping them aloof from the markets, the enhancement of price occasioned by the assignats, the eagerness to lay in stores, and, finally, the intervention of the Parisian municipality disarranging trade by its overpowering competition.

Under circumstances of such difficulty, the part which the two orders of men who then divided the sovereignty of France would take is easy of divination. The violent spirits who had hitherto known but one means of repelling opposition, the destruction of their opponents—who, to stifle conspiracies, had massacred all those they suspected to be against them—to such minds only one expedient, force, still force, presented itself to terminate the scarcity. They maintained that the farmers must be goaded from their sluggishness, and compelled to appear in the markets; that when there they should be constrained to sell their produce at a price fixed by the communes; that the corn should not be permitted to be removed from the place of sale or be accumulated in the granaries of those they stigmatised as engrossers. They therefore demanded the forced presence of the dealers in the markets, the limitation of price or the maximum, the prohibition of all transit—in a word, the obedience of trade to their desires, not from the ordinary attraction of profit, but from the fear of penalties and death.

The men of moderate principles, on the contrary, were desirous that trade should be left to resume its accustomed channels, by dissipating the alarm of the farmers, leaving them free to fix their prices, holding out to them the inducement of a voluntary, safe, and advantageous exchange, and permitting transit from one department into another, so that the non-producing districts might be likewise furnished with supplies. They consequently repudiated a maximum price, as well as prohibitions of every description, and joined the economists in advocating an entirely free trade in corn throughout the whole extent of France. Adopting the opinion of Barbaroux, who was well acquainted with the subject, they demanded that foreign exportation should be subjected to a duty, not fixed, but rising in proportion to the enhancement of the article, which expedient would counteract absorption by other countries when the home demand was urgent. They were prepared to admit administrative interference only to the extent of establishing certain markets in extraordinary cases. Severity they upheld simply against the riotous who assaulted the farmers on the roads or in the market-places; and they utterly rejected the use of punishments as a stimulant to trade, alleging with truth that terror may be a means of repression, but can never be a means of action: it paralyses and not animates men.

When a party gains supremacy in a state, forthwith assuming the government, it quickly imbibes the ideas and contracts the prejudices common to all governments; the machine must at every sacrifice be kept in motion, and force employed as the universal medium. It was in conformity with this invariable rule that the ardent friends of liberty had the predilection of all governments for prohibitive systems, whilst they encountered as adversaries those who, with greater moderation, desired liberty not only in the end but also in the means, and contended for clemency to enemies, deliberation in the forms of justice, and absolute freedom of trade.

The Girondists, therefore, upheld all the theories started by speculative minds, in reprobation of administrative tyranny; but these new economists, instead of having to battle as formerly with a government ashamed to enter the lists and always condemned by public opinion, clashed with exuberant minds fanaticised by the idea of the public safety, and who conscientiously believed that force employed in so sacred an end was but the energy of superior virtue.

This discussion brought in its train an additiona' topic of recrimination. Roland continually exclaimed against the commune for perverting funds in purchases of grain, and making it scarce in Paris, by lowering prices through a vain ambition of popularity. The Mountaineers retorted upon Roland by accusing him of misappropriating considerable sums, apportioned to his ministry, in the acquisition of corn, so as to render himself, in truth, the chief of engrossers, and the dictato of France, by buying up its food.

Whilst the assembly was engaged in acrimonious disputes upon this subject, insurrections broke out in certain departments, and particularly in that of Eure-and-Loir. The rural population, maddened by the want of bread and the instigations of the priests, charged the convention with being the sole cause of all their calamities; and whilst they complained that it hesitated to fix a maximum price on corn, they likewise accused it of contemplating the destruction of religion. Cambon was the cause of this last reproach. Zealous for retrenchments not affecting the operations of war, he had announced that the expenses of public worship ought to be suppressed, and that those who wanted mass should defray its cost. Consequently the insurgents failed not to allege that religion was ruined, and, by a singular contradiction, they upbraided the convention on the one hand for moderation in matters of internal commerce, and on the other for violence with regard to religious worship. Two members, commissioned by the assembly, found in the environs of Courville an assemblage of several thousand peasants, armed with pitchforks and fowling-pieces; and they were compelled, under the threat of assassination, to sign the maximum upon corn. The convention disavowed them, declaring they ought rather to have died, and abolished the limitation they had signed. An armed force was immediately dispatched to disperse the insurrectionists. Thus commenced the troubles of the west, originating in distress and attachment to rites.

In order to allay discontent amongst the western population, the assembly, on the motion of Danton, passed a declaration that it had no intention of abrogating religion; but it persisted in refusing the maximum. Thus, still firm amidst the tempest, and adhering to liberality of sentiment, the conventional majority declared for freedom of trade, in opposition to the prohibitive system. If we now cast a retrospective glance upon the various matters occurring in the armies, in the administrations, in the trial of Louis XVI., we shall assuredly behold a singular and terrible spectacle. Men of ardent temperaments have worked themselves into frenzy, and insist upon an entire recomposition of the armies and the administrations, in order to expel therefrom the lukewarm and the suspected; they demand the employment of force against trade, in order to prevent it stagnating; and they advocate a system of sanguinary vengeance, in order to scare every foe. Men of moderate dispositions, on the contrary, are apprehensive of disorganising the armies by remodelling them, of annihilating commerce by using constraint, and of infuriating to revolt by diffusing alarm; but their opponents wax yet more wroth at this very timidity, and more vehement in their determination to remodel, to coerce, to avenge. Such was the spectacle presented at this moment by the left against the right side of the convention.

The sitting of the 30th had been rendered extremely violent by the complaints of Roland against the municipality for its conduct respecting corn, and by the report of the commissioners sent into the department of Eure-and-Loir. All is recalled at once when we begin to count up our woes. So, on the one hand, the massacres and the incendiary placards were held up to execration; on the other, the vacillations, the remains of royalism, and the delays opposed to the national vengeance, were vehemently retorted. Marat had spoken, and excited a general murmur. Robespierre ascended the tribune amidst the noise, and came forward to propose, as he said, a more effectual means than any that had been propounded to re-establish the public tranquillity, a means which would restore a spirit of impartiality and concord to the assembly, confound the enemies of the National Convention, impose silence on all libellists, on all the authors of placards, and belie their calumnies. "What is it?" was asked; "what is this means?" Robespierre resumed: "It consists in condemning to-morrow the tyrant of the French to the expiation of his crimes, and thus destroying the rallying point for all conspirators. The following day you will take measures respecting provisions, and the day after you will fix the bases of a free constitution."

This emphatic and astute mode of assigning the means of safety, and making them consist in a measure combated by the right side, aroused the Girondists, and obliged them to enter on the important question of the trial. "You speak of the king," said Buzot: "the evil of the disorders is chargeable upon those who are labouring to fill his place. When the proper time arrives for deciding on his fate, I shall be prepared to do so with the severity he has merited; but we have not that question before us at the present moment; the subject of inquiry is concerning the troubles, and I declare they spring from anarchy, and anarchy in its turn results from the non-execution of the laws. This non-execution will continue so long as the convention shall delay adopting steps to ensure order." Legendre immediately followed Buzot, and besought his colleagues to eschew personal feuds, and give attention solely to the public weal and to the seditions, which, having no object but that of saving the king, would cease with his life. He therefore moved that the assembly order the opinions digested on the trial to be laid on the table, printed, and distributed to all the members; and that the decision whether Louis XVI. ought to be tried be subsequently pronounced, without wasting time in listening to long harangues. Jean Bon-Saint-André contended that no necessity existed for entering upon these preliminary points, and that the only questions for instant solution were the condemnation and the form of the execution. The convention eventually passed the motion of Legendre, and decreed that all the speeches should be printed. The debate was then adjourned to the 3d December.

On the 3d, opinions were almost universally expressed in favour of the arraignment, the immediate framing of the articles of impeachment, and the settlement of the forms according to which the trial should proceed. Robespierre claimed to be heard; and although it had been decided that all discourses should be printed and not read, he obtained permission to address the assembly, because he desired to speak, not upon the trial, but against the trial, and for a condemnation without forms of process.

He argued that to institute a trial was to commence a deliberation; that to permit deliberation was to sanction doubts, and even a solution favourable to the accused. But to view the criminality of Louis XVI. as problematical, was to condemn the Parisians, the federalists, all the patriots, in short, who [illegible] revolution of the 10th August; to absolve [illegible] the aristocrats, the foreign powers and their [illegible] —in a word, to declare royalty innocent and the republic guilty.

"See," continued Robespierre, [illegible] what audacity the enemies of liberty have in conse[illegible]nce acquired since you have started these doubts[illegible] In the month of August last, the partisans of the [illegible] g[illegible] selves. Whoever had dared undertake his vindication would have been punished as a traitor. Now, at the present moment, they raise an audacious front with impunity; insolent publications inundate Paris and the departments; armed men, introduced within these walls, unknown to you and against the laws, have made this city resound with seditious cries and demands for the impunity of Louis XVI.! It only remains for you to throw open this building to those who are already emulous of the honour of defending him. But what?—why, even now, Louis divides the mandatories of the people! They speak for and against him! Who could have suspected, two months ago, that the question would have here arisen, whether he be inviolable? But, since citizen Pétion has presented, as a matter of serious debate, and as a subject entitled to mature and separate consideration, the question whether the king can be tried, the doctrines of the Constituent Assembly have re-appeared here. How criminal! how shameful! The tribune of the French people has rung with panegyrics on Louis XVI.! We have heard the virtues and the benefits of the tyrant vaunted! Whilst we have had the greatest difficulty in saving the purest citizens from the injustice of a precipitate decision, the cause of the tyrant alone is so sacred that it cannot be too tediously and too deliberately discussed! If we believe his apologists, the trial will last several months—will stretch into the succeeding spring, when the despots are to make upon us a general attack. What a career opened to conspirators! What encouragement given to intrigue and aristocracy!

Just Heaven! the ferocious hordes of despotism are making ready once more to tear the heart of our country in the name of Louis XVI.! Louis still fights against us from the recesses of his prison, and you doubt whether he be guilty—whether it be allowable to treat him as an enemy! You ask what laws condemn him! You adduce the constitution in his behalf! Why, the constitution prohibited you from doing what you have done: if he could be punished only by dethronement, you were incompetent to pronounce it without putting him on his trial; you had no right to detain him in prison; he, on the contrary, has a right to claim damages and costs, and his enlargement: the constitution condemns you; hasten to the feet of Louis and invoke his clemency!"

These declamatory and taunting apostrophes, although involving no material point not already urged by Saint-Just, produced, nevertheless, a considerable sensation in the assembly, and it determined to pass a definitive resolution before adjourning. Robespierre had insisted that Louis XVI. should be forthwith judged; but several members, with Pétion in the number, persisted in recommending that, before deciding on the forms to be observed, the convention should, at all events, pronounce the arraignment; for that, said they, was an indispensable preliminary, with whatever dispatch it might be wished to carry on the process. Robespierre rose to speak again, and seemed as it were to insist upon being heard; but his presumptuous demeanour irritated the majority, and the tribune was interdicted him.

The assembly at length passed the following resolution:—"The National Convention declares that Louis XVI. shall be tried by it."*

The next day the forms of the trial were brought under discussion. Buzot, in consequence of the repeated taunts thrown out concerning royalism, claimed to be heard upon a question of order; and, as he alleged, with the view of removing all suspicions, he proposed the penalty of death against any who should advocate the re-establishment of royalty in France. This was one of the modes which parties often adopted to prove that they were incapable of the designs imputed to them. Considerable applause greeted the useless motion; but the Mountaineers, who, according to their system, ought to have opposed no obstacle to its adoption, assailed it from spleen, and Bazire rose to urge its rejection. He was met with shouts of "Divide! divide!" Philipeaux, supporting Bazire, moved that the convention attend only to the matters touching Louis XVI., and hold a permanent sitting until his trial should be concluded. The opposers of Buzot's proposition were then asked what motives induced them to repudiate it, since none could possibly regret royalty. Lejeune replied that it was recalling to debate what had been decided by the abolition of royalty. "But," said Rewbel, "the question mooted is the addition of a penal enactment to that abolition; it is therefore far from bringing under debate any thing already decreed." Merlin, with less tact than his associates, introduced an amendment, to except the case of a proposition to re-establish royalty, emanating in the primary assemblies, from the application of the penalty of death. Murmurs arose from all sides against this reservation. "Now the secret's out!" exclaimed several members. "They wish a king, but one taken from the primary assemblies—from those bodies whence Marat, Robespierre, and Danton have sprung." Merlin sought to justify himself by asserting that he intended to pay due homage to the sovereignty of the people. His voice was drowned in indignant reproaches of royalism, and a motion was made that he should be called to order. Thereupon Guadet, with a want of candour sometimes exhibited by highly honourable men in the wrath and passion of discussion, maintained that freedom of opinion ought to be respected, to which, in the present case, the discovery of an important secret was owing, that furnished the clue to a desperate machination. "The assembly," said he, "can have no reason to regret having heard this amendment, which demonstrates to it that a new despotism is intended to succeed the one destroyed; and it ought to thank Merlin rather than call him to order." A burst of vociferations interrupted Guadet's progress. Bazire, Merlin, and Robespierre, denounced the calumnious implication; and there is no doubt the charge of purposing to substitute a plebeian king for the dethroned monarch was equally absurd with that of federalism urged against the Girondists. The assembly eventually decreed the penalty of death against whomsoever should attempt the re-establishment of royalty in France, under any denomination whatever.

* 3d December.

The debate reverted to the forms of the trial and the proposition of a permanent sitting. Robespierre again insisted that the judgment should be instantly pronounced. Pétion, still supported by the majority, procured a resolution that the sitting should not be permanent, nor the judgment immediate, but that the assembly would devote its attention to the subject, excluding all others, daily, from eleven in the forenoon till six in the evening.

The following days were consumed in reading the documents found in the house of Laporte, and others more recently discovered at the palace, in a secret recess, constructed by the king's directions in the thickness of a wall. The door of this closet was of iron, whence it became known under the name of the iron chest. The workman employed in its formation denounced it to Roland, who, in his eagerness to ascertain the fact, had the imprudence to proceed thither upon the spur of the moment, without summoning witnesses from the ranks of the assembly to accompany him, which gave occasion to his enemies to allege that he had withheld a portion of the papers. Roland found in it all the documents relative to the communications of the court with the emigrants and divers members of the assemblies. The negotiations of Mirabeau thereby came to light, and the memory of the great orator was on the point of being proscribed, when Manuel, his ardent admirer, prevailed on the convention to remit the documents to the committee of public instruction, that they might undergo a more ample examination.* It afterwards nominated a committee to frame the articles of impeachment against Louis XVI. with reference to this documentary evidence. When those articles were digested, they were to be submitted to the assembly for approval. Louis XVI. was thereafter to appear in person at the bar of the convention, and be interrogated by the president upon each article of the arraignment. After his examination, two days were to be granted him for the preparation of his defence, and the day succeeding its adducement, judgment was to be pronounced by each member individually. The executive power was directed to take all necessary measures for ensuring public tranquillity during the removal of the king to the assembly. These arrangements were decreed on the 9th December.

The articles of impeachment were laid before the assembly on the 10th, and the appearance of Louis XVI. was ordered for the day subsequent.

The unhappy monarch was therefore shortly to appear in presence of the National Convention, and undergo an interrogatory upon all the acts of his reign. Information of the intended trial, and of the order for appearance, had reached Cléry by the secret means of correspondence he had arranged outside the Temple, and he communicated it to the afflicted family with palpitating anguish. Not daring to impart it to the king himself, he conveyed his dismal tidings to the ear of the Princess Elizabeth, and apprised her, furthermore, that the commune had determined to separate Louis XVI. from his family during the trial. He settled with the princess a method of corresponding during this separation, which consisted in the transmission of a kerchief by Cléry, who was to remain with the king, whereby the princesses would be informed that their august relative was ill. Such was all the intelligence these unfortunate prisoners pretended to communicate to each other! The king was advertised by his sister of his approaching interrogatory, and of the separation they were doomed to suffer during his trial. He received the tidings with perfect resignation, and prepared to endure the trying scene with firmness.

The commune had ordered that, on the 11th at dawn, all the administrative bodies should be assembled, all the sections under arms, the guard at all the public places, finance-offices, storehouses, &c., augmented by two hundred men at each post, numerous reserves stationed on various points, with a strong artillery, and a chosen escort prepared to accompany the king's carriage.

On the morning of the 11th, the beating of drums through Paris announced the sad and novel event. Companies of troops surrounded the Temple, and the clang of arms and horses penetrated even to the prisoners, who feigned ignorance of the cause of such agitation. At nine o'clock, the family, according to usage, repaired to the king's apartment for the purpose of breakfasting. The municipal officers, more watchful than ever, prevented, by their presence, any interchange of feeling. They shortly separated the captives. The king in vain solicited that his son might be left with him for a few seconds longer. Regardless of his entreaties, the boy was torn from him, and he remained alone about two hours. The Mayor of Paris and the procurator of the commune then arrived, and communicated to him the decree of the convention, which summoned him to its bar under the name of Louis Capet. "Capet," observed the prince, "was the name of one of my ancestors, but is not mine." He thereupon arose, and proceeded to the mayor's carriage which awaited him. Six hundred chosen men surrounded the coach. It was preceded by three pieces of cannon, and followed by as many more. A numerous body of cavalry formed the advanced and the rear guard. An immense crowd contemplated the mournful procession in silence, and with the same apathy it had so often displayed when viewing the rigorous examples of the old government. A few cries were raised, but very partially. The king heard them without emotion, and conversed placidly upon the objects that met his eye on the way. When the carriage reached the Feuillants', he was conducted to a room, until the pleasure of the assembly was declared.

* These papers were revealed in the sitting of the 5th December The convention was moved to immediately break the bust of Mirabeau, and order the removal of his ashes from the Pantheon, but it contented itself that day with veiling his bust.

In the mean time, various motions were made relative to the manner of receiving Louis XVI. It was proposed that no petition should be presented, no deputy allowed to speak, and no sign of sympathy or antipathy manifested towards the king. "We ought to scare him with the silence of the tomb," said Legendre. A general murmur condemned the unfeeling phrase. Défermont moved that a seat be placed for the accused. The proposition was deemed too essential to be put to the vote, and a seat was placed at the bar. Through a ridiculous vanity, Manuel suggested that the question standing on the order of the day should be discussed, so as to avoid appearing simply occupied with the king; "even," he added, "should we make him wait at the door." The assembly accordingly proceeded to discuss a law upon the emigrants.

Santerre at length announced the arrival of Louis XVI. Barrère was president. "Citizens," said he, "Europe has its eyes upon you. Posterity will judge you with inflexible severity; preserve, therefore, the dignity and calmness which befit judges. Remember the awful silence which met Louis on his return from Varennes."

Louis appeared at the bar about half-past two. The mayor and the Generals Santerre and Wittengoff were at his side. A profound stillness pervaded the hall. The dignity of Louis, and his tranquil countenance, in so extraordinary a reverse, affected every spectator. The deputies of the centre were visibly moved. The Girondists evinced deep commiseration. Even Saint-Just, Robespierre, and Marat, felt their fanaticism giving way, and were surprised to find a man in the king they pursued so remorselessly.

"Be seated," said Barrère to Louis, "and answer the questions that may be addressed to you." Louis seated himself, and listened whilst the articles of impeachment were read over, section by section. In them, all the faults of the court were recapitulated, and charged personally on Louis XVI. He was upbraided with the interruption of the sittings on the 20th June 1789; with the bed of justice held on the 23d of the same month; with the aristocratic conspiracy foiled by the insurrection of the 14th July; with the banquet to the body-guards; with the insults heaped on the national cockade; with the refusal to sanction the declaration of rights, as also various constitutional articles; with all the facts which made manifest a new conspiracy in October, and which were followed by the ______ of the 5th and 6th; with the conciliatory speeches which had succeeded those scenes, promising a change never intended; with the false oath taken at the federation of the 14th July; with the secret intrigues of Talon and Mirabeau to effect a counter-revolution; with the money appropriated to corrupt a number of deputies; with the gathering of "the knights of the dagger" on the 28th February 1791; with the flight to Varennes; with the slaughter on the Champ de Mars; with the silence observed respecting the convention of Pilnitz; with the delay in the promulgation of the decree reuniting Avignon to France; with the commotions at Nîmes, Montauban, Mende, and Jallès; with the continuance of their pay to emigrant body-guards and to the disbanded constitutional guard; with the secret correspondence with the emigrant princes; with the insufficiency of the armies assembled on the frontiers; with the refusal to sanction the decree for the camp of 20,000 men; with the dismantling of all the fortresses; with the tardy announcement of the march of the Prussians; with the organisation of secret companies in the interior of Paris; with the review of the Swiss and other troops which formed the garrison of the palace on the morning of the 10th August; with the doubling of that guard; with the summons of the mayor to the Tuileries; lastly, with the effusion of blood, which had been the consequence of those military dispositions.

If regret for his former power were not allowed as excusable and natural, every thing in the conduct of the king might be tortured into crime; for his conduct was but one long regret, interspersed with occasional timid efforts to recover what he had lost. After each article, the president paused, saying, "What have you to answer?" The king, always speaking in a firm voice, denied part of the facts, threw the remainder on his ministers, and constantly appealed to the constitution, which he asseverated he had never infringed. His answers were throughout calm and deliberate. But at the accusation—"You caused the blood of the people to flow on the 10th August!" he exclaimed, in a loud tone, "No, sir, no—it was not I."

All the documents were afterwards exhibited to him, and, using an unquestionable privilege, he refused to acknowledge some of them, and contested the existence of the iron chest. This denial produced an unfavourable impression; and it was certainly ill-judged, for the fact was placed beyond all doubt. He finally demanded copies of the articles of impeachment and of the documents adduced, and counsel to aid him in his defence.

The president notified to him that he might retire. Refreshments were presented to him in the adjoining apartment; and being conducted back to the carriage, he was once more removed to the Temple. He arrived there at half-past six, and his first anxiety was to see his family: the request was refused, on the allegation that the commune had ordered the separation during the continuance of the trial. At half-past eight, when supper was announced to him, he again solicited leave to embrace his children. The gloomy suspicions of the commune rendered all the keepers inexorable; and that consolation was once more harshly denied him.

During this interval, the assembly was a scene of tumult, owing to the request made by Louis XVI. to be allowed counsel. Treilhard and Pétion argued with vehemence that the demand should be conceded; Tallien, Billaud-Varennes, Chabot, and Merlin, opposed it with equal force, asserting that it was a mere pretence to retard the proceedings by chicanery. The assembly, in conclusion, granted counsel. A deputation was appointed to wait on Louis XVI., communicate to him this resolution, and ascertain from him upon whom his choice fell. The king named Target, or, failing him, Tronchet, and both if it were possible. He also requested that he might be supplied with pens, ink, and paper, to prepare materials for his defence, and be permitted to see his family. The convention immediately ordained that every thing necessary for writing should be furnished to him; that the two advocates whom he had selected should be apprised of the preference shown them; that he should be allowed the freest intercourse with them; and that he might see his family.

Target declined the commission which Louis XVI. intrusted to him, alleging as a reason that he had been unable, ever since 1785, to pursue the labours of the bar. Tronchet instantly wrote that he was ready to accept the functions confided to him; and whilst the appointment of a second counsel was under deliberation, a letter was received from a citizen, a septuagenarian, the venerable Malesherbes, the friend and associate of Turgot, and the most respected magistrate in France. The noble veteran wrote to the president: "I have been twice called to the council of him who was my master, at a time when that service was an object of universal ambition; I owe him the same obedience when it is a service deemed dangerous by many." He besought the president to inform Louis XVI. that he was prepared to devote all his energies in his defence.

Several other citizens made the same offer, with which the king was duly acquainted. He thanked them all, but accepted Tronchet and Malesherbes only. The commune directed that the two advocates should be subjected to the most minute search before they were ushered into the presence of their client. The convention, which had ordered unrestricted communication, re-asserted its resolution, and they were allowed to enter the Temple without obstruction. On seeing Malesherbes, the king advanced to meet him; the venerable old man fell at his feet, and burst into tears. The king raised him, and they remained in a long embrace. The business of the defence, however, demanded and obtained their speedy attention. Commissioners from the assembly brought the documents to the Temple daily, with orders to communicate their contents, but not to part from their possession. The king examined them with great attention, and with a tranquillity likewise which infinitely astonished the commissioners.

The only consolation he had solicited, permission to see his family, had not yet been granted to him, notwithstanding the decree of the convention. The commune, already disposed to throw every obstacle in the way of the indulgence, had petitioned for the repeal of the decree. "You will vainly enjoin it," said Tallien to the convention; "if the commune be unwilling, it will not be carried into effect." These insolent words excited considerable tumult. However, the assembly, modifying its decree, ordained that the king might have his two children with him, but on condition that the children should not return to their mother during the entire process. The king, sensible that they were most necessary to their mother, refused to deprive her of them, and submitted to this new affliction with a resignation no indignity could shake.

In proportion as the trial advanced, the vast importance of the question at issue became more perfectly understood. On the one hand, were those who felt assured that proceeding by regicide against the old royalty was embarking in an inexorable system of vengeance and atrocity, and declaring war to the death against the former order of things: they were willing, indeed, to abrogate that order of things, but not to destroy it in so violent a manner. On the other hand were those who desired that very war to the death, as admitting no more vacillation or return, and as planting an impassable barrier between the monarchy and the revolution. The person of the king was scarcely considered in the greatness of the question; all attention was engrossed on the one point, whether it were expedient or not to break entirely with the past by one decisive and irrevocable act. The result alone was weighed, and the victim destined for the sacrifice was in the interim overlooked.

The Girondists, steadfast in their detestation of the Jacobins, unceasingly upbraided them with the sacres of September, and represented them as anarchists, scheming to overawe the assembly by terror, and to immolate the king for the purpose of replacing him by the triumvirs. Guadet almost succeeded in expelling them from the convention, by procuring a decree that the electoral assemblies of the whole country should be convoked in order to confirm or recall their deputies. This proposition, adopted and rescinded in the course of one sitting, had struck considerable alarm into the Jacobins. Other circumstances likewise tended to augment their uneasiness. The federalists continued to arrive from all quarters. The municipalities forwarded a multitude of addresses, in which, whilst approving of the republic, and applauding the convention for having instituted it, they reprobated the crimes and excesses of anarchy. The affiliated societies also continually reproached the parent society with having in its bosom men of blood, who contaminated public morality and advocated attempts on the security of the convention. Some even repudiated their parent, declaring they cast away all further affiliation, and announcing that at the first signal they would fly to Paris to support the assembly. All especially called for the expulsion of Marat, some for that of Robespierre himself.

The dispirited Jacobins allowed that opinion was growing corrupt in France; but they exhorted each other to hold together, and to use all diligence in writing to the different provinces, and enlightening their deceived brethren. They accused "the traitor" Roland of intercepting their correspondence, and substituting for their wholesome lessons hypocritical writings calculated to pervert the understanding. They proposed a voluntary subscription for the purpose of disseminating sound publications, particularly the "admirable" discourses of Robespierre; and sought means for securing their safe delivery in spite of Roland, who violated, as they alleged, the freedom of the post-office. At the same time, they agreed that Marat compromised them by the violence of his writings, and that it was essential the parent society should make known to France how marked a distinction it held to exist between Marat, whose heated temperament carried him beyond bounds, and the prudent, virtuous Robespierre, who, always within proper limits, upheld without weakness, as also without exaggeration, the just and possible course. Previously, however, a vehement dispute had occurred in the club respecting those two men. It had been generally acknowledged that Marat was a man of bold and powerful intellect, but too excitable. He had been useful to the cause of the people, it was allowed, but he knew not where to stop. The partisans of Marat had replied that he did not deem it necessary to execute all that he had recommended, and that none was so good a judge as he of the limit at which things ought to be stayed. They adduced several of his passages. Marat had said:—"There needs but one Marat in the republic. I demand the greater to obtain the less. My hand should wither rather than write, if I thought the people would execute to the letter all that I advise. I overtask the people because I know they will bargain with me." The galleries had applauded and supported this justification of Marat. But the society had finally resolved to frame an address, in which, pourtraying the characters of Marat and Robespierre, it should show how striking a difference it placed between the discretion of the one and the vehemence of the other.* After deciding upon this mea-

* Amongst the many curious judgments passed upon Marat and Robespierre, that pronounced in the Jacobin Club in the sitting of Sunday, 23d December 1792, ought not to be omitted. I know nothing more accurately descriptive of the spirit and temper of the moment than the discussion upon the characters of those two men. The following is an extract:—

"Desfieux read over the correspondence. A letter from a society, whose name has escaped us, gave rise to considerable discussion, calculated to evoke important reflections. This society announced to the parent society that it was invariably attached to the principles of the Jacobins, that it had not allowed itself to be blinded by the calumnies so profusely scattered against Marat and Robespierre, and that it continued all its esteem and veneration for those two incorruptible friends of the people.

This letter was warmly applauded, but was followed by a dis-sure, several others were adopted, and especially a determination not to relax for an instant in urging the departure of the federalists for the frontiers. Accordingly, whenever intelligence reached Paris that the army under Dumouriez was weakened by desertion, the Jacobins exclaimed that the reinforcement of the federalists was indispensable. Marat published that the volunteers who had first gone off had been kept for upwards of a year, and that it was time to replace them by those loitering in Paris. It was known, too, about this time, that Custine had been obliged to abandon Frankfort, that Beurnonville's attack on the electorate of Treves had been fruitless; and the Jacobins failed not to maintain that if those two generals had been strengthened by the federalists who uselessly crowded the capital, they would have been spared the disgrace of those checks.

The various tidings of the fruitless attempt of Beurnonville and the repulse of Custine had powerfully agitated the public mind. It had needed little foresight to predict both; for Beurnonville, attacking unassailable positions, in a bad season, and with insufficient means, could not succeed; and Custine, pertinaciously refusing to recoil upon the Rhine of his own accord, shunning so signal an avowal of his temerity, must infallibly be reduced to a retreat upon Mayence. Public misfortunes always furnish parties with aliment for invective. The Jacobins, who were sufficiently inimical to generals suspected of an aristocratic bias, seized upon the occasion, declaimed with fury against them, and denounced them as Feuillants and Girondists. Marat failed not to inveigh more emphatically than ever against the rage for conquest, which he had always blamed, he said, and which, moreover, was but a disguised ambition of the generals to attain a position of formidable greatness. Robespierre, pointing the odium according to the instigations of his malice, contended that it was not the generals who were to blame, but the infamous faction which ruled the assembly and the executive power. The perfidious Roland, the intriguing Brissot, the wretches Louvet, Guadet, Vergniaud, were the authors of all the disasters that afflicted France. He craved to be the first assassinated by them, but he hoped ere that occurred to have the pleasure of denouncing them. Dumouriez and Custine, he added, knew them, and took good care to hold aloof from them; but all feared them, because they disposed of gold, places, and all the resources of the republic. Their intention was to enslave it, and for that purpose they fettered all the true patriots, prevented the development of their energy, and thus exposed France to be vanquished by its enemies. Their more immediate design was to annihilate the society of Jacobins, and to massacre all who should have courage to resist. "For myself," he exclaimed, "I ask to be assassinated by Roland!"*

cussion which Brissot and Gorsas, who are assuredly prophets, foretold the evening before.

Robert.—'It is very surprising that people will perpetually confound the names of Marat and Robespierre. How the public mind must be corrupted in the departments, when no difference is observed between those two defenders of the people! They have both virtues, it is true; Marat is a patriot, and has truly estimable qualities, I admit; but how different is he from Robespierre! He is prudent, moderate in his means, whilst Marat is prone to exaggeration, and has not that wisdom which characterises Robespierre. It is not sufficient to be a patriot; in order to serve the people usefully, a man must be reserved in his means of execution; and Robespierre incomparably excels Marat in the means of execution.

It is time, citizens, to tear away the veil which conceals the truth from the eyes of the departments; it is time they should know that we draw a marked distinction between Marat and Robespierre. Let us write to the affiliated societies what we think of those two citizens; for, I confess to you, I am no great admirer of Marat.' (Murmurs in the galleries, and partially from the hall.)

Bourdon.—'We ought to have made known our sentiments touching Marat long ago to the affiliated societies. How is it possible they could ever confound Marat and Robespierre? Robespierre is a man essentially virtuous, against whom, during the whole revolution, we have no reproach to make; Robespierre is moderate in his means, whilst Marat, on the contrary, is an unbridled writer, who greatly injures the Jacobins (murmurs); and, besides, it is proper to observe, that Marat does us infinite mischief in the National Convention.

The deputies conceive that we are partisans of Marat; they call us Maratists; if we show that we rightly estimate Marat, you will soon see the deputies draw near the Mountain on which we sit; you will see them come into the bosom of this society; you will see the affiliated societies recover from their aberration, and rally anew around the cradle of liberty. If Marat be a patriot, he must accede to the motion I am about to submit. Marat will be ready to sacrifice himself to the cause of liberty. I move that his name be erased from the list of members of this society.'

This motion excited a few plaudits, violent murmurs in a part of the hall, and tumultuous agitation in the galleries.

It was remembered that eight days before this novel scene, Marat had been loaded with applause in the society; the people in the galleries, who have good memories, recollected the circumstance very distinctly; they could not imagine how so prompt a change had come over the spirits of men; and, as the moral instinct of the people is always just, they were highly indignant at the proposition of Bourdon: they defended their virtuous friend; they refused to believe that, in the short space of a week, he could have forfeited the esteem of the society, for although it had been said that ingratitude was a virtue of republics, it would [illegible] difficulty to familiarise the French people with such virtues.

The union of the names of Marat and Robespierre was not at all revolting to the people; their ears had been long accustomed to hear them named in conjunction in the correspondence; and, after having repeatedly seen the society moved with indignation when the clubs of other departments demanded the expulsion of Marat, they were far from deeming themselves bound to support the present motion of Bourdon.

A citizen from an affiliated society pressed upon the attention of the society how really dangerous it was to join together the names of Marat and Robespierre. 'In the departments,' said he, 'we draw a great distinction between Marat and Robespierre; but we are surprised to see the society silent upon the differences between these two patriots. I propose to the society, after it has decided upon the fate of Marat, to speak no more of affiliation, as that word ought not to be pronounced in a republic, but to use the term fraternisation instead.'

Dufourny.—'I oppose the motion for striking Marat off the list of the society. (Great applause) I will not deny the difference that exists between Marat and Robespierre. Those two writers, who may be likened to each other in patriotism, have very remarkable points of difference; they have both served the cause of the people, but by different modes. Robespierre has defended the true principles with method, firmness, and all befitting discretion; Marat, on the contrary, has often overstepped the bounds of sound reason and prudence. Still, although granting the distinction existing between Marat and Robespierre, I am not in favour of the expulsion; we may be just without being ungrateful to Marat. Marat has been serviceable to us, he has aided the revolution with courage. (Repeated cheers from the society and the galleries.) It would be ungrateful to erase him. (Yes! yes! from all sides.) Marat is an indispensable person; in revolutions there is a call for those strong minds capable of uniting states, and Marat is one of the rare characters necessary to overthrow despotism. (Applause.)

I conclude with moving that the motion of Bourdon be rejected, and that the society contents itself with writing to the affiliated clubs, signifying to them the distinction we mark between Marat and Robespierre.' (Applause.)

The society resolved that it would no longer use the term affiliation, regarding it as repulsive to republican equality; it substituted for it the word fraternisation. The society afterwards resolved that Marat should not be erased from the list of members, but that it would address a circular to all the societies holding the right of fraternisation, in which should be detailed the [illegible] dissemblances, affinities, and disagreements which w[illegible] able be[illegible] Marat and Robespierre, in order that all those who fraternised with the Jacobins might be [illegible]bled to judge in full cognisance of those two defenders of the [peo]ple, and finally learn to separate two names which they erroneously deemed were linked in an eternal union."

* Sitting of the Jacobins, 12th December.

This frantic hatred, communicating itself to the whole society, stirred it like a tempestuous sea. The members pledged themselves to an implacable war with the faction; they repelled in advance all idea of reconciliation; and as a new proposal of negotiation had been recently canvassed, they bound themselves to reject for ever the Lamourette kiss.

Similar scenes occurred in the assembly during the delay which had been granted to Louis XVI. for the preparation of his defence. Complaints were incessantly repeated that the royalists every where menaced the patriots and distributed pamphlets in favour of the king. Thuriot proposed a measure to meet the crisis; it consisted in punishing with death whomsoever should meditate disrupturing the unity of the republic or dismembering any portion. This was a decree against the fable of federalism, that is to say, against the Girondists. Buzot hastened to retort by another project, and moved a decree of exile against the family of Orleans. Parties are thus prone to the exchange of falsehoods, and take vengeance for calumnies by hurling back others. Whilst the Jacobins, therefore, accused the Girondists of federalism, these reproached the former with intending the Duke of Orleans for the throne, and thirsting for the blood of Louis XVI. merely to render the place vacant.

The Duke of Orleans lingered in existence at Paris, vainly striving to be forgotten in the midst of the convention. He could scarcely find that position, encompassed by furious demagogues, agreeable to his feelings; but whither could he fly? In Europe, the emigration sat in waiting for him, and outrages, possibly even extreme punishments, threatened the kinsman of royalty, who had repudiated his birth and his rank. In France, he sought to bury his origin in oblivion by assuming the most humble designations, and he styled himself Egalité (Equality). But the remembrance of his former dignity was ineffaceable, and the evidence of his vast wealth always present. Unless he clothed himself in rags, and rendered himself despicable by affected cynicism, how was he to escape suspicions? In the Girondist ranks he had been ruined at once; and all the reproaches of royalism directed against them would have been held justified. In those of the Jacobins, he had the mob of Paris as a support; but he was pretty certain to provoke the accusations of the Girondists, as in truth was demonstrated. They, abhorring him for ranking with their enemies, concluded that, in order to render himself supportable, he lavished his treasures upon the anarchists, and supplied their party with the powerful aid of his fortune.

The suspicious Louvet was more credulous, and sincerely believed he still harboured hopes of royalty. It was without participating in that opinion, but to meet the assault of Thuriot by another, that Buzot ascended the tribune. "If the decree proposed by Thuriot be calculated to restore confidence," said he, "I am about to submit one equally well calculated to produce that desirable end. The monarchy is laid prostrate, but it still lives in the habits and in the remembrances of its former creatures. Let us imitate the Romans; they chased away Tarquin and his family; in like manner let us expel the family of the Bourbons. A part of that family is in irons, but there is another yet more dangerous, because it was more popular—I mean that of Orleans. The bust of Orleans was paraded through Paris; his sons, warmed by courage, have distinguished themselves in our armies; but the very merits of the family render it hazardous to liberty. Let it make a final sacrifice to the country by voluntarily withdrawing from its soil; let it betake elsewhere the calamity of having stood near the throne, and the still greater calamity of bearing a name which is odious to us, and which cannot fail to sound harshly in the ear of every freeman."

Louvet, succeeding Buzot, and [illegible] Orleans himself, urged upon him the spontaneous [illegible] of Collatinus, and besought him to imitate it. Lanjuinais reverted to the elections of Paris, whereby Egalité was deputed, and which were conducted under the poniards of the anarchist faction; he recalled the efforts that were made to obtain the nomination of a chancellor of the house of Orleans to the ministry of war, and the influence its sons had acquired in the armies; for all which reasons, he moved the banishment of the Bourbons. Bazire, Saint-Just, and Chabot, rose to [illegible] the motion, rather from enmity to the Girondists [illegible] interest for Orleans. They contended that this was not the moment to crush the only member of the Bourbon race who had evinced loyalty towards the nation; that the duty of the convention was first to punish the captive Bourbon, and then to frame the constitution, after which it might direct its attention to citizens who had become dangerous; that, furthermore, sending Orleans out of France was consigning him to death, and that so cruel a measure ought at least to be delayed. Nevertheless, the banishment was decreed by acclamation. The only additional point to settle, in drawing up the decree, was the period at which the banishment should commence. "Since you use the ostracism against Egalité," said Merlin, "employ it against all dangerous men; and, first of all, I ask it against the executive power." "Against Roland!" exclaimed Albitte. "Against Roland and Pache!" added Barrère, "since they have become the cause of disunion amongst us. Let them both be banished from the ministry, as a propitiation to peace and union." Kersaint, however, expressed an apprehension lest England might take advantage of the ministerial disorganisation to declare war, as she had done in 1757, when D'Argenson and Machau were disgraced; and Rewbel inquired whether a representative of the people could be banished, and whether Philip Egalité, under that character, did not belong to the nation which had nominated him.

These various observations arrested the current of passion. The subject was dropped, then resumed, and, without revoking the decree of banishment against the Bourbons, the convention adjourned the debate for three days, to afford an interval for resentments to subside, and for more maturely considering the questions, whether it was competent to banish Egalité, and whether it could without hazard displace the two ministers of the interior and of war.

This debate was eminently qualified to arouse the fiercest tumult in the sections, at the commune, and at the Jacobin Club. Ostracism became the absorbing clamour of the moment, and petitions were prepared in all quarters to be presented at the resumption of the debate. The three days elapsed, and the discussion recommenced. The mayor came at the head of the sections to solicit the repeal of the decree. The assembly passed to the order of the day after hearing the address; but Pétion, seeing how great a ferment the question excited, moved its adjournment until after the trial of Louis XVI. This species of compromise was adopted, and the full fury of the storm returned on the defenceless victim, against whom all passions found vent. The celebrated trial was therefore immediately resumed.

CHAPTER XVIII.

CONTINUATION OF THE TRIAL OF LOUIS XVI.—HIS DEFENCE.—HIS CONDEMNATION.—HIS LAST MINUTES IN THE PRISON AND ON THE SCAFFOLD.

The interval granted to Louis XVI. for preparing his defence, was scarcely sufficient to thoroughly investigate the multifarious records upon which it was to be founded. His two advocates solicited the assistance of a third, younger and more active than themselves, who might frame and deliver the defence, whilst they sought out and arranged its materials.

This young adjunct was the advocate Desèze, who had defended Besenval after the 14th July. The convention, having already conceded the defence, made no objection to an additional counsel, and M. Desèze obtained, like Malesherbes and Tronchet, the privilege of entering the Temple. A committee carried the documents thither daily, and exhibited them to Louis XVI., who inspected them with the greatest coolness, and as if the process had concerned another, as a report of the commune expressed it. He evinced the most marked politeness towards the commissioners, and ordered them refreshments when the consultations stretched to an unusual length. Whilst he was occupied with his trial, he had discovered a mode of communicating with his family. He wrote by means of the pens and paper allowed him for composing his defence, and the princesses pricked their reply upon the paper with needles. They sometimes folded the notes in balls of thread, which an attendant from the kitchen, whilst serving dinner, threw under the table; and at other times they let them down by a string of packthread from one floor to the other. The unhappy captives were thus enabled to give each other tidings of their health, and experienced much consolation from the assurance that sickness was not also one of their afflictions.

At length M. Desèze had finished the defence by devoting day and night to its compilation. The king made him suppress all that was too oratorical, desiring to restrict himself to the simple discussion of the points upon which he rested his case. On the 26th, at half-past nine in the morning, all the armed force was in motion to conduct him from the Temple to the Feuillants, with the same precautions and in the same order as upon the former occasion. Seated in the carriage of the mayor, he conversed with him on the way with his invariable tranquillity; they talked of Seneca, of Titus-Livius, of the hospitals; he even addressed a sprightly witticism to one of the municipal officers who kept his hat on in the carriage. Arrived at the Feuillants, he asked with solicitude for his advocates, sat by their side in the assembly, surveyed with infinite calmness the benches on which his accusers and his judges were seated, appeared to scan their countenances as if seeking to observe the effect of M. Desèze's address, and more than once interchanged a few words with Tronchet and Malesherbes, with a smile upon his countenance. The assembly heard his defence in gloomy silence, and without testifying any disapprobation.

The advocate divided his address into two parts—the principles of right, and the facts charged upon Louis XVI.

Although the assembly, by deciding that the king should be tried by it, had explicitly declared that the inviolability could not be invoked, Desèze argued successfully that nothing could limit the defence, and that its scope remained unfettered even after the decree; consequently, if Louis XVI. deemed the inviolability efficacious, he had a right to urge it. He was obliged preliminarily to acknowledge the sovereignty of the people; and, with all the defenders of the constitution of 1791, he contended that the sovereignty, albeit absolute and uncontrolled, could be bound; that it had so intended with reference to Louis XVI., when covenanting the inviolability; that it had not designed an absurdity in the system of the monarchy; that in consequence the obligation was valid, and ought to be executed; and that all conceivable crimes, had the king committed such, could be punished only by deposition. He said that, unless it were so, the constitution of 1791 was a barbarous snare laid for Louis XVI., since a pledge had been given him with the secret intention of not observing it; but that if Louis were to be denied his rights as a king, he should surely be allowed those of a citizen, and he asked where were the preservative forms which every citizen had a right to claim, such as the distinction between the accusing and the judging jury, the privilege of challenge, the majority of two-thirds, the secret vote, and the silence of the judges whilst forming their opinion. He added, with a boldness which failed to disturb the absolute stillness, that he looked every where for judges, but that his eye lighted only upon accusers.

He then passed to the division of facts, which he ranged under two heads—those which had preceded, and those which had followed the acceptance of the constitutional act. The first were covered by the acceptance of that act, the others by the inviolability. He did not abstain from discussing them notwithstanding, and entered upon an effective refutation, because the managers of the impeachment had adduced a multitude of insignificant facts in default of precise proof of intercourse with foreigners—a crime which they deemed quite undoubted, but whereof positive evidence was still wanting. He triumphantly repelled the accusation of having shed French blood on the 10th August. Louis XVI., in fact, was not the aggressor on that day, but the people. It was but just that Louis XVI., attacked and besieged, should endeavour to defend himself, and adopt the necessary precautions. The magistrates themselves had sanctioned his doing so, and had given the troops a formal order to repel force by force. Notwithstanding that, said M. Desèze, the king was unwilling to make use of that authority, which he held both from nature and the law, and he retired into the sanctuary of the legislative body to prevent the effusion of blood. The contest which ensued did not implicate him, but ought to be regarded favourably rather than revengefully, so far as he was concerned, inasmuch as it was upon an order under his hand that the Swiss abandoned the defence of the palace and of their own lives. It was, then, a flagrant injustice to upbraid Louis XVI. with having shed French blood, for on that point he was irreproachable; he had shown himself, on the contrary, full of forbearance and magnanimity.

The advocate concluded in these brief and impressive terms, the only occasion in which he dwelt upon the virtues of Louis XVI.:—

"Louis ascended the throne in the twentieth year of his age, and at that period of life gave an example of morality from the throne; he carried to it no criminal failing or depraved passion; he was economical, just, temperate, and he showed himself in every instance the friend of the people. The people desired the destruction of a baneful impost which pressed upon them, and he abrogated it; the people demanded the abolition of servitude, and he began by abolishing it in his own domains; the people solicited reforms in the criminal legislation, for the purpose of alleviating the treatment of persons under accusation, and he instituted those reforms; the people wished that many thousands of Frenchmen, whom the rigour of our laws had hitherto deprived of rights which belong to citizens, should acquire or recover those rights, and he called them to their enjoyment by his laws; the people craved liberty, and he gave it them! He even anticipated them in his sacrifices; and yet it is in the name of these same people that you are asked this day —— Citizens, I will not finish — I pause before history. Reflect that it will judge your judgment, and that its decision will be the decision of ages!"

Louis XVI., speaking immediately after his advocate, uttered a few words he had previously transcribed. "You have just heard my grounds of defence," said he, "and I will not reiterate them. Addressing you perhaps for the last time, I declare to you that my conscience reproaches me with nothing, and that my advocates have told you the truth.

I never feared a public examination of my conduct, but my heart is torn to find in the articles of impeachment the charge of having wilfully shed the blood of the people, and especially that the calamities of the 10th August are attributable to me.

I confess I deemed the multiplied proofs I had at all times given of my love for the people, and the conduct which I had always pursued, ought to have sufficiently demonstrated that I never shrunk from exposing myself to spare their blood, and to have for ever averted from me such an imputation."

The president then inquired of Louis XVI. whether he had any thing further to allege in his defence. Louis having declared that he had urged all he intended, the president informed him he might withdraw. Being conducted into an adjacent room with his advocates, his solicitude was aroused for the young Desèze, who gave tokens of exhaustion from his lengthened pleading. Again seated in the carriage, he discoursed with his accustomed serenity to those who escorted him, and reached the Temple at five o'clock.

He had scarcely quitted the convention ere a violent storm burst forth within it. One party maintained that a discussion should be opened, whilst the other, exclaiming against the eternal delays interposed to the conclusion of the trial, demanded an immediate vote, alleging that every tribunal, after having heard the accused, proceeded to gather the opinions. Lanjuinais had been moved, since the commencement of the proceedings, with an indignation which the impetuosity of his character no longer permitted him to restrain. He sprang to the tribune, and amidst the shouts his presence excited, moved, not an adjournment for discussion, but the abrogation of the whole process. Raising his voice, he asserted that the sway of the ferocious was over, and that the assembly must not be dishonoured by constituting itself the judge of Louis XVI.; that none in France possessed such a right, and that the assembly in particular had not the vestige of a title; that if it pretended to act as a political body, it could only take measures of security against the deposed king, but that if it acted as a tribunal, it outraged all principles, for it thereby submitted the vanquished to the judgment of the conqueror himself, inasmuch as the majority of the members present had proclaimed themselves the conspirators of the 10th August. At the word "conspirators" a frightful tumult ensued in every part of the hall. Deafening shouts arose:—"Order!" "To the Abbey!" "Down from the tribune!" It was in vain that Lanjuinais would have justified the obnoxious word by suggesting that it ought to be understood in its favourable sense, for the 10th August was a glorious conspiracy. The clamour still continued, and he finished by declaring that he would rather perish a thousand times than condemn, contrary to all law, even the most execrable tyrant.

A crowd of speakers pressed to succeed him, and the ferment grew more boisterous. The deputies would hear no more; they rose from their seats, intermingled, gathered into groups, upbraided and menaced each other: the president was obliged to put on his hat.* After an hour of agitation, tranquillity was at length restored; and the assembly, adopting the opinion of those who advocated a general discussion on the trial of Louis XVI., resolved that the discussion was opened, and that it should be continued, to the exclusion of all other business, until the decision should be pronounced.

The debate was therefore resumed on the 27th. The speakers already heard re-appeared at the tribune. Saint-Just was of the number. The presence of Louis XVI., humbled, prostrated, and serene in his disaster, had originated certain qualms in his mind. But he silenced them by representing Louis XVI. as a modest and wily tyrant, who oppressed with modesty, who defended himself with modesty, and against whose insinuating blandness it was necessary to be most strongly guarded. He had convoked the states-general, certainly, but it was to humble the nobility and reign by dividing; consequently, when he saw the power of the states swell so rapidly, he attempted to annihilate it. On the 14th July, on the 5th and 6th October, he was known to have secretly accumulated means for overwhelming the people; but each time his conspiracies were foiled by the national energy, he feigned a voluntary return from his evil courses, and exhibited a hypocritical and unnatural joy at his own discomfiture and the people's triumph. Subsequently, being unable to make use of force, he corrupted the defenders of liberty, plotted with the foreign foe, and drove his ministers to despair, one of whom felt compelled to address him by letter in these words—"Your secret relations prevent me from executing the laws, and I resign." In fine, he had put in vogue all the expedients of the deepest perfidy up to the 10th August; and now he still affected a delusive mildness to stagger his judges and snatch an escape.

It was thus that the vacillations of Louis XVI., so natural under his circumstances, were judged in a violent mind, which saw a marked and studied perfidy where merely weakness and regret for the past prevailed. Other speakers succeeded Saint-Just, and great impatience began to be manifested for the appearance of the Girondists in the debate. They had not yet committed themselves, but the time for explanation had now come. We have already alluded to the doubts that weighed with them, to the emotions wherewith they were affected, and to their tendency to extenuate in Louis XVI. a resistance they were so much more capable of comprehending than their opponents. Vergniaud avowed before some friends the deep commiseration he felt. Without being equally moved, perhaps, the others were all disposed to sympathise with the victim; and, in this position, they devised an expedient which strikingly betrays all their feelings and all their embarrassment; this was an appeal to the people. To get rid of a dangerous responsibility, and throw upon the nation the odium of barbarity if the king were condemned, or that of royalism if he were absolved, were the objects of the Girondists; and therein they displayed a deplorable weakness. Forasmuch as they were touched at the contemplation of the profound calamity of Louis XVI., they should unquestionably have had the courage to vindicate him themselves, and not have risked a civil war by remitting to the forty-four thousand sections into which France was subdivided, a question infallibly destined to stimulate the most violent passions and force all parties into hostile array. They ought to have energetically seized upon authority, and themselves courageously employed it, without shifting to the multitude a duty for which it was manifestly unfitted, and exposing the country to fatal confusion. By the advocacy of such a course, the Girondists gave their adversaries a signal advantage, since they justified the aspersion that they designed to foment civil war, and likewise brought into grievous suspicion their courage and sincerity. The Jacobins, consequently, were not backward in seizing the occasion, and asserted that those who contended for the acquittal of Louis XVI. were more candid and estimable than those who supported an appeal to the people. But such is the ordinary conduct of moderate parties. Pursuing the like conduct now as on the 2d and 3d September, the Girondists hesitated to compromise themselves for a king whom they regarded as an enemy—as one who, according to their sincere persuasion, had laboured to destroy them by foreign bayonets; nevertheless, moved at sight of this enemy vanquished and in captivity, they endeavoured to protect him, talked indignantly of the violence committed in his case, and, in short, did enough to ruin themselves without doing enough to save him.

Salles, who more than any other yielded to the phantasies of Louvet, and even excelled him in the art of detecting imaginary plots, was the first who broached and vindicated the expedient of an appeal to the people, in the sitting of the 27th. Giving up the conduct of Louis XVI. to all the bitterest animadversions of the republicans, and allowing that he richly merited the utmost severity with which it was possible to treat him, he insisted nevertheless that the assembly was called upon to perform a great political act, and not a mere act of vengeance; wherefore the question ought to be strictly judged with reference to the public interest. Now, in either case of acquittal or condemnation, he perceived striking inconveniences. An acquittal would be a perpetual source of discord, and the king would become the rallying cry for all parties. The remembrance of his delinquencies would be constantly recalled to the assembly as a standard reproach upon its weakness; such impunity would be a public scandal, likely to provoke popular revolts, and certain to be seized as a pretext by all agitators. The infamous men who had already paralysed the state by their crimes, would not fail to found upon this act of clemency reasons of justification for fresh excesses, precisely as they proclaimed themselves authorised by the slowness of the tribunals to perpetrate the massacres of September. From all quarters, in short, the assembly would be accused of having lacked the courage to terminate the universal excitement, and to consolidate the republic by an energetic and terrible example.

* [This is the last [illegible] by the president in the [illegible] to recall the members to order, after [illegible] the ringing of his bell.]

Condemned, the king would bequeath to his family all the pretensions of his race, and leave them to brothers more dangerous than himself, because they were less despised for weakness. The people, having no longer the crimes but the atonement before their eyes, would probably be induced to commiserate the fate of the king, and the factious would again find in that disposition a means of exasperating them against the National Convention. The sovereigns of Europe at present preserved an ominous silence, in expectation of an event which they looked forward to as the crowning iniquity, as the signal for an outburst of general detestation; but so soon as the head of the king had fallen, all, taking advantage of that pretext, would simultaneously pour on France to devastate and rend her. Then, perhaps, France herself, goaded by sufferings, would execrate the convention for an act thus provocative of a cruel and disastrous war.

Such were, argued Salles, the painful alternatives offered to the National Convention. In such a position, it was for the nation itself to decide, and to determine its own fate by determining that of Louis XVI. The danger of civil war was chimerical, for no such evil had resulted from the convocation of the primary assemblies to elect a convention to be intrusted with the destinies of France, nor did any apprehensions of such a consequence appear to be entertained upon an occasion equally momentous and exciting, since the sanction of the constitution was intended for submission to these same primary assemblies. The delays and the difficulties of a fresh deliberation in forty-four thousand assemblies were but vain objections, for the reference would be, not to deliberate, but to decide without discussion between the two propositions presented by the convention. The question would be thus stated to the primary assemblies—"Shall Louis XVI. be punished with death or detained till the peace?" and they would reply by the words, "detained," or "put to death," as the case might be. With the aid of extraordinary couriers, the answers might be brought in fifteen days from the farthest extremities of France.

These sentiments had been heard with various feelings. Serres, deputy from the Upper Alps, retracted his first opinion, which was for the judgment, and supported an appeal to the people. Barbaroux repelled the justification of Louis XVI., without concluding with any specific motion, for he did not venture to absolve against the wishes of his constituents, or condemn against those of his friends. Buzot declared himself in favour of the appeal to the people; but he modified the measure of Salles, and recommended that the convention should itself take the initiative by voting the death, and merely demanding from the primary assemblies a simple sanction of that judgment. Rabaut Saint-Etienne, that protestant minister who had already distinguished himself by his talents in the Constituent Assembly, exclaimed with indignation against the accumulated powers exercised by the assembly. "As to myself," said he, "I am weary of my portion of despotism; I am disgusted, tormented, remorseful, at the tyranny that falls to my share, and I sigh for the moment when you shall create a tribunal which may take from me the form and aspect of a tyrant. You seek political reasons; you will find them in history. The people of London, who had pressed so urgently for the execution of the king, were the first to curse his judges, and prostrate themselves before his successors. When Charles II. returned to the throne, the city gave him a superb feast, the people gave way to the most extravagant joy, and flocked to witness the deaths of those very judges whom Charles afterwards sacrificed to the manes of his father. People of Paris, parliament of France, have you understood me?"

Faure boldly and energetically urged the revocation of all the decrees bearing upon the arraignment. The sombre Robespierre at length appeared, surcharged with gall and malice. He said that he also had been affected, and had felt the republican virtue shaken in his heart, at sight of the criminal humbled before the sovereign power. But the last proof of devotion due to the country was to stifle every emotion of sensibility. He then reiterated what had been already advanced upon the competence of the convention, upon the endless delays frustrating the national vengeance, and upon the consideration observed for the tyrant, whilst the warmest friends of liberty were attacked without the slightest regard. He asserted that this appeal to the people was a mere scheme similar to that devised by Guadet, when advocating the purging scrutiny, and that its perfidious object was to bring every thing into question again—the existing representation, the 10th August, and the republic itself. Identifying the question, as usual, with himself and his enemies, he drew a comparison between the present situation and that of July 1791, when it was debated whether Louis XVI. should be tried for the flight to Varennes. Robespierre had played an important part upon that occasion. He recalled his own dangers, the successful efforts of his adversaries to replace Louis XVI. upon the throne, the slaughter of the Champ de Mars which had ensued, and the perils to which Louis XVI., when replaced on the throne, had exposed the commonwealth. With malicious perfidy, he depicted his opponents of the present day as the same as his opponents of former times, and represented himself as exposed, and France with him, to the same dangers as then, and still by the intrigues of those miscreants who called themselves exclusively the honest. "At this moment," added Robespierre, "they are silent upon the great interests of the country; they abstain from declaring their opinion upon the last king; but their secret and pernicious activity produces all the troubles which agitate the country; and to mislead the sound but often deceived majority, they assail the purest patriots, under the title of a factious minority. Minorities often resolve into majorities when the eyes of hoodwinked assemblies are opened. Virtue was always in a minority upon earth! Unless it were so, would the earth be peopled by tyrants and slaves? Hampden* and Sydney were in the minority, for they expired on a scaffold. Critias, Anitus, Cæsar, Clodius, were in the majority; but Socrates was in a minority, for he swallowed hemlock—Cato was in the minority, for he tore open his bowels." Robespierre subsequently recommended quietness to the galleries, in order tc deprive his adversaries of all pretext for accusation, since they represented the simple applauses bestowe on the faithful deputies as proofs of rebellion. "People," he exclaimed, "reserve your applauses, shun the spectacle of our debates! We shall not combat the less resolutely apart from your presence." He at length brought his speech to a conclusion, by demanding that Louis XVI. should be forthwith pronounced guilty, and condemned to death.

* [Probably Russell is meant: Hampden died of a wound received in battle.]

The debate continued, and speakers succeeded each other in the tribune during the 28th, the 29th, and till the 31st. Vergniaud ultimately rose for the first time, and extraordinary eagerness was manifested tc hear the Girondists expressing their opinions by the tongue of their greatest orator, and breaking a silence with which Robespierre was not the only one to upbraid them.

Vergniaud began by developing the principle of the sovereignty of the people, and distinguishing the cases in which the representatives ought to make a reference to it. It would be attended with too much delay and too many difficulties to appeal on all legislative acts to a great nation; but on certain acts of high importance it was quite otherwise. The constitution, for example, had been destined in advance to the national sanction. But that was not the only object which claimed an extraordinary sanction. The trial of Louis XVI. was invested with such grave considerations, from the accumulation of powers arrogated by the assembly, from the inviolability which had been constitutionally secured to the monarch, and from the political effects which were certain to result from a condemnation, that its high importance could scarcely be contested, nor that the final adjudication ought to be submitted to the people themselves. After having substantiated these positions, Vergniaud, who directed himself peculiarly to the refutation of Robespierre, proceeded to investigate the political dangers of an appeal to the people, and to handle all the great questions which divided the two parties.

He adverted, in the first place, to the contentions which were apprehended from remitting to the people the judgment on the king for sanction. He reproduced the arguments adduced by the other Girondists, and maintained that if no civil war were feared from convoking the primary assemblies to sanction the constitution, no good ground for alarm could exist in their meeting to ratify the sentence on the king. This oft-repeated argument was, after all, of little value, for the constitution was not the grand question of the revolution; it could never be more than a collection of details, under an institution already decreed and accepted—a republic. But the death of the king was a more formidable question, since it involved the momentous point whether the revolution, proceeding by way of death against royalty, should irrevocably break with the past, and march to its proposed goal with inexorable vengeance and energy for its watchwords. Now, if so fearful a question already divided the convention and Paris with such bitterness of discord, there was the greatest danger in introducing it amongst the forty-four thousand sections of the French territory. In all the theatres, in all the popular societies, tumultuous dissensions occurred; and the convention was imperatively called upon boldly to grapple with the difficulty, and decide the question at once and for ever, precisely to prevent it resting with the whole French people, who would have in all probability solved it in multitudinous battle-fields.

Vergniaud, however, partaking upon this point the opinion of his friends, contended that civil war was not to be apprehended. He said that in the departments the agitators had not gained the preponderance which a dastardly weakness had allowed them to usurp in Paris; that they had certainly traversed the surface of the republic, but had nowhere met with aught but scorn; and that the people had given the strongest proof of obedience to the law the impure blood that flowed in their veins. He subsequently ridiculed the fears that had been expressed respecting the actual majority, which was alleged to be composed of intriguers, royalists, and aristocrats, and held up to merited reproof the presumptuous assertion that virtue was in a minority on earth. "Citizens!" he exclaimed, "Catiline was of the minority in the Roman senate; and if that minority had prevailed, there was an end of Rome, the senate, and liberty. In the Constituent Assembly, Maury and Cazalès were in the minority; and if they had prevailed, there was an end of you. The kings also are in a minority upon earth, and to enchain the people, they assert likewise that virtue is in a minority! They also say that the majority of populations is composed of intriguers, who must be awed to silence by terror, if empires are to be preserved from a general convulsion."

He then tauntingly asked whether, in order to constitute a majority conformable to the desires of certain men, it was deemed expedient to employ banishment and death, to convert France into a desert, and thus abandon it to the conceptions of frantic miscreants.

After having avenged the majority of France, he vindicated himself and his friends, whom he exhibited constantly resisting, and with equal courage, all despotisms—that of the court and that of the brigands of ptember. He pourtrayed them, during the day of the 10th August, sitting calmly amidst the roar of cannon from the palace, and pronouncing the deposition before the victory of the people, whilst those Brutuses, so eager now to throttle prostrate tyrants, hid their terrors in the bowels of the earth, and there ignominiously awaited the issue of the uncertain combat waging by liberty against despotism.

He then retorted upon his adversaries the reproach of stirring up civil war. "Yes," said he, "those are the genuine instigators of civil war, who, preaching assassination against the partisans of tyranny, apply that epithet to all the victims their hatred prompts them to destroy; those who invoke poniards against the representatives of the people, and clamour for the dissolution of the government and of the convention; those who conspire that the minority may become the arbiter of the majority, that it may enforce its decrees by insurrections, and that the Catilines may be called to dominion in the senate. They desire civil war who inculcate these maxims in all public places, and mystify the people by stigmatising reason as Feuillantism, justice as pusillanimity, and sacred humanity as conspiracy."

"Civil war!" exclaimed the orator, rebuking Robes- ierre, "by invoking the sovereignty of the people! But in July 1791 you were more modest—you were not then so solicitous to depreciate it and usurp its functions. You busied yourself in circulating a petition praying the assembly to consult the people on the judgment to be passed on Louis XVI. after the return from Varennes! At that time you upheld the sovereignty of the people, and were far from surmising that its invocation was equivalent to civil war! Was it because it then favoured your secret views, and it now thwarts them?"

turned to other considerations. It had been said that the assembly ought to evince sufficient greatness and courage to execute its judgment without seeking to support itself by the opinion of the people. "Courage was needed," said he, "to attack Louis XVI. in the plenitude of his power—is much required to send Louis, vanquished and disarmed, to the scaffold? A Cimbrian soldier entered the cell of Marius to kill him; terrified at the aspect of his victim, he fled without daring to strike. Do you doubt if that soldier had been a member of the senate, he would have hesitated to vote the death of the tyrant? What courage do you discover in an act of which any poltroon is capable?"

Adverting to another order of courage, that which must be displayed against foreign powers, he said, "Since you talk continually of a great political act, it is not inexpedient to consider the question in that light. We are well aware that the powers merely wait for this concluding pretext to pour all together upon France. She will vanquish them, doubtless; the heroism of the French soldiers is a sure guarantee; but war will compel an increased expenditure, additional efforts of all kinds. If, then, hostilities induce fresh emissions of assignats, thereby enhancing in a fearful proportion the price of the first necessaries of life—if they give new and mortal stabs to commerce—if they cause torrents of blood to flow on land and sea—what great benefits will you have conferred on humanity? What gratitude will your country owe you for having perpetrated in its name, and in despite of its contemned sovereignty, an act of vengeance, become the cause, or even the pretext, of events so calamitous? I discard," emphatically exclaimed the speaker, "every idea of discomfiture; but will you dare vaunt your services? There will not be a family without a father or a son to mourn; agriculture will soon languish for want of hands to till; the workshops will be forsaken; your exhausted exchequer will demand fresh taxes; the social body, worn out by the assaults made upon it from without by armed enemies, from within by contending factions, will fall into a mortal languor. Tremble lest amidst those triumphs France may not resemble those famous monuments which in Egypt have vanquished time: the stranger as he passes wonders at their greatness: should he penetrate, what meets his eye?—inanimate ashes and the silence of the tomb."

Besides these fears, there were others which presented themselves to the mind of Vergniaud; they were suggested to him by the history of England, and by the conduct of Cromwell, the principal but hidden author of the death of Charles I. That man, always stimulating the people, first against the king, then against the parliament itself, eventually broke his feeble instrument and seated himself in supreme power. "Have you not heard," added Vergniaud, on this topic, "within these walls and elsewhere, men crying, 'If bread be dear, the cause is at the Temple; if specie be scarce, if our armies be badly provided, the cause is at the Temple; if we have to suffer the daily spectacle of indigence, the cause is at the Temple!'"

Those who hold this language, nevertheless, are not ignorant that the high price of bread, the deficient supplies of food, the defective administration in the war departments, and the indigence which so acutely afflicts our sensibility, are owing to other causes than any at the Temple. What, then, are their designs? Who will assure me that those same men who strive so pertinaciously to degrade the convention, and would have perhaps succeeded in that object if the majesty of the people, which resides in it, could by any possibility have been affected by their falsehoods—those same men who every where proclaim that a new revolution is necessary, who induce such and such sections to declare themselves in a state of permanent insurrection, who say at the commune that when the convention succeeded Louis they did but change their tyrant, and that another 10th August is indispensable; those men who speak only of plots, death, traitors, proscriptions, who inculcate in the sectional assemblies, and in their publications, that a defender must be named for the republic, that its hope of safety rests in a single chief—who will assure me, I ask, that those same men will not exclaim, after the death of Louis, with exaggerated violence, 'If bread be dear, the cause is in the convention; if specie be scarce, if our armies be badly provided, the cause is in the convention; if the machine of government be moved with difficulty, the cause is in the convention intrusted with its direction; if the calamities of war have been aggravated by the declarations of England and Spain, the cause is the convention, which provoked those declarations by the precipitate condemnation of Louis?'

Who will assure me that around those ——— cries of turbulent anarchy there will not rally an aristocracy thirsting for vengeance, misery eager for change, and even the pity inveterate prejudices will have excited for the fate of Louis? Who will assure me that in this tempest, during whose fury the assassins of September will be seen starting from their dens, there will not be presented to you, steeped in gore and saluted as a liberator, that defender, that chief who is said to be so indispensable? A chief! ah! if such were their audacity, his appearance would be the signal for a thousand daggers to be planted in his body! But to what horrors would not Paris in the interim be abandoned—Paris, whose heroic courage against kings posterity will admire, and never conceive its ignominious subjection to a handful of brigands, the refuse of the human species, agitating in its very heart, and tearing it in every direction in the convulsive throes of their madness and ambition! Who would be able to inhabit a city where terror and death held sway? And you, industrious citizens, whose industry produces all wealth, and for whom the means of industry would be destroyed—you who have made such great sacrifices for the revolution, and from whom the last remnant would be wrested—you whose virtues, ardent patriotism, and pure sincerity, have too easily rendered you open to seduction—what would become of you? what resources would you have? what hands would stanch your wounds and administer succour to your wailing families?

Would you seek those false friends, those perfidious flatterers, who had precipitated you into the abyss? Alas! rather fly them! Dread their reply! I will foretell it to you. You would ask of them bread, and they would say to you, 'Go into the quarries, and dispute with the earth for some bleeding fragments of the victims you have slaughtered!' or, 'Will you have blood? Here take, this is blood and human flesh, we have no other sustenance to offer you!' You shudder, citizens! Oh, my country! I invoke thee to attest the efforts which I make to save thee from this terrible crisis."

Vergniaud's extemporary oratory produced a profound impression upon his auditors, and excited general admiration. Robespierre had slunk abashed beneath the fire of his frank and vigorous eloquence. But although it had shaken, it failed to persuade the assembly, which still hesitated between the two parties. Several speakers were successively heard for and against the appeal to the people. Brissot, Gensonné, and Pétion, all supported it in their turns. Eventually a deputy rose, who operated a decisive influence upon the question: this was Barrère. From his pliability, his cold and evasive reasoning, he was at once the type and the oracle of the centre or Plain. He discoursed largely upon the trial, viewed it in all its phases as regarded facts, laws, and policy, and supplied motives for condemning to all those feeble minds who only required specious grounds for yielding. His mediocre arguments served as efficient pretexts to all who hung in trembling suspense; and from that moment the unhappy monarch's doom was sealed. The debate was prolonged till the 7th January 1793, by which time every one was thoroughly weary of the monotonous repetition of the same facts and arguments. It was declared closed without opposition; but a motion for a fresh adjournment excited a tumult of the most violent description, but was finally disposed of by a decree definitively fixing the 14th January for framing the questions and calling the roll of members.

When that fatal day arrived, an extraordinary concourse of spectators surrounded the assembly and filled the galleries. Several members pressed to the tribune, propounding various forms of submitting the questions. At length, after a long debate, the convention resolved all the questions into the three following:—

Is Louis Capet guilty of conspiracy against the liberty of the nation, and of crimes against the general safety of the state?

Shall the judgment, whatever it may be, be referred to the sanction of the people?

What penalty shall be inflicted on him?

The whole day was consumed in settling the questions. The 15th was devoted to the call of members. The assembly passed a preliminary resolution that each member should pronounce his vote in the tribune; that the vote might be accompanied with reasons, and should be written and signed; that the absent without cause should be censured, but that those who subsequently appeared might record their votes, even after the call was finished. At last this dreaded call commenced upon the first question. Eight members were absent on account of illness, and twenty on commissions of the assembly. Thirty-seven, alleging different reasons for their conclusion, acknowledged Louis XVI. guilty, but declared themselves incompetent to pronounce a sentence, and demanded mere general measures of precaution against him. Six hundred and eighty-three members declared Louis XVI. guilty, without explanation. The assembly was composed of 749 members.

The president, in the name of the National Convention, declared Louis Capet "guilty of conspiracy against the liberty of the nation, and of crimes against the general safety of the state."

The call recommenced on the second question, that of the appeal to the people. Twenty-nine members were absent. Four, namely, Lafon, Waudelaincourt, Morisson, and Lacroix, declined to vote. The deputy Noël protested. Eleven gave their opinions coupled with different conditions. Two hundred and eighty-one voted for the appeal to the people; four hundred and twenty-three rejected it. The president declared, in the name of the National Convention, that "the sentence on Louis XVI. shall not be referred to the ratification of the people."

The whole of the 15th was taken up in the individual vote upon the two first questions; the third was adjourned to the sitting of the following day.

The excitement in Paris grew more intense as the decisive moment approached. At the theatres, cries in favour of Louis XVI. had been uttered during the representation of a piece called "The Friend of the Laws." The commune had ordered the suspension of all theatrical exhibitions; but the executive council had revoked the measure as an attack on the liberty of the press, under which category the liberty of the stage was comprehended. In the prisons the inmates were in the deepest consternation. Rumours had gone abroad that the frightful days of September were to be renewed, and the prisoners and their relatives besieged the deputies with supplications to save them from death. The Jacobins, on their side, asserted that conspiracies were hatching in all quarters to screen Louis XVI. from punishment and to re-establish royalty. Their rage, stimulated by the delays and obstacles opposed to its gratification, broke out into more furious menaces; and the two parties were thus additionally incensed against each other by their mutual suspicions of sinister designs.

The multitude congregated around the hall of the assembly on the morning of the 16th, far exceeded the numbers of the previous days. The proceedings of that day were to be decisive, for the verdict of guilty became in reality of no value if Louis XVI. were simply condemned to banishment, and the object of those desirous to save him would be fully gained, since all they could possibly hope for at the moment was to snatch him from the scaffold. The galleries had been early usurped by the Jacobins, and their eyes were intently fixed on the tribune, where each deputy was to appear when recording his vote. Several hours were consumed by the convention in attending to measures of public order, in summoning and hearing the ministers, and in eliciting explanations from the mayor respecting the closing of the barriers, which were alleged to have been kept shut during the day. It was ordered that they should remain open, and that the federalists then in Paris should share with the Parisians in doing duty through the city and at all the public establishments. As the day was already far advanced, it was resolved that the sitting should be permanent until the conclusion of the voting. At the instant the call was about to commence, a doubt was started upon the proportion of voices necessary to pass a particular sentence. Lehardy proposed two-thirds, as in the criminal courts. Danton, who had just arrived from Belgium, strongly opposed that suggestion, and advocated the simple majority, that is to say, the moiety plus one. Lanjuinais braved a fresh storm by strenuously insisting that, after so flagrantly violating all the other forms of justice, the convention should at least observe that which rendered two-thirds of the suffrages indispensable. "We are to vote," he exclaimed, "under the daggers and the cannons of the factious." At these words, multitudinous vociferations assailed the speaker, and the assembly stopped the debate by resolving that the formalities observed in its decrees were peculiar, and that, according to those formalities, they were all passed by a simple majority.

It was now half-past seven in the evening, and the calling to vote began with the prospect of continuing through the night. Some pronounced death unconditionally; others declared for detention and banishment after peace; a certain number voted death with a restriction, in the form of an invitation to examine whether it might not be advisable to respite the execution. Mailhe was the deviser of this restriction, which was capable of saving Louis XVI., for time was every thing in the case, and delay equivalent to acquittal. The expedient was adopted by several members.

The voting proceeded in the midst of tumult. At this moment, the interest inspired by Louis XVI. had reached its height, and many members had entered with the intention of declaring in his favour; but on the opposite side, the malevolence of his enemies had likewise waxed in fierceness, and the people had been finally led to identify the cause of the republic with the death of the last king, and to deem the republic condemned and royalty re-established if Louis XVI. were saved. Alarmed at the ferment this popular conviction excited, several members began to dread civil war; and, although greatly moved at the fate of Louis, they shuddered at the consequences of an acquittal. This apprehension became greater at sight of the convention and the scene passing within its walls. As each deputy ascended the steps of the tribune, all noise was hushed to hear him; but the instant he had voted, marks of approbation or displeasure were boisterously manifested, and followed him as he returned to his seat. The galleries received with murmurs every vote not for death; their occupants often directed threatening gestures to the assembly itself. The deputies retorted from the interior of the hall, and thence resulted a tumultuous interchange of hot defiance and opprobrious phrases. This mournful and terrible scene caused many a heart to quake, and changed various resolutions. Lecointre of Versailles, whose courage was undoubted, and who had been one of the most vehement gesticulators against the galleries, came into the tribune, paused in evident tremor, and dropped from his lips the unexpected and irrevocable word—"Death." Vergniaud, who had felt so deep a sympathy for Louis XVI., and had even declared to his friends that he never could bring himself to condemn that unfortunate prince—Vergniaud, when he beheld so lamentable a scene of uproar, believed it indicative of civil war in France, and gave his vote for death, coupling it, nevertheless, with the amendment of Mailhe. Being interrogated upon his change of opinion, he replied that he felt assured civil war was ready to explode, and that he dared not put the life of a single individual in the balance against the safety of all France.

A great many of the Girondists adopted the amendment of Mailhe. One deputy whose vote excited an extraordinary sensation was the Duke of Orleans. Obliged to render himself acceptable to the Jacobins or perish, he pronounced the death of his kinsman, and returned to his seat amidst the universal and indescribable agitation caused by his vote.* This melancholy scene continued throughout the night of the 16th and the day of the 17th, till seven in the evening. The examination of the votes was awaited with breathless anxiety. The avenues were thronged with an immense crowd, and eager inquiries ran from mouth to mouth as to the result of the scrutiny. In the assembly itself great uncertainty prevailed, for the words "detention" and "banishment" were thought to have been heard as often as the more emphatic one of "death." According to some, the condemnation had failed by one vote, whilst others alleged that the casting voice rested on the other side. It was universally allowed, however, that a single suffrage might decide the question, and great solicitude was felt whether a new voter might not arrive. At that identical moment a man was descried at the foot of the tribune, moving painfully forwards, and whose bandaged head proclaimed him an invalid. It was Duchastel, deputy of the Deux-Sevres, who had risen from his bed of sickness to record his vote. His appearance was the signal for astounding vociferations. Their purport was that the conspirators had forced him out to save Louis XVI., and that he ought to be subjected to an interrogation. This the assembly refused, and sustained his privilege of voting in virtue of the resolution which admitted suffrages after the general call. Duchastel ascended the tribune with an air of firmness, and amidst the profoundest attention gave his voice for banishment.

Other incidents succeeded. The minister for foreign affairs solicited liberty to speak, in order to communicate a note of the Chevalier d'Ocariz, the Spanish ambassador. He offered the neutrality of Spain and its good offices with the other powers, if the life of Louis XVI. were spared. The impatient Mountaineers exclaimed that this was a preconcerted diversion to originate fresh obstacles, and demanded the order of the day. Danton urged that war should be instantly declared against Spain. The assembly adopted in preference the order of the day. Another request was then submitted; it was from the advocates of Louis XVI., who desired to appear before the assembly for the purpose of making a communication. Redoubled cries issued from the Mountain. Robespierre insisted that all defence was terminated, that counsel could have nothing more to impart to the convention, that the judgment was already passed, and that it ought to be forthwith pronounced. It was resolved that the advocates should not be introduced until after the promulgation of the sentence.

Vergniaud occupied the presidential chair. "Citizens," said he, "I am about to announce the result of the scrutiny. You will preserve, I hope, a profound silence. When justice has spoken, humanity resumes its sway."

The assembly was composed of 749 members; fifteen were absent on commissions, eight from illness, and five had declined voting, which reduced the number of deputies present to 721, and the absolute majority to 361. The scrutiny showed that 286 had voted for detention or banishment under different conditions. Two had voted for irons; forty-six for death with a respite, either till the peace or till the ratification of the constitution. Twenty-six had declared for death, but like Mailhe, they had recommended the question for consideration whether it might not be advantageous to respite the execution. Their vote, however, was independent of this restrictive clause. Three hundred and sixty-one had voted for death without condition.

The president, in an accent of grief, declared, in the name of the convention, that "the penalty pronounced against Louis Capet is death."*

The advocates of Louis XVI. were immediately after this announcement ushered to the bar. Desèze was the first to speak. He said he had been sent by his client to interpose an appeal to the people from the judgment passed by the convention. He rested his procedure upon the small majority which had decided the condemnation, and argued that, since such conscientious doubts had been entertained by so many enlightened minds, it was but reasonable to refer it to the nation itself. Tronchet subjoined that the penal code having been followed with regard to the severity of the punishment, it should surely have been respected in the humanity of its forms; consequently, the provision requiring two-thirds of the voices ought not to have been disregarded. The venerable Malesherbes rose also in his turn, and, in a voice broken with sobs, essayed to speak. "Citizens," said he, "I am unused to oratory—I observe with pain that you refuse me time to collect my ideas upon the mode of reckoning the votes—I have many observations to impress upon you—but—citizens—pardon my confusion—grant me until to-morrow to lay my ideas before you."

The assembly was moved at sight of the tears and the grey hairs of the estimable old man. "Citizens," said Vergniaud to the three advocates, "the convention has heard your reclamations; they were made by you in execution of a sacred duty." Then addressing the assembly, he added: "Is it your pleasure to decern the honours of the sitting to the defenders of Louis?" "Yes, yes," was the unanimous rejoinder.

Robespierre immediately took possession of the tribune, and quoting the decree already passed against the appeal to the people, repudiated the demand of the advocates. Guadet recommended that, without admitting the appeal to the people, twenty-four hours should be allowed to Malesherbes. Merlin of Douai maintained that the manner of accounting the votes was as a topic absolutely foreclosed, inasmuch as, if the penal code, so constantly invoked, required two-

* [The reader will probably pardon another quotation from the author of The Graphic History of the National Convention. It conveys one of his best pictures.

"Egalité, walking with a faltering step and a countenance paler than the corpse already stretched in the tomb, advanced to the place where he was to put the seal to his eternal infamy; and there, unable to utter a word in public unless it were written down, he read, in these terms, his fearful vote:—

'Exclusively governed by my duty, and convinced that all those who have resisted the sovereignty of the people deserve death, my vote is for DEATH!'

'Oh, the monster!' broke forth from all sides; 'how infamous!' and general hisses and imprecations attended Egalité as he returned to his seat. His conduct appeared so atrocious, that of all the assassins of September, of all the wretches of every description who were there assembled, and truly the number was not small, not one ventured to applaud him; all, on the contrary, viewed him with distrust or detestation; and after the declaration of his vote, the agitation of the assembly was extreme. From the effect it produced, it seemed as if Egalité, by that single vote, had irrevocably condemned Louis to death, and that all that followed was but a vain formality."—Vol. ii. p. 48.]

* ["When the fatal words were pronounced, an explosion of satanic joy was expected from the tribunes; nothing of the kind occurred. An universal stupor took possession of the whole assembly, damping alike the atrocious hurras and the infernal applause. The victory which had been obtained filled the victors with as much awe as it inspired the vanquished with consternation; hardly was a hollow murmur heard; the members gazed at each other in deathlike silence; every one seemed to dread even the sound of his own voice. There is something so overpowering in great events, that those even whose passions they most completely satisfy are restrained from giving vent to their feelings."—Graphic History of the Convention, vol. ii. p. 61] thirds of the voices for a decision on the fact, it required but a simple majority for the adjudication of the punishment. As, in the case under discussion, the criminality had been declared almost unanimously, it was of very little moment that a bare majority had been obtained for the sentence.

In consequence of these observations, the convention passed to the order of the day upon the reclamations of the advocates, declared the appeal of Louis null, and deferred till the morrow the question of respite. When that morrow came (the 18th), a complaint was lodged that the enumeration of the votes had not been taken with exactness, and a fresh examination was accordingly demanded. The whole day was engrossed by contentions: the calculation was eventually found to be accurate, but the assembly was compelled to adjourn till the following morning the question of respite.

On the 19th, therefore, this final question was agitated. It brought the whole process into dilemma again, for delay was to Louis XVI. life itself. But, after having exhausted their whole artillery of reason in the previous discussions upon the punishment and the appeal, the Girondists and those who wished to save Louis XVI. were completely at a loss for further arguments. They indeed once more brought forward the allegation of political reasons; but they were quickly answered that if Louis XVI. were dead, the powers would doubtless arm to avenge him, and that if he were alive and incarcerated, they would just as doubtless arm to deliver him, and that the consequences would be precisely similar. Barrère represented that it was disgraceful thus to parade a head in the European courts, and stipulate for the life or death of a condemned person as an article of treaty. He added, that it would be an act of cruelty to Louis himself, who would be exposed to death at every movement of the armies. The assembly, hastily closing the discussion, resolved that each member should vote yea or nay without quitting his place. At three o'clock in the morning of the 20th January the call was finished, and the president declared, upon a majority of 380 to 310 voices, that there should be no respite to the execution of Louis Capet.

At this instant a letter was brought from Kersaint. That deputy resigned his seat, stating to the assembly that he could no longer endure the ignominy of sitting in its ranks amongst men of blood, when their counsels, aided by the force of terror, gained the ascendancy over those of virtuous men—when Marat prevailed over Pétion. This letter caused prodigious excitement. Gensonné took the initiative, and availed himself of the occasion to avenge upon the Septembrisers the sentence of death that had been so recently passed. "It was of little consequence," he said, "to have merely punished the outrages of tyranny, if others much more formidable were suffered to enjoy impunity. The convention had but performed the moiety of its task, unless it subjected to dire expiation the crimes of September, and enjoined a prosecution against their instigators." The greater part of the assembly rose and responded to this sentiment with acclamation. Marat and Tallien attempted to stem the movement. "If you punish," they exclaimed, "the instigators of September, punish likewise the conspirators who were intrenched in the palace on the day of the 10th August." The assembly, acting upon all these suggestions, forthwith ordered the minister of justice to institute proceedings against the promoters of the offences committed during the early days of September, the individuals found bearing arms in the palace on the night of the 9th and 10th August, and the functionaries who quitted their posts to repair to Paris for the purpose of conspiring with the court.

Louis XVI. was definitively condemned. No reprieve could defer the execution of the sentence, and all conceivable means for postponing the fatal hour had been tried in vain. The members of the right side, secret royalists as well as republicans, were equally dismayed, both at the cruelty of the sentence and the ascendancy manifestly acquired by the Mountaineers. In Paris a dead stupor reigned; the audacity of the new governing power had produced the ordinary effect of force on the masses; it had paralysed and reduced to silence the great majority, and excited indignation simply in a few more unbending minds. There were still some old retainers of Louis XVI., some young nobles, and some guardsmen, who purposed, as it was rumoured, to rush to the rescue of their king and snatch him from the scaffold. But to meet, to exchange ideas, to concert, in short, amidst the profound terror on the one hand and the active vigilance on the other, was impracticable, and all that could possibly occur must amount only to certain isolated acts of despair. The Jacobins, in raptures at their triumph, were nevertheless themselves amazed at it; and they exhorted each other to keep in close array during the last and critical twenty-four hours, to send trusty messengers to all the authorities—the commune, the staff of the national guard, the department, and the executive council—to keep alive their zeal and ensure the execution of the sentence. They boasted that this execution would take place, that it must infallibly take place; but from the very eagerness wherewith they repeated that opinion, it was clear that they were not so sure of the catastrophe as they pretended. The death of a king on a public scaffold, in the heart of a country which in its manners, usages, and laws, was but three years previously an absolute monarchy, seemed still environed with doubt, and to be rendered credible only by the event itself.

Upon the executive council was thrown the painful duty of putting the sentence in execution. All the ministers had assembled in the council-chamber, depressed and horror-struck; of their body, Garat, as minister of justice, was charged with the most melancholy of all commissions—that of waiting upon Louis XVI., and imparting to him the decrees of the convention. He accordingly repaired to the Temple, accompanied by Santerre, by a deputation from the commune and the criminal tribunal, and by the secretary of the executive council. Louis XVI. had anxiously expected a visit from his defenders for the last four days, and had often vainly requested to see them. Two hours after mid-day of the 20th January he was still looking every instant for their arrival, when he suddenly heard the welcome sounds of steps approaching; he hastened forward and perceived the messengers of the executive council. He paused with dignity upon the threshold of the door, and allowed no outward symptom of emotion to escape him. Garat addressed him with an air of sadness, and communicated to him the object of his mission. Grouvelle, the secretary of the executive council, upon the intimation of his superior, read aloud the decrees of the convention. The first declared Louis XVI. guilty of crimes affecting the general security of the state; the second condemned him to death; the third rejected all appeal to the people; and the fourth enjoined the execution within twenty-four hours. Louis, surveying those who surrounded him with a tranquil gaze, took the paper containing the decrees from the hands of Grouvelle, placed it in his pocket, and read to Garat a letter in which he requested three days to prepare for death, a confessor to assist him in his last moments, the privilege of seeing his family, and permission for it to leave France. Garat received the letter, with a promise to lay it without loss of time before the convention. The king at the same time gave him the address of the ecclesiastic whose last offices he desired to secure.

Louis XVI. re-entered his apartment with undisturbed serenity, directed dinner to be served, and partook of the meats as usual. Knives had been purposely withheld, and were refused him when he desired they might be brought. "Do they think me such a coward," said he, with dignity, "as to attempt my own life? I am innocent, and will die without fear." He was obliged, however to dispense with a knife. After finishing his repast, he returned to his chamber, and awaited the rejoinder to his letter with perfect calmness.

The convention refused the respite, but granted all the other demands. Garat dispatched a messenger to M. Edgeworth de Firmont, the ecclesiastic selected by Louis XVI.; he offered him a seat in his own carriage, and conducted him in person to the Temple. He reached that prison at six o'clock, and immediately proceeded to the great tower, accompanied by Santerre. He apprised the king that the convention permitted him the solace of a minister of religion, and to see his family without witnesses, but that it repelled the application for a respite.

Garat added that M. Edgeworth had arrived, that he was in an adjacent room, and would be immediately introduced. He then retired, with increased amazement and admiration at the placid magnanimity of the prince.

When ushered into the presence of the king, M. Edgeworth would have thrown himself at his feet, but the king prevented him, and both together melted into tears of tenderness. He then inquired with lively curiosity after the state of the clergy of France, after several bishops, and especially after the Archbishop of Paris, whom he begged M. Edgeworth to assure that he died sincerely attached to his communion. Eight o'clock having struck, he arose, requested M. Edgeworth to wait, and left him in great emotion, saying he was going to see his family. The municipal officers, unwilling to lose sight of the king's person even whilst he was with his family, had determined that the interview should take place in the eating-room, which was provided with a glass door, and in which all his motions could be observed without his words being overheard. The king, consequently, proceeded to that apartment, and caused water to be placed on the table, lest the princesses might have need of such relief. He walked uneasily to and fro, anxiously awaiting the painful moment in which beings so dear to him should appear. At half-past eight the door opened; the queen, holding the dauphin by the hand, the Princess Elizabeth, and the princess-royal, flew into the arms of Louis XVI., sobbing bitterly. The door was closed, and the municipal officers, Cléry, and M. Edgeworth, planted themselves before the glazed frames, to witness the heart-rending interview. During the first moments, the scene was one of distraction and despairing wo. Shrieks, lamentations, convulsive sobs, dimly expressed its intense desolation. At length the tears were dried, conversation became more tranquil, and the princesses, still holding the king in their arms, spoke to him for some time in subdued tones. After a conference of considerable duration, broken by intervals of speechless dejection, he moved to depart, fearful of being altogether overpowered by so afflicting a situation, and promised to see them again the following morning at eight o'clock. "You promise us?" urged the princesses, with solicitude. "Yes, yes!" replied the king, sighing deeply. At this moment, the queen had grasped him by one arm, the Princess Elizabeth by the other; the princess-royal held her arms tightly clasped round her father's waist, and the young prince, in front of him, stretched his hands to his mother and his aunt. At the instant of separation, the young princess-royal fell in a swoon; she was quickly revived, and the king returned to M. Edgeworth, grievously depressed at the agonising scene. In a few minutes, however, he succeeded in retrieving himself, and resumed all his serenity.

M. Edgeworth then proposed to celebrate mass, which the king had not heard for a long period. After demur, the commune consented to allow the ny, and a requisition was made to the neighbouring church for the necessary ornaments to be furnished on the following morning. The king retired to rest about midnight, desiring Cléry to awaken him before five o'clock. M. Edgeworth threw himself on a bed; Cléry remained standing by the pillow of his master, contemplating the peaceful slumber he enjoyed on the eve of an ignominious execution.

Whilst these things were passing at the Temple, a deplorable event had occurred in the city. A few indignant spirits, scattered here and there, it is certain were hotly brooding over the coming catastrophe, although the mass, either terror-struck or supine, remained quiescent. A body-guardsman, named Pâris, had resolved to avenge the death of Louis XVI. upon one of his judges. Lepelletier Saint-Fargeau had, like many others of his rank, voted for death, with the view of screening from odium his birth and fortune. He had thereby excited greater indignation amongst the royalists, on account of the class to which he belonged. On the evening of the 20th, he was pointed out to the guardsman Pâris, as he seated himself at table in a coffee-room of the Palais-Royal. The young man, enveloped in a large cloak, approached him, saying, "Thou art the miscreant Lepelletier, who voted the death of the king?" "Yes," replied the other; "but I am not a miscreant; I voted according to my conscience." "So!" retorted Paris; "here is thy reward!" and he dug his sword into his side. Lepelletier fell, and Pâris disappeared before any one had time to seize his person.

Tidings of this event spread rapidly into all quarters. It was proclaimed in the convention, the Jacobin Club, and the commune; and the occurrence gave additional credit to the rumours of a royalist conspiracy, intended to massacre the left side and deliver the king at the foot of the scaffold. The Jacobins declared their sitting permanent, and dispatched fresh commissioners to all the authorities and all the sections, to stimulate zeal and place the whole population under arms.

The following morning, the 21st January, five o'clock had tolled at the Temple. The king awoke, called Cléry, inquired the hour, and, rising, dressed with great deliberation. He congratulated himself on having recruited his strength by sleep. Cléry lighted a fire, and brought a chest of drawers, which he converted into an altar. M. Edgeworth assumed the pontifical garments, and commenced the celebration of mass. Cléry officiated as assistant; and the king heard it, kneeling with deep devotion. He afterwards received the sacrament from the hands of M. Edgeworth, and, the ceremony concluded, he rose with fresh resolution, and waited in tranquillity for the moment of proceeding to the scaffold. He asked for scissors, with the view of cutting his hair himself, and avoiding that humiliating operation at the hands of the executioners; but the commune refused him a pair, distrusting his purpose.

At this period the drums were beating through the capital. All who formed part of the armed sections repaired to their companies in perfect submission; and those whom no obligation called to co-operate in the service of that portentous day, remained shut up in their houses. The doors and windows were closed, and each awaited in his own abode the final accomplishment of the catastrophe. It was reported that four or five hundred devoted men were to rush upon the carriage and rescue the king. The convention, the commune, the executive council, the Jacobin Club, were all sitting.

At eight o'clock, Santerre, with a deputation from the commune, the department, and the criminal tribunal, arrived at the Temple. Louis XVI., hearing the noise, arose and prepared to depart. He had declined seeing his family again, to avoid a renewal of the unnerving scene of the previous evening. He charged Cléry to carry his farewell to his wife, sister, and children; and he gave him a signet, some hair, and trinkets, with a commission to deliver them into their possession. He then pressed his hand, thanking him for his services. Subsequently, turning to one of the municipal officers, he begged him to transmit his testament to the commune. This official was an ex-priest, called Jacques-Roux, who brutally replied that his duty was to conduct him to execution, and not to perform commissions. One of his colleagues took the charge on himself; and Louis, advancing towards the attendant group, gave the signal for departure with unshaken firmness.

Two officers of gendarmerie were seated in the front part of the coach; the king and M. Edgeworth occupied the back seat. During the route, which was long and tedious, the king read the prayers of the dying from his confessor's breviary, and the two gendarmes were struck with his exemplary piety and resignation. They were instructed, it is said, to kill him if the coach were attacked. However, no hostile demonstration was manifested from the Temple to the Place de la Revolution. An armed multitude lined the way; the vehicle advanced slowly, and amidst an universal silence. On the square of the Revolution, a large space had been left vacant around the scaffold. Cannon encompassed this space; the most zealous federalists were planted nearest the scaffold, and a vile mob, ever ready to insult genius, virtue, or misfortune, when instigated by worthless leaders, pressed behind the ranks of the federalists, and alone gave any external signs of gratification, whilst all others sought to bury in the innermost recesses of the heart the painful feelings they experienced.

At ten minutes past ten the carriage stopped. Louis XVI., rising unperturbed, alighted on the square. Three executioners came forward; he repulsed them, and disarranged his own dress. But, seeing that they wished to bind his hands, he gave way to a feeling of indignation, and seemed prepared to defend himself. M. Edgeworth, all whose words on the occasion were sublime, turned upon him a last look, and said, "Suffer this outrage as a final resemblance to the God about to become your recompense." At these words, the victim, resigned and docile, allowed himself to be bound and led to the scaffold. Suddenly, Louis stepped apart, shook off the executioners, and advanced to address the people. "Frenchmen," said he, in a firm voice, "I die innocent of the crimes laid to my charge: I pardon the authors of my death; and pray that my blood may not be visited on France." He would have continued, but an order to beat the drums was instantly given; their rolling drowned the voice of the monarch: the executioners rudely seized upon him, and M. Edgeworth solemnly pronounced the words: "Son of Saint Louis, ascend to heaven!"*

Scarcely had his blood spouted forth, than monsters dipped their pikes and handkerchiefs in it, and spread through Paris, vociferating "Long live the republic! The nation for ever!" and even thronged to the gates of the Temple, exhibiting the insensate and spurious joy the multitude always manifests at the birth, the accession, or the fall of princes.

CHAPTER XIX.

POSITION OF PARTIES AFTER THE DEATH OF LOUIS XVI. —ASPECT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.—SECOND COALITION AGAINST FRANCE.—STRUGGLES BETWEEN THE GIRONDISTS AND MOUNTAINEERS.—ESTABLISHMENT OF THE EXTRAORDINARY CRIMINAL TRIBUNAL.

The death of the unfortunate Louis XVI. had produced profound consternation in France, and mingled astonishment and indignation in Europe. As the more discerning revolutionists had foreseen, the nation was irretrievably committed to the most rancorous hostilities, and every avenue to conciliation was irrevocably closed. The necessity was thenceforth imposed on the revolution of waging battle against the coalesced thrones and vanquishing them, or itself sinking beneath their assaults. Nor was any attempt made to conceal the danger; in the assembly, in the Jacobin Club, every where, in fact, it was proclaimed that external defence ought to be the material object of attention; and from this moment the topics of war and finance were constantly inscribed on the order of the day.

We have seen with what apprehensions the two domestic parties regarded each other. The Jacobins thought they beheld a dangerous lurking of royalism in the resistance offered to the condemnation of Louis XVI., and in the horror manifested by several of the departments at the excesses committed since the 10th August. To the last moment, therefore, they had doubted their victory; but the easy execution of the 21st January finally dispelled all their forebodings. Thenceforward they deemed it possible that the cause of the revolution should flourish; and they drew up addresses with the view of enlightening the departments and effecting their conversion. The Girondists, on the contrary, already struck with commiseration for the fate of Louis XVI., and now alarmed besides at the triumph of their adversaries, began to discover in the catastrophe of the 21st January the prelude to long and sanguinary outrages, and the first step towards that inexorable system they so strenuously resisted. Their opponents, indeed, had conceded them the prosecution of the authors of September; but it was a nominal and sterile advantage. In abandoning Louis XVI., their main desire had been to demonstrate that they were not royalists; in abandoning the Septembrisers, the others had been anxious to escape the charge that they protected crime; but neither instance tended, save in a very remote degree, to convince or to mitigate distrust on the one side or the other. The Jacobins still looked upon them as lukewarm republicans, if not as royalists, and they in

* ["Thus perished, at the age of thirty-nine, after a reign of 16½ years, passed in seeking good, the best but the weakest of monarchs. His ancestors bequeathed him a revolution. He was more fitted than any of them to prevent or terminate it, for he was capable of being a reforming king before it broke out, or of being, after its explosion, a constitutional king. He is the only prince, perhaps, who, without passions, had not even that of power, and who combined the two qualities which make good kings, the fear of God and love for the people. He perished the victim of passions he did not partake—those of the persons surrounding him, which were alien to him, and those of the multitude, which he had not excited. There are few kingly memories equally worthy of praise. History will say of him that, with a little more strength of mind, he had stood alone in the list of kings."—Mignet, vol. i. p. 288.

"The sight of the royal corpse produced divers sensations in the minds of the spectators. Some cut off parts of his dress; others sought to gather a few fragments of his hair; a few dipped their sabres in his blood; and many hurried from the scene, evincing in their countenances the most poignant grief. An Englishman, bolder than the rest, threw himself at the foot of the scaffold, dipped his handkerchief in the blood which covered the ground, and disappeared.

In the capital, the great body of the citizens appeared to be overwhelmed by a general stupor; they hardly ventured to look each other in the face on the streets; sadness was depicted on every countenance; a heavy disquietude seemed to have taken possession of every mind. The day following the execution they had not got the better of their consternation, which appeared then to have reached the members of the convention, who were astonished and terrified at so bold a stroke, and the possible consequences with which it might be followed.

Immediately after the execution, the body of Louis XVI. was transported into the ancient cemetery of the Madeleine; it was placed in a ditch six feet square, with its back against the wall of the Rue d'Anjou, and covered with quicklime, which was the cause of its being so difficult afterwards, in 1815, to discover the smallest traces of his remains."—Hist. of Con. vol. ii. p. 13.]

return continued to view their enemies as men defiled with blood and carnage.

Roland, completely discouraged, not at the danger he incurred, but at the evident impossibility of being serviceable, sent in his resignation on the 23d January. The Jacobins congratulated themselves on the event, but speedily raised the cry that the ministry still contained the traitors Clavière and Lebrun, whom Brissot directed as his tools; that the evil was far from being eradicated; and that they must not relax in their exertions, but, on the contrary, redouble their activity, until they had finally purged the government of intriguers, Girondists, Rolandists, Brissotins, &c. On the other hand, the Girondists demanded the re-organisation of the war ministry, which Pache, by his imbecile submission to the Jacobins, had brought into a most deplorable condition. After violent debates, Pache was dismissed as incompetent. Thus the two leaders who divided the ministry, and whose names had become the rallying cries of party, were excluded from the government. The majority of the convention believed that this expedient was an advance towards peace, as if by suppressing the names used by opposing passions, the passions themselves were not sure to survive, seek out fresh mottoes, and continue their contest. Beurnonville, the friend of Dumouriez, and surnamed the French Ajax, was called to the administration of the war department. He was as yet known to the parties only by his gallantry; but his attachment to discipline was speedily to place him in opposition to the disorganising genius of the Jacobins.

After these proceedings, the assembly ordered financial questions to take precedence as orders of the day, since, at this critical moment, when the revolution had to withstand the shock of all Europe, they were confessedly the most important. At the same time, it directed that the constitution committee should present its report in fifteen days at the latest; and resolved that it would immediately afterwards devote itself to the public consolidation. Numerous individuals, not correctly appreciating the causes of revolutionary troubles, imagined that it was the want of laws which provoked all the disasters of the country, and that the constitution would allay all dissensions. Under this persuasion, many of the Girondists, and all the members of the Plain, continually demanded the constitution, and complained bitterly of the delay observed in completing it, alleging with energy that their mission was to constitute. And this they maintained in perfect sincerity; all of them were impressed with the idea that they had been convoked for this purpose alone, and that their assigned task could be accomplished in a few months. They had not yet been made aware that they were assembled, not to institute but to combat; that their fearful mission was to defend the revolution against Europe and La Vendée; that they would soon be converted from the deliberative body they then formed into a sanguinary dictatorship, at once proscribing domestic foes, fighting battles against Europe and revolted provinces, and defending themselves on all sides with the resources of violence; that their laws, transitory as the crisis, would be viewed merely as the emanations of angry excitement; and that of their varied labours, all that would endure was the glory of their defence, the unexampled and terrible mission imposed upon them by destiny, but which they themselves were as yet far from deeming the only one in store for them.

Meanwhile, either from the exhaustion of a prolonged struggle, or from the unanimity of sentiment on the subject of war, all being in harmony on the necessity of making a vigorous defence, and even of provoking the enemy, an interval of quietude succeeded the fierce agitation which had marked the course of the king's trial, and even Brissot was universally applauded for his diplomatic reports upon the relations with foreign powers.

Such, then, was the domestic situation of France, and the state of the parties which divided it. Her position with respect to Europe was most alarming. It was, in truth, a general rupture with all the powers. Hitherto France had only had three declared enemies, Piedmont, Austria, and Prussia. The revolution, every where approved by the people according to the degree of their enlightenment, every where abhorred by the governments in the ratio of their fears, had recently excited very different sensations throughout the world, by the terrible events of the 10th August, the 2d and 3d September, and the 21st January. Less contemned since it had so energetically defended itself, but also less esteemed since it had sullied itself with crimes, it had ceased to interest nations so warmly as before, but taught governments to regard it with a considerable abatement of disdain.

The war, then, was henceforth to become general. Our previous pages have shown Austria giving way to family considerations, and embarking in hostilities little conducive to her interests; Prussia, whose natural policy pointed to an alliance with France against the head of the empire, throwing her armies across the Rhine, upon most frivolous pretences, and retreating from the inglorious campaign of the Argonne; Catherine of Russia, once so addicted to philosophy, deserting, like all the other flutterers in courts, the cause she had formerly espoused from vanity, assailing the revolution in accordance with the dictates as well of policy as of feeling, craftily stimulating Gustavus, the Emperor of Austria, and the King of Prussia, in order to distract their attention from Poland, and drive them towards the west; Piedmont, attacking France against its interests, but from motives of kinsmanship and of hatred for the revolution; the petty courts of Italy, detesting the new republic, but not daring to attack it—nay, even acknowledging it at sight of the tricoloured flag; Switzerland observing a strict neutrality; Holland and the Germanic diet avoiding any decisive manifestation, but allowing their profound abhorrence to be perceptible; Spain preserving a prudent neutrality, under the counsels of the sagacious Count d'Aranda; and, lastly, England, leaving France to tear herself to pieces, the continent to exhaust itself, and the French colonies to convert themselves into wastes—in short, abandoning the pursuit of her vengeance to the inevitable disorders of a revolution.

The new revolutionary impetuosity was destined to disturb all these studied neutralities. Hitherto, Pitt had regulated his conduct upon fair and indisputable principles. In England, a partial revolution, which had but half regenerated the social state, had left in subsistence a multitude of feudal institutions, which of course were objects of warm attachment to the aristocracy and the court, and of severe invective to the opposition. Pitt had two objects in view: the first, domestic, consisted in moderating aristocratic repugnance on the one hand, and checking the spirit of reform on the other, and thus preserving his ministry by controlling the two parties; the second, foreign, contemplated the prostration of France under the weight of her own disasters, and the hatred of all the European governments; in a word, he wished to render his country mistress of the world, and to be master of that country; such was the twofold design he pursued, with the selfishness and strength of purpose characteristic of a great statesman. Neutrality suited his designs most admirably. By abstaining from war, he curbed the blind hatred of his court for liberty; by allowing all the excesses of the French revolution to take free and unrestricted development, he was daily supplied with sanguinary answers in refutation of the apologists of that revolution—answers which in truth proved nothing, but produced, nevertheless, a material effect. He invariably retorted upon the celebrated Fox, the most eloquent man in the ranks of opposition, and indeed in all England, by citing the crimes of reformed France. Upon Burke, an impassioned declaimer, devolved the duty of recapitulating these crimes, a task of which he acquitted himself with absurd violence; he proceeded on one occasion to such a pitch of extravagance as to throw a dagger on the floor of the House of Commons, proclaiming it the manufacture of proselytising Jacobins. Whilst at Paris Pitt was accused of fomenting troubles by largesses, at London he accused the French revolutionists of distributing money to excite rebellion, and the French emigrants gave additional weight to such rumours by diligently repeating and accrediting them. Thus, whilst by this astute policy, worthy a disciple of Machiavel, he rendered French liberty distasteful to the English, he stirred up all Europe against France herself, and, by his envoys, disposed its numerous governments to take up arms. In Switzerland he had not succeeded, but at the Hague, the docile stadtholder, to whom one revolution had been matter of personal experience, who was still distrustful of his people, and had no other support than the English squadrons, had given him unlimited satisfaction, and demonstrated his animosity to France by various unequivocal and hostile proceedings. It was, however, more especially in Spain that Pitt employed a persevering course of intrigue to induce that power to adopt the most inconsiderate step it ever took, that of uniting with England against France, its only maritime ally. The Spanish people had been but slightly moved at the French revolution, and the reasons tending to indispose the cabinet of Madrid against it were less those of security and policy than those resulting from family sympathy, and from the antipathy felt in common by all governments. The prudent Count d'Aranda, resisting the intrigues of the emigrants, the impatient spirit of the Spanish aristocracy, and the instigations of Pitt, had carefully conciliated the jealous susceptibility of the French government. Eventually overthrown, however, and displaced for Don Manuel Godoy, afterwards Prince of Peace, he left his unfortunate country a prey to the most fatal counsels. The cabinet of Madrid had throughout avoided any explicit avowals with respect to France; at the period of the definitive sentence on Louis XVI., it had offered its political recognition, and its mediation with the other powers, if the dethroned monarch were permitted to enjoy life in safety. In reply to this proposition, Danton had moved a declaration of war, but the assembly simply adopted the order of the day. Since that moment, the inclination for war was no longer a subject of doubt. Catalonia was filled with troops; in all the ports, armaments were fitted out, and an immediate attack was resolved upon. Pitt's success, therefore, was secured, whilst he himself, without yet openly declaring his intentions, without compromising England too precipitately, took all needful time to place her navy on a formidable footing, kept her aristocracy in good humour by his vast preparations, and fostered public indignation against France and her revolution by declamatory publications, for which he largely disbursed the national funds. Thus silently augmenting his resources, he at the same time inspirited a preponderating league against France, which, completely engrossing all her strength, effectually prevented her either from succouring her colonies or arresting the progress of the English arms in the Indian peninsula.

At no period is Europe recorded to have been stricken with so perfect a blindness, and to have committed against herself so many astounding follies, as at the one now under review. Thus, turning our eyes to the west, we behold Spain, Holland, and all the maritime powers, under the misguiding influence of aristocratic passions, arming in conjunction with their enemy England against France, their natural ally. Prussia likewise we see, yielding to an inconceivable vanity, uniting itself with the head of the empire against that very France whose firm alliance the great Frederick had always recommended. The insignificant King of Sardinia fell into the same error, from motives which it must be allowed were more intelligible —the sympathies of kinsmanship. In the east and in the north, we perceive Catherine left at liberty to perpetrate a crime against Poland, and to compromise the security of Germany, for the petty advantage of acquiring a few provinces, and of being enabled to desolate France without interference. Hence all the ancient and mutually advantageous connexions were cast aside, and the perfidious suggestions of the two most formidable powers weakly listened to by the various European cabinets, thus stimulated to arms against one unfortunate country, and that country the old protectress or ally of those now attacking her. All conspired to hasten that consummation, all yielded implicitly to the views of Pitt and Catherine; inconsiderate Frenchmen overspread Europe to promote this baneful departure from all true policy and prudence, and to draw upon their native land the most deplorable of scourges. And what were the motives of such infatuated conduct? Poland was abandoned to Catherine, because it had presumed to regulate its old and pristine liberty; France was abandoned to Pitt, because it had presumed to give itself the liberty it never enjoyed before. Doubtless France had committed excesses; but those very excesses were sure to be aggravated by the violence of the approaching struggle; and, without succeeding in blotting out that so much abhorred liberty, Europe was now preparing to enter upon a course which led to a thirty years' war, the most destructive in the annals of the human race, provoking interminable invasions, arousing an universal conqueror, producing endless vicissitudes and desolations, and finishing by the consolidation of the two colossal empires, which at the present day domineer over Europe upon the two elements—England and Russia.

Amidst this general confederacy, Denmark, ruled by a discreet minister, and Sweden, freed from the presumptuous projects of Gustavus, alone observed a prudent caution, which Holland and Spain would have done well to imitate, by joining the system of the armed neutrality. The French government had formed a perfectly correct judgment upon these general dispositions, and the impatience which characterised it at this moment did not admit of its tarrying for formal declarations of war, but urged it, on the contrary, to precipitate them. Since the 10th August, it had continually demanded its recognition; but with regard to England, whose neutrality was precious on account of the enemies already drawn up in array against it, it had still preserved a certain moderation in its tone. But after the 21st January, it had thrown all such considerations aside, and at once determined upon an universal war. Convinced that secret attacks were not less dangerous than open and avowed hostilities, it hastened to make its enemies declare themselves; and so early as the 22d January, the National Convention passed all the cabinets in review, directed reports upon the conduct of each with respect to France, and stood prepared to proclaim war against them, should they procrastinate in furnishing explicit and categorical explanations.

Since the 10th August, England had withdrawn her ambassador from Paris, and only permitted as French ambassador in London, M. Chauvelin, in the capacity of envoy from the extinct royalty. These diplomatic refinements were simply intended to keep up appearances as regarded the imprisoned king, and at the same time to defer hostilities, for which the time was not yet ripe. Accordingly, Pitt pretended to require a secret agent to [illegible] his complaints against the French government. The citizen Maret was charged with this mission in the month of December. He had a confidential interview with Pitt. After mutual protests, to the purport that the interview possessed no official character, that it was strictly amicable, and had no other object save the benevolent hope of tending to satisfy the two nations as to their reciprocal grievances, Pitt complained that France threatened the allies of England, even assailed their interests, and, in corroboration of his assertion, pointed to Holland. The injury here alleged was the opening of the Scheldt, a measure imprudent, perhaps, but just and beneficial, which the French had adopted on their entrance into the Low Countries. In truth, there was something inexpressibly absurd in the old observance, that to secure the Dutch a monopoly of its navigation, the Low Countries, through which the Scheldt passes, should be debarred from making any use of that river. Austria had not ventured to abolish this servitude, but Dumouriez did so by orders from his government; and the inhabitants of Antwerp beheld with joyful emotions vessels again ascending the Scheldt as far as their city. The reply was not difficult; for France, when respecting the rights of neutral neighbours, had not undertaken to uphold political iniquities, because neutrals were interested in their preservation. Besides, the Dutch government had evinced sufficient malevolence to abrogate the necessity of consulting its wishes at any great sacrifice. The second grievance adduced was the decree of the 15th November, by which the National Convention promised aid to all nations who should throw off the yoke of tyranny. This decree, an imprudent bravado, doubtless, and adopted in a moment of enthusiasm, did not mean, as Pitt feigned to believe, that the convention invited all nations to revolt, but that it would afford succour to the people against their governments in all countries at war with the revolution. Pitt lastly complained of the constant menaces and declamations which issued from the Jacobins against all governments; but in this particular the governments were assuredly not one whit more blameless than the Jacobins; and if a balance had been struck, little would have been found due to either side on the score of foul language.

This interview produced no result, and served merely to show that England's object at the moment was to gain time; that she had every wish for war, but judged a certain delay in its declaration expedient. However, the great trial of the month of January accelerated events. The English parliament was suddenly convoked before the usual period. An inquisitorial law was passed against all Frenchmen travelling in England; the Tower of London was put in a state of defence, and militia-levies were ordered: preparations and proclamations alike announced war to be determined upon. The populace of London was purposely excited; and throughout the island that insensate passion was studiously aroused, which renders a war with France acceptable as if it were a signal national benefit. At length, vessels loaded with grain bound for French ports were stopped; and on tidings of the 21st January, the French ambassador, whom the English government had hitherto refused in some sort to recognise, received orders to quit the kingdom within eight days. The National Convention forthwith directed a report to be framed upon the conduct of England with respect to France, and upon its close relations with the stadtholder of the United Provinces; and on the first of February, after hearing Brissot, who, for that fleeting moment, obtained the applauses of both parties, solemnly declared war against Holland and England. Hostilities with the Spanish government, also, were imminent; and although war was not formally declared, that ceremony seemed tacitly waived on both sides. Thus France had almost the whole of Europe arrayed in open enmity against her; and the act whereby she had broken with all crowned heads, and committed herself past recall to the torrent of the revolution, was unquestionably that which so fatally illustrated the 21st of January.

The dread assault of so many confederated powers had accordingly to be withstood, and however powerful in population and resources, France could hardly expect to resist with success so universal and [illegible] an attack. But her leaders were not dism[illegible] were their confidence and audacity in the least sh[illegible] The unexpected triumphs of the republic in the Argonne and in Belgium had convinced them that every man, above all, a Frenchman, could become a soldier in six months. The excitement pervading France induced them to believe, also, that the entire population might be transported to fields of battle; and that it was thus quite possible to assemble even three or four millions of men, who would soon be soldiers; and in this manner far outstrip all that the united sovereigns of Europe could bring together in the shape of armies. "Observe well," said they, "the result as regards all kingdoms: we see a small quantity of men, recruited with difficulty, filling out the forms of armies; the bulk of the people stands aloof and regardless, and a handful of disciplined creatures decides the fate of the most extensive empires. But, on the other hand, imagine an entire nation starting from private life and taking arms for its defence, must it not set all ordinary calculations at nought? What is there impossible to twenty-five millions of men, not inert, but roused and acting?" Upon the point of expenditure they were equally sanguine. The amount of national property was daily increasing by emigration, and already greatly exceeded that of the national debt. At the moment, this capital lay dormant from the want of purchasers; but assignats would take its place, and their conventional value realise the prospective value of the estates they represented. In circulation they were certainly depreciated a third of their nominal value, but they had merely to add a third to the amount on this ground, as the pledge was so enormous that it could safely bear any requisite excess of issue. Besides, as the men to be moved to the field of battle lived well at present, many indeed in luxury, why should they not live in a camp as easily as by their firesides? Could the elements and food be ever wanting to men, wheresoever they might congregate? Again, society, as it then existed, possessed more wealth than was needed to supply the wants of all; it only required a better distribution; with which view they proposed to tax the rich, and make them bear the charges of the war. Lastly, the countries into which the French armies would penetrate, having likewise old social systems to overthrow and abuses to root out, in them immense sums might be realised from the spoils of priests, nobles, and kings, for such states must in pure justice repay France for the aid she should afford them.

It was thus the ardent imagination of Cambon reasoned, and his ideas speedily took possession of the public mind. In the antiquated system of cabinets, from one to two hundred thousand soldiers, supported by certain imposts or crown-revenues, were all that politicians calculated upon; in the present instance, it was one mass of human beings who arose of themselves and said, "We will compose the armies;" who glanced at the total aggregate of wealth, and again communed with themselves—"This sum is sufficient, and, divided amongst all, will supply the wants of all." Doubtless it was not the entire nation which held such language; but these opinions were embraced by the most enthusiastic portion of that nation, and it was prepared to enforce them by all expedients upon the general body.

Before proceeding to the distribution of the resources thus acutely discerned by the zealous revolutionists, it will be necessary to revisit the frontiers, and consider how the last campaign had terminated. Its commencement had been sufficiently brilliant; but a first success, ill improved, had merely served to extend the line of operations, and provoke on the part of the enemy a more formidable and decisive effort. Thus, defence had become more difficult in proportion as it spread over more ground, and the defeated foe was incited to act with redoubled energy; at the same time his invigorated assault came in conjunction with the almost general disorganisation of the French armies. In addition to these untoward circumstances, the number of the hostile confederates was more than doubled; for the English upon the coasts, the Spaniards on the Pyrenees, and the Dutch to the north of the Low Countries, threatened new attacks.

Dumouriez had stopped short on the banks of the Meuse, being prevented from pushing on to the Rhine by reasons which have been imperfectly appreciated, because the delays which succeeded the rapidity of his early operations seemed inexplicable. When he reached Liege, the disorganisation of his army was complete. The soldiers were almost naked; for want of shoes they had wrapped their feet in hay; all that they had in any thing like sufficiency was meat and bread, owing to a contract which Dumouriez had maintained by his own authority. But no money was obtainable to pay them even partially in specie, and they either plundered the peasants, or used violence to compel them to receive assignats. The horses were daily perishing for want of provender; those of the artillery were almost all dead. Privations, and the slackened progress of the war, conspired to disgust the troops; and the volunteers deserted in whole companies, adducing a decree which declared that the country had ceased to be in danger. The convention was obliged to pass another decree in order to prevent this extensive evasion, and, however severe its provisions, the gendarmerie stationed on the highways scarcely sufficed to stop the fugitives. The army was diminished a third. These united causes effectually debarred Dumouriez from pursuing the Austrians with the necessary vivacity. Clairfayt had found time to intrench himself on the banks of the Erft, and Beaulieu in the direction of Luxumbourg; and it was impossible for Dumouriez, with an army reduced to 30,000 or 40,000 men, to drive before him an enemy defended by strong hilly and woody positions, and resting upon Luxumbourg, one of the most impregnable fortresses in the world. If, as was incessantly repeated, Custine, instead of making excursions in Germany, had turned back on Coblentz, effected a junction with Beurnonville for the capture of Treves, and both had afterwards descended the Rhine, Dumouriez on his part would have advanced to that barrier by Cologne. By this means, all three might have united together; Luxumbourg would have been invested, and in all probability fallen, from its communications being completely intercepted. But all this had remained simply hypothetical: Custine, stubborn in his desire to draw the war towards his own quarter, was successful only in provoking a declaration from the Germanic diet, in irritating the vanity of the King of Prussia, and fixing him more firmly in the coalition; Beurnonville, reduced to his own troops, had failed in effecting the fall of Treves; and the enemy had maintained his positions both in the electorate of Treves and the duchy of Luxumbourg. In this state of things, if Dumouriez had advanced towards the Rhine, he would have uncovered his right flank and his rear, and even then have been unable, considering the doleful situation of his army, to overrun that extensive region which stretches between the Meuse and the Rhine, and as far as the frontiers of Holland—a difficult country, with no facilities for transport, intersected with woods and high hills, and occupied by an enemy still far from contemptible. We may be quite sure that Dumouriez would have preferred gaining laurels on the Rhine, if he had possessed the means of conquest, to visiting Paris as a mediator for Louis XVI. The zeal for royalty, which he so largely attributed to himself in London to increase his consequence, and with which the Jacobins upbraided him in Paris to destroy his influence, was by no means so ardent as to lead him from a brilliant course of victory to place himself in jeopardy amidst the factions of the capital. He quitted the scene of warfare only because he could effect nothing more, and because he hoped, by personal intercourse with the government, to remove the difficulties that had been thrown in his path during the invasion of Belgium.

We have in an earlier part of this work described the embarrassments his conquest was preparing for him. Belgium desired a revolution, but not so sweeping and radical a revolution as that of France. Dumouriez, from principle, policy, and considerations of military prudence, was naturally disposed to declare in favour of the moderate tendencies of the country he occupied. We have already seen him struggling to save the Belgians from the disasters of war, to give them a share in the profit of commissariat contracts, and to insinuate rather than force the assignats into circulation. For all such cares his exclusive recompense was the fiercest of Jacobin invectives. Cambon had materially aggravated his difficulties by procuring the decree of the 15th December.

When urging its adoption, that deputy had, amidst the most vehement cheering, thus spoken:—"In the countries we enter, we must at once proclaim a revolutionary government. It is useless to practise concealment: the despots know well what we aim at; and since they interpret our meaning so sagaciously, we ought to declare it boldly and openly, the more especially when its justice can be so triumphantly avowed. Wheresoever our generals shall come, there must they be enjoined to proclaim the sovereignty of the people, the abolition of feudalism, of tithes, of all abuses; there must all former authorities be dissolved, and new local administrations be provisionally formed, under the direction of our generals. Those administrations will govern the country, and advise on the means of composing a national convention to decide upon its destiny. The property of our enemies, that is to say, of nobles, priests, lay or ecclesiastical corporations, churches, &c., must be instantly sequestrated, and placed under the safeguard of the French nation, so that strict accounts may be rendered through the local administrations, and the possessions themselves serve as security for the costs of the war, whereof the delivered countries will of course defray a portion, since the war is undertaken for their enfranchisement. After the campaign, a balance will be struck; should the republic be found to have received in stores more than the expenses due to her justly warrant, she will discharge the surplus; if there be a deficiency, it will be made good to her. It is also indispensable that our assignats, based on the new distribution of property, should be received in the conquered countries, and that their field should expand with the principles which have produced them; and, lastly, that the executive power should dispatch envoys to concert with those provisional administrations, fraternise with them, keep the accounts of the republic, and execute the ordained confiscation." He added, "No half revolutions! Every nation which refuses what we now propose shall be our enemy, and will richly deserve to be treated as such. Peace and fraternity to all the friends of liberty; war to the abject partisans of despotism! War to palaces, peace to cottages!"

These ideas had been forthwith embodied in a decree, and carried into practical operation throughout the conquered provinces. A multitude of agents, selected by the executive power from the Jacobin ranks, had been immediately disseminated through Belgium, the provisional administrations formed under their guidance, and those bodies urged to an exceeding pitch of demagogical fury. The lowest classes, instigated by the Jacobin emissaries against the middle ranks, committed the most revolting disorders. They introduced, in truth, all at once, and without any state of transition between the old and the new order of things, the anarchy of 1793, which had been progressively brought on in France by four years of trouble and excitement. These proconsuls, invested with almost absolute powers, imprisoned persons and confiscated property at pleasure; and despoiling the churches of all their plate, highly exasperated the unhappy

Belgians, who were ardently attached to the rites of their faith, and gave occasion, moreover, for extensive malversations. They assembled what were called conventions, to decide on the destiny of each province; and, under their despotic influence, a union with France was voted at Liege, Brussels, Mons, &c. These were evils inevitable from the policy adopted, and were infinitely aggravated by the military brutality wherewith revolutionary violence was aided in producing them. Nor were these the only calamities which befel this unfortunate country: divisions of a different nature broke out to complete its misery. The agents of the executive power pretended to hold subject to their orders the generals commanding within the limits of their commissariat jurisdiction; and if those generals were not Jacobins, as often happened to be the case, this assumption became a fresh and prolific source of quarrels and struggles, which succeeded in perfecting the universal confusion. Dumouriez, indignant at seeing his conquests compromised, both by the disorganisation of his army and the hatred infused into the Belgians, had already treated with harshness some of these proconsuls, and repaired to Paris to make known his complaints, with the warmth characteristic of his temper, and the haughtiness of a victorious general who deemed himself necessary to the republic.

Such was the situation of affairs on the principal theatre of the war. On the other points, Custine, driven back into Mayence, passed his time in declamations against the manner in which Beurnonville had executed his attempt on Treves. Kellermann supported himself in the Alps, at Chambéry, and at Nice. Servan was fruitlessly expending his efforts to form an army at the foot of the Pyrenees; and Monge, equally docile towards the Jacobins as Pache, had allowed the administration of the navy department to be thrown into a state of utter decomposition. Hence it became absolutely necessary for the convention to devote immediate and undivided attention to the defence of the frontiers. Dumouriez had passed the latter part of December and the month of January at Paris, where he completely wrecked his favour with the mob and its leaders, by letting fall certain expressions in behalf of Louis XVI., by absenting himself from the Jacobin Club, where he was repeatedly announced as about to appear, but never gratified its members by an actual entrance, and by his close intimacy with his friend Gensonné. He had drawn up four memorials, one on the decree of the 15th December, another on the organisation of the army, a third on the subject of supplies, and the last on the plan of the campaign for the opening year. At the foot of each of his memorials was appended his resignation, if his propositions were rejected.

In addition to the diplomatic and military committees, the assembly had appointed a third extraordinary committee, called that of general defence, with instructions to devote exclusive attention to all that concerned the defence of France. It was very numerous, and all the members of the assembly were allowed, if they pleased, to be present at its sittings. One of the main objects of its formation was to reconcile the members of the two parties, and satisfy them as to their several intentions, by bringing them to labour in common for the general safety. Robespierre, annoyed at seeing the Girondists, who were assiduous in their attendance on the committee, seldom appeared at its meetings. Dumouriez came before it with his plans, was unfortunate enough not to be always comprehended, on several occasions gave offence by his haughty bearing, and ultimately abandoned his memorials to their fate. He then retired to some distance from Paris, not much in the mood to divest himself of his commandership, notwithstanding his warnings on that head to the convention, and awaiting in gloomy reserve the season for opening a new campaign.

His popularity at the Jacobin Club was for ever gone, and Marat assailed him daily in his journal for having abetted a demi-revolution in Belgium, and having shown a spirit of enmity against the demagogues. He was accused, also, of having voluntarily allowed the Austrians to escape from Belgium; and, going still farther back, it was publicly [illegible] he had opened the passes of the Argonne [illegible] Frederick William, whom he might have readily exterminated. The members of the council and committees, however, gave way less blindly to popular passions, and, deeply sensible of his importance, endeavoured to soothe his ruffled feelings. Robespierre even spoke in his vindication, attributing all his backslidings to his pretended friends the Girondists. Thus a general disposition prevailed, in the convention at least, to give him all possible satisfaction, without departing, however, from the decrees already passed, or the inexorable principles of the revolution. His two commissariat agents, Malus and Petit-Jean, were restored to him, numerous reinforcements granted, promises of abundant supplies held out, and his ideas on the general plan of the ensuing campaign adopted; but no relaxation was made in the decree of the 15th December, or in the new system of administration for the army. The nomination of Beurnonville, his friend, to the ministry of war, was an additional advantage to him; and he might reasonably anticipate the greatest zeal on the part of government in providing all that he should subsequently need.

He entertained the idea for a moment that England would accept him as a mediator between her and France, and he departed for Antwerp full of that flattering hallucination. But the convention, having had its patience exhausted by the perfidies of Pitt, declared war against England and Holland, as we have previously observed. That declaration found him at Antwerp, accompanied by an intimation of the measures that had been resolved upon, partly framed in accordance with his own plans for the defence of the territory. It was determined to raise the armies to 502,000 men, which will appear but a moderate force when the ideas prevalent respecting the capabilities of France are considered, and when compared with the standard to which they were afterwards elevated. The defensive was to be maintained on the east and south, observation simply kept up along the Pyrenees and the coasts, and all the vigour of the offensive displayed in the north, where, as Dumouriez had said on a former occasion, "a general could defend himself by battles alone." To secure the execution of this plan, 150,000 men were to occupy Belgium, and cover the frontier from Dunkirk to the Meuse; 50,000 were to guard the interval between the Meuse and the Sarre; and 150,000 to extend along the Rhine and the Vosges, from Mayence to Besançon and Gex; lastly, a reserve was to be stationed at Châlons, provided with every essential to proceed upon any point where its aid might be required. It was agreed to defend Savoy and Nice with two armies of 70,000 men each, the Pyrenees with one of 40,000, and the coasts of the ocean and Brittany with 46,000 men, part of whom might be transferred on board of ship if it were judged necessary. Of these 502,000 men, 50,000 were intended for cavalry, and 20,000 as artillery.* Such were the demonstrations detailed on a sheet of paper; but the actual force fell far short of what was projected, sinking to 270,000 men, of whom 100,000 were in various quarters of Belgium, 25,000 on the Moselle, 45,000 at Mayence, under the orders of Custine, 30,000 on the Upper-Rhine, 40,000 in Savoy and Nice, and 30,000, at the utmost, in the interior. But to fill up the destined complement, the assembly decreed that the armies should be recruited from the national guard; that every member thereof, unmarried, or married and childless, or a widower without offspring, was at the disposition of the executive power, from the age of eighteen to that of forty-five. This enactment was based on the allegation that 300,000 men were necessary to resist the coalition; and it directed that the enrolments should be proceeded with until that number was obtained.* At the same time, the convention ordered the emission of eight hundred millions of assignats, and the demolition of the woods of Corsica for the construction of ships of war.

* [A numerical error occurs in the text here, as the amount of all the forces enumerated, exclusive of the reserve at Châlons, is exactly 576,000 men, so that the artillery and cavalry must have been intended as in addition to the 502,000.]

In the interim, until the accomplishment of these projects, the campaign was opened with 270,000 men. Of these, Dumouriez had 30,000 on the Scheldt and about 70,000 on the Meuse. The rapid invasion of Holland was a bold thought, which stirred all minds at the moment; and Dumouriez was compulsorily driven to its adoption by the general feeling. Several plans for effecting the object were propounded. One, invented by the Batavian refugees exiled from their country after the revolution of 1787, consisted in invading Zealand with a few thousand men, and seizing upon the government, which would retreat to that province. Dumouriez had feigned acquiescence in that project, but in truth he found it barren and pitiful, inasmuch as it confined him to the occupation of an inconsiderable, and, furthermore, an unimportant part of Holland. A second plan took its parentage from himself; it proposed to descend the Meuse by Venloo to Graves, turn from the latter place to Nimeguen, and subsequently fall on Amsterdam. This would have been the surest scheme, if the future could have been foreseen. But, stationed as he was at Antwerp, Dumouriez formed a third project, surpassing the others in boldness and promptitude, in admirable harmony with revolutionary impatience, and more prolific in decisive results, if success should attend it. Whilst his lieutenants, Miranda, Valence, Dampierre, and others, were to descend the Meuse and occupy Maestricht, upon which the French had refrained from seizing the year before, and Venloo, which could not offer a long resistance, Dumouriez conceived the idea of proceeding secretly with 25,000 men between Bergen-op-Zoom and Breda, thus attaining Moerdyk, then passing the small sea of Bielbos, and advancing rapidly by the mouths of the rivers to Leyden and Amsterdam. This daring plan was as defensible in reason as many others which have been sanctified by success; and if it were hazardous, it made amends by offering much greater advantages than that of attacking directly by Venloo and Nimeguen. By pursuing the latter course, Dumouriez assailed the Dutch in front, they having already made all their preparations between Graves and Gorkum, and he even allowed them time to draw reinforcements from England or Prussia. On the contrary, by passing over the mouths of the rivers, he penetrated into the interior of Holland, which was not defended; and if he surmounted the impediment of the waters, Holland fell at once into his possession. Returning from Amsterdam, he would take the fortresses in the rear, and reduce all between him and his lieutenants, who would be prepared to join him by Nimeguen and Utrecht.

It was natural that he should assume the command of the army destined for the expedition, since in its conduct more essentially than elsewhere were needed promptitude, bold determination, and ability. The project itself involved the danger common to all offensive operations, to wit, exposing his own territory to invasion by uncovering it. Thus the Meuse remained open to the Austrians. At the same time, in all cases of reciprocal inroads, the advantage accrues to the party which most strenuously resists the peril, and is least wrought upon by the terrors of invasion.

Dumouriez dispatched Thouvenot, in whom he had full confidence, to the Meuse; he imparted to his lieutenants, Valence and Miranda, the plans he had hitherto concealed from them, and enjoined them to hasten the siege of Maestricht and Venloo, and in case of unexpected delays, to relieve each other before those places, so that the progress towards Nimeguen might always proceed. He also directed them to appoint Liege and Aix-la-Chapelle as the localities for all dispersed detachments to rally around, in order to be in a position to resist the enemy, should he appear in force to incommode the sieges about to be undertaken on the Meuse.

Dumouriez lost no time in starting from Antwerp with 18,000 troops hastily collected. He divided his little army into several detachments, which had orders to summon the various strong places to surrender, without tarrying, however, to besiege them. His advanced guard was to push on with all dispatch to seize boats and means of transport, whilst he himself, with the main body, would keep in readiness to carry succour to such of his lieutenants as might require it. On the 17th February 1793, he entered the Dutch territory, and published a proclamation, in which he held out the promise of amity to the Batavians, and the threat of hostility merely to the stadtholder and the English influence. His divisions, meanwhile, advanced, leaving General Leclerc before Bergen-op-Zoom, planting General Berneron before Klundert and Willemstadt, and consigning to the excellent engineer, D'Arçon, the feint of an attack on the important fortress of Breda. Dumouriez halted with the rearguard at Sevenberghen. On the 25th, General Berneron carried the fort of Klundert, and directed all his efforts against Willemstadt. General d'Arçon threw a few shells on Breda. That fastness enjoyed a high reputation for strength, and the garrison was sufficient for its defence, but was badly officered; it surrendered after a few hours' cannonade to a body of assailants scarcely exceeding its defenders in number. The French entered Breda on the 27th, and gained considerable spoil in munitions of war, consisting of 250 pieces of ordnance, 300,000 pounds of powder, and 5000 muskets. After leaving a garrison in Breda, General d'Arçon appeared on the 1st March before Gertruydenberg, likewise a very strong fortification, and carried the same day all the advanced works. Dumouriez had proceeded to Moerdyk, and was engaged in repairing the evils that had arisen from the delays of his advanced guard. So auspicious a series of surprises, upon fortresses capable of maintaining a stout and obstinate resistance, threw infinite lustre upon the commencement of this expedition; but unforeseen obstacles impeded the passage of the arm of the sea, the most difficult operation in the whole enterprise. Dumouriez had anticipated that his advanced guard, acting with greater energy and promptitude than it displayed, would have appropriated a quantity of boats, boldly crossed the Bielbos, occupied the island of Dort, which was guarded by a few hundred men at the utmost, and seizing upon a numerous flotilla, conveyed it to the opposite shore, for the purpose of transporting the army over the frith. Unavoidable delays prevented the execution of this part of the plan. Dumouriez strove to compensate for the failure by possessing himself of all the boats or skiffs he could discover, and gathering carpenters to construct floating rafts. Meanwhile time was becoming hourly more precious, as the Dutch army was assembling at Gorkum, at Stry, and in the Isle of Dort, whilst some gunboats and an English frigate threatened his embarkation, and even cannonaded his camp, designated by his ever sprightly soldiery "the camp of beavers." The troops had in fact erected huts of straw, whence the idea was taken; and animated by the presence of their general, braved with admirable fortitude the intense cold, the privations and dangers affecting them, looked forward intrepidly to the coming hazards of so daring an undertaking, and impatiently awaited the moment for passing to the opposite strand. On the 3d of March, General Deflers arrived with a fresh division; on the 4th, Gertruydenberg opened its gates; and all was in readiness for attempting the passage of the Bielbos.

* Decree of the 24th February.

Whilst these events were illustrating the military annals of France, the contest between the two parties of the interior continued in all its virulence. The murder of Lepelletier had afforded the Mountaineers an opportunity for proclaiming their lives in danger, and the assembly had found it impossible to deny them the renewal of the committee of surveillance. This committee was composed of Mountaineers, whose first act was to order the arrest of Gorsas, a deputy and journalist, attached to the party of the Gironde. The Jacobins had likewise gained another advantage, in procuring the suspension of the prosecutions decreed on the 20th January against the authors of the September massacres. Those proceedings had scarcely commenced before it was discovered that overwhelming evidence implicating the principal revolutionists, and Danton himself, could be adduced. Thereupon the Jacobins stirred up the elements of fury, and vociferated that all were equally criminal on those days, because all had either deemed their occurrences necessary or quietly suffered them. They even ventured to maintain that the only evil to be deplored on those days was the incompleteness of the sacrifice; and they vehemently demanded the suspension of proceedings which were tortured into attacks on the purest revolutionists. In pursuance of these clamorous instances, the prosecutions were suspended, that is to say, abrogated; and a deputation from the Jacobin Club immediately appeared before the minister of justice, to ensure the transmission of a dispatch by extraordinary couriers, staying the indictments already opened against their brothers of Meaux.

We have already seen that Pache had been obliged to quit the ministry, and that Roland had voluntarily submitted his resignation. This mutual concession failed to mitigate the inveteracies of hatred. The Jacobins were so far from being appeased, that they called for a prosecution against Roland, alleging, as crimes against him, that he had defrauded the state of immense sums, and remitted to London upwards of twelve millions; that he had employed this ill-gotten wealth in perverting the public mind by means of hireling writers, and in promoting sedition by forestalling supplies of grain. They asserted that proceedings ought to be instituted in like manner against Clavière, Lebrun, and Beurnonville, who, according to their views, were all traitors and accomplices in the intrigues of the Girondists. At the same time, they prepared for their complaisant ex-placeman a flattering and beneficial compensation. Chambon, the successor of Pétion in the mayoralty of Paris, had abdicated functions too arduous for his weakness of character. The Jacobins immediately turned their eyes on Pache, in whom they found concentred all the requisite wisdom and inflexibility of a magistrate. The idea was warmly responded to amongst themselves, and quickly imparted to the commune, the sections, and the clubs; and the Parisians, impelled by these overweening influences, avenged Pache for his disgrace by nominating him their mayor. Assuming that Pache showed himself as docile in the mayoralty as in the ministry of war, the Jacobins thus assured their domination in Paris; and the choice became equally conducive to their interests and to the gratification of their passions.

